

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

GENERAL LIBRARY UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN.

THE Hagerman Collection

OF BOOKS RELATING TO HISTORY AND POLITICAL SCIENCE

BOUGHT WITH MONEY PLACED BY JAMES J. HAGERMAN OF CLASS OF '61

IN THE HANDS OF Professor Charles Kendall Adams

IN THE YEAR

1883.

HANSARD'S
PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

THIRD SERIES:

COMMENCING WITH THE ACCESSION OF WILLIAM IV.

43° & 44° VICTORIÆ, 1880.

VOL. CCLV.

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE THIRD DAY OF AUGUST 1880,
TO
THE TWENTY-FOURTH DAY OF AUGUST 1880.

FOURTH VOLUME OF THE SECOND SESSION.

LONDON:
PUBLISHED BY CORNELIUS BUCK, AT THE OFFICE FOR "HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES."
22, PATERNOSTER ROW. [E.C.]

1880.

111

TABLE OF CONTENTS

TO

VOLUME CCLV.

THIRD SERIES.

LORDS, TUESDAY, AUGUST 8.

Page

SOUTH AFRICA—SIR BARTLE FRERE — PAPERS AND CORRESPONDENCE— Question, Earl Cadogan; Answer, The Earl of Kimberley ..	1
AFGHANISTAN—STATE OF AFFAIRS AT CANDAHAR—DEFEAT OF GENERAL BURROWS'S FORCE—Question, The Duke of Somerset; Answer, Earl Granville	3
Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill (No. 162)— Order of the Day for resuming the Debate on the Amendment to the Motion for the Second Reading, read; Debate resumed accordingly ..	3
After long debate, on Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion (leave being given to the Lord Grinstead (the Earl of Enniskillen) to vote in the House)? their Lordships divided ; Contents 51, Not-Con- tents 282; Majority 231. Resolved in the Negative ; and Bill to be read 2 ^a on this day three months . List of Contents and Not-Contents	110

COMMONS, TUESDAY, AUGUST 8.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS—BOROUGH OF BOSTON ELECTION— Judges' Certificates and Reports read	113
--	-----

QUESTIONS.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION ACT, 1879 — CUMULATIVE SENTENCES—CASE OF GEORGE DAVIES—Questions, Mr. P. A. Taylor; Answers, Mr. Arthur Peel	116
ARMY—THE ORDNANCE AND COMMISSARIAT DEPARTMENTS—Question, Mr. Whalley; Answer, Mr. Childers	117
OFFENCES AGAINST THE EXCISE LAWS (IRELAND)—TOBACCO (SEIZURES)— Question, Mr. W. Corbet; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish ..	117
SOUTH AFRICA—THE CAPE COLONY—SIR BARTLE FRERE—DESPATCHES AND CORRESPONDENCE—Questions, General Sir George Balfour, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answers, Mr. Grant Duff	118

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 3.]	Page
ARMENIA, ASIA MINOR, AND SYRIA—THE DEBATE—Personal Explanation, Mr. Bourke; Observations, Sir Charles W. Dilke:—Short debate thereon	119
LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) ACT, 1870—THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON LAND—Questions, Mr. Ashton Dilke, Mr. Justin M'Carthy; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington	122
AFGHANISTAN—STATE OF AFFAIRS AT CABUL AND CANDAHAR—Questions, Mr. Gorst, Mr. J. G. Talbot; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington..	122
NAVY—H.M.S. "IRON DUKE"—Question, Mr. B. Samuelson; Answer, Mr. Shaw Lefevre	123
TREATY OF BERLIN—THE CONFERENCE—THE PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS—Question, Mr. Bourke; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke	124

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Employers' Liability (re-committed) Bill [Bill 209]—

Bill considered in Committee	124
After long time spent therein, Moved , "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Dodson.)

AFGHANISTAN—STATE OF AFFAIRS AT CABUL AND CANDAHAR—Observations, The Marquess of Hartington	170
Question put, and agreed to :—Committee report Progress; to sit again this day .

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Employers' Liability (re-committed) Bill [Bill 209]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 3rd August]	171
After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow .

Game Laws Amendment Bill [Bill 291]—

Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Knight)	221
Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months,"—(Mr. Dilhoyn.) Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question: "
— Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. J. W. Pease :) —Question put, and agreed to :—Debate adjourned till Tuesday next.

Teachers' Registration Bill— Ordered (Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Playfair, Mr. Arthur Balfour); presented , and read the first time [Bill 296]	222
--	-----

Expiring Laws Continuance Bill— Ordered (Mr. John Holms, Lord Frederick Cavendish); presented , and read the first time [Bill 297]	222
---	-----

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 4.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS—CHESTER CITY ELECTION— Judges' Report read	222
--	-----

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 4.]

Page

QUESTION.

MERCHANT SHIPPING (GRAIN CARGOES) BILL—RICE—Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain	223
---	-----

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Employers' Liability (re-committed) Bill [Bill 209]— Bill considered in Committee [Progress 3rd August]	224
After long time spent therein, it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Chairman reported Progress; Committee to sit again To-morrow .
Free Education (Scotland Bill— Ordered (Dr. Cameron, Mr. M'Laren, Mr. Henderson, Mr. Middleton); presented , and read the first time [Bill 299]	295
Married Women (Maintenance, &c. of Children) Bill— Ordered (Mr. Hopwood, Mr. Thomasson); presented , and read the first time [Bill 300]	296

LORDS, THURSDAY, AUGUST 5.

Epping Forest Bill (No. 179)— Moved , "That the Bill be now read 2 ^a ,"—(The Earl Granville)	296
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 ^a accordingly; Com- mittee negatived ; Then Standing Order No. XXXV. considered (ac- cording to Order), and dispensed with :—Bill read 3 ^a , and passed .
Wild Birds Protection Law Amendment Bill (Nos. 144, 172)— Moved , "That the Bill be now read 3 ^a "	297
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 3 ^a accordingly, with the Amendments, and passed , and sent to the Commons.

COMMONS, THURSDAY, AUGUST 5.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS—CITY OF OXFORD ELECTION— Judges' Report read	298
--	-----

QUESTIONS.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE CLERK OF THE CROWN IN THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION—Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster	299
CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY COMMISSION—Question, Mr. Roundell; Answer, Sir William Harcourt	300
CRIMINAL LAW—CONVICT LABOUR—Question, Mr. Broadhurst; Answer, Sir William Harcourt	301
ROYAL PATRIOTIC FUND—THE REPORTS OF 1878 AND 1879—Question, Mr. Gorst; Answer, Mr. Childers	301
POOR LAW (IRELAND)—DISPENSARY HOUSES—Question, Mr. Bellingham; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster	302
NAVY—H.M.S. "ATALANTA"—SUICIDE OF ELLEN HATHAWAY—Question, Captain Price; Answer, Mr. Shaw Lefevre	302
JUDICIAL PENSIONS—SUPERANNUATIONS—Question, Mr. Pugh; Answer, The Attorney General	303
HARES AND RABBITS BILL—POOR RATE—Questions, Mr. Donaldson- Hudson; Answers, Sir William Harcourt	304

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 5.]	Page
TURKISH GUARANTEED LOAN, 1865—Question, Mr. Monk; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke	304
POST OFFICE (MONEY ORDERS) BILL—SPURIOUS POSTAL NOTES—Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, Mr. Fawcett	305
IRELAND—ST. PATRICK'S HOSPITAL, DUBLIN—Question, Mr. W. Corbet; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland	305
LAW AND POLICE—ITALIAN CHILDREN IN ENGLAND—Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Sir William Harcourt	306
THE CONSTABULARY (IRELAND)—FOXFORD, CO. MAYO—Question, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster	307
DISTRESS (IRELAND)—ROAD WORKS, SLIGO CO.—Question, Mr. O'Kelly; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish	308
RAILWAY WORKS (IRELAND)—PRACTICE OF THIS HOUSE IN REGARD TO QUESTIONS—Questions, Mr. Finigan, Mr. Otway, Mr. Parnell, Mr. Callan; Answers, Mr. Speaker, Lord Frederick Cavendish	309
PORTUGAL—COLLISION OF THE "CITY OF MECCA" AND THE "INSULANO"—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke	311
IRELAND—DRAINAGE WORKS, KILLALOE—Question, Sir Patrick O'Brien; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish	312
DISTRESS (IRELAND)—FEVER AT BALLINA—Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster	313
ARMY—RE-ENLISTMENTS—Question, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answer, Mr. Childers	314
COMPENSATION FOR DISTURBANCE (IRELAND) BILL—PROTECTION TO POOR CULTIVATORS—Questions, Mr. O'Donnell, Mr. Parnell; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster	314
AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS—THE ROYAL COMMISSION—Question, Mr. Villiers-Stuart; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster	316
RAILWAYS (IRELAND)—THE GREAT SOUTHERN AND WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY OF IRELAND AND THE WATERFORD AND LIMERICK RAILWAY COMPANY—Questions, Mr. Gibson; Notice of Question, Mr. Callan; Answers, Mr. Chamberlain	316
THE LUNACY LAWS—LEGISLATION—Question, Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh; Answer, Sir William Harcourt	317
AFGHANISTAN—THE WAR—MILITARY EXECUTIONS AT CABUL—Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	317
NAVY—THE ROYAL MARINES—VOLUNTARY RETIREMENT—Question, Colonel Ruggles-Brise; Answer, Mr. Shaw Lefevre	318
THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—EXCLUSION OF CATHOLICS—Questions, Mr. Callan; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster	319
SOUTH AFRICA—BASUTOLAND—Question, Mr. Gibson; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff	320
RULES AND ORDERS OF THIS HOUSE—ALTERATION OF QUESTIONS—Observations, Question, The O'Donoghue; Replies, Mr. Speaker, Mr. W. E. Forster	321
AFGHANISTAN—RE-INFORCEMENTS TO CANDAHAR—Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	322
CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—THE IRISH ESTIMATES—Question, Mr. Parnell; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster	323
PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS AND CORRUPT PRACTICES ACT—CORRUPT PRACTICES IN REPORTED BOROUGHES—COMMISSION OF INQUIRY—Observations, The Attorney General	323
DISTRESS (IRELAND)—EMIGRATION—Question, Mr. Newdegate; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster	323
ARMENIA, ASIA MINOR, AND SYRIA—THE DEBATE—Personal Explanation, Mr. Bourke; Observations, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Lord John Manners	324

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 5.]

Page

MOTION.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS—MOTION—

- Moved*, "That the Orders of the Day subsequent to the Employers' Liability Bill be postponed until after the Notice of Motion relating to the Land Act, 1870 (Commission),"—(The Marquess of Hartington) 330
- After short debate, Amendment proposed, after the word "Bill," to insert the words "with the exception of Order No. 19,"—(Sir Wilfrid Lawson:)—Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted:"—
- After further short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn
- Original Question put, and agreed to.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Employers' Liability (re-committed) Bill [Bill 209]—

- Bill considered in Committee [Progress 4th August] 342
- After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

MOTION.

LAND ACT, 1870 (COMMISSION)—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—

- Moved*, "That an humble Address be presented to the Crown, praying Her Majesty to reconstitute the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the working of the Land Act of 1870, in such a manner as to afford by its composition an adequate representation to the tenant farmers of Ireland,"—(Mr. Justin M'Carthy) 395
- After debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 49, Noes 123 Majority 74.—(Div. List, No. 94.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Spirits Bill [Bill 210]—

- Bill, as amended, considered 428
- Bill to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Drainage Boards (Ireland) (Additional Powers) Bill—

- Order for Committee read 428
- After short debate, Bill considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Expiring Laws Continuance Bill [Bill 297]—

- Moved*, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Lord Frederick Cavendish) 429
- After short debate, Second Reading deferred till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Railway Construction Facilities Act Amendment Bill—

- Bill considered in Committee 429
- After short time spent therein, Bill reported.
- Moved*, "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered,"—(Major Nolan:)—Question put, and agreed to.
- Bill, as amended, considered; to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Drainage and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Provisional Order (No. 4)

- Bill—Ordered (Mr. John Holms, Lord Frederick Cavendish); presented, and read the first time [Bill 301] 430

Law of Ejectment (Ireland) Bill—Ordered (Major Nolan, Mr. A. M. Sullivan, Mr. O'Connor Power); presented, and read the first time [Bill 302] 430

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

LORDS, FRIDAY, AUGUST 6.

Page

Artizans and Labourers Dwellings (Scotland) Provisional Order (Leith) Bill (No. 155)—

House in Committee (according to Order) 431
Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Monday next.

REPORTING IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS—REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE—RESOLUTIONS—Moved to resolve,

“That the newspaper reporters be placed on each side of the Peers’ gallery under the two centre windows, the gallery now used by reporters being appropriated in lieu of the accommodation thus taken,”—(The Earl Beauchamp) 432

After debate, on Question? their Lordships divided; Contents 25, Not-Contents 14; Majority 11.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

List of Contents and Not-Contents 456

COMMONS, FRIDAY, AUGUST 6.

QUESTIONS.

—o—o—o—

RELIEF OF DISTRESS (IRELAND) ACT—APPLICATION OF LOANS—Questions, Mr. Dillon, Mr. Molloy, Mr. A. M. Sullivan, Mr. T. P. O’Connor; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster 457

NAVY—NAVIGATING OFFICERS—Question, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answer, Mr. Shaw Lefevre 459

JAPAN—INTERFERENCE WITH CHEMICAL TRADES—Question, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke 459

TREATY OF BERLIN—THE CONFERENCE—THE COLLECTIVE NOTE—Questions, Lord Randolph Churchill, Mr. Bourke, Mr. A. J. Balfour; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke 460

INDIA (FINANCE, &c.)—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—Question, Mr. Birley; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington 461

AFFAIRS IN TURKEY—THE INDIAN MAHOMEDANS—AFGHANISTAN—THE MILITARY POSITION—Questions, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington 462

STATE OF IRELAND—Questions, Mr. O’Connor Power; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster 464

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS—Questions, Mr. A. J. Balfour, Mr. Parnell; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington 465

ORDER OF THE DAY.

—o—o—o—

Employers’ Liability (re-committed) Bill [Bill 209]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 5th August] 466

After long time spent therein, it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Chairman reported Progress; Committee to sit again this day.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS—Observations, Lord Frederick Cavendish; Question, Sir Henry Jackson; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington 521

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 6.]

Page

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair :”—
SLAUGHTER OF IMPORTED CATTLE—RESOLUTION—Amendment proposed, To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “in the opinion of this House, the compulsory slaughter, at the ports of landing, of fat stock from the United States of America, restricts the supply and increases the cost of food, and, having regard to the freedom from disease of the stock-producing States of America, this House deems it desirable that Her Ma- jesty’s Government should consider these restrictions with a view to their modifi- cation or removal,”—(Mr. Arthur Arnold,)—instead thereof	522
Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :”—After long debate, Question put :—The House divided ; Ayes 194, Noes 20; Majority 174.—(Div. List, No. 97.)
Question again proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair” After short debate, Motion, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,” by leave, withdrawn :—Committee upon Monday next.	564
Employers’ Liability (re-committed) Bill [Bill 209]— Order for Committee read [Progress 6th August]	565
Moved , “That the House will, To-morrow, resolve itself into the said Com- mittee,”—(The Marquess of Hartington :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn :—Bill considered in Committee. After long time spent therein, Bill reported ; as amended, to be considered upon Wednesday next, and to be printed [Bill 303.]
Assaults on Young Persons Bill—Ordered (Mr. Hopwood, Colonel Alexander); pre- sented , and read the first time [Bill 304]	596
Bastardy Orders Bill—Ordered (Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Dodson); presented , and read the first time [Bill 305]	596

LORDS, MONDAY, AUGUST 9.

AFGHANISTAN (MILITARY OPERATIONS)—THE LATEST TELEGRAM—Questions, The Duke of Somerset, Lord Ellenborough; Answers, Earl Granville	596
COMPENSATION FOR DISTURBANCE (IRELAND) BILL—THE ULSTER TENANT RIGHT—Explanation, The Earl of Redesdale	597
TURKEY—RUMOURED NAVAL DEMONSTRATION—Question, Observations, Lord Stanley of Alderley; Reply, Earl Granville; Observations, Lord Stratheden and Campbell	597
DISTRESS (IRELAND)—ASSISTED EMIGRATION—Observations, The Earl of Dunraven; Reply, The Earl of Kimberley :—Short debate thereon ..	605
Lord Plunket’s Indemnity Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Lord Chancellor); read 1 st	618

COMMONS, MONDAY, AUGUST 9.

QUESTIONS.

RULES AND ORDERS—PETITIONS—REFERENCE TO THE OTHER HOUSE OF PARLIAMENT—Petitions presented, Mr. T. P. O’Connor; Question, Mr. Warton; Answer, Mr. Speaker	619
COURTS OF LAW (SCOTLAND)—PAYMENT OF FEES BY STAMPS—Question, General Sir George Balfour; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish ..	620
PRISONS ACT, 1877—PRISON LABOUR—COMPETITION WITH TRADES AND MANUFACTURES—Question, Mr. Serjeant Simon; Answer, Sir William Harcourt	620

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 9.]	Page
BRIDGES (IRELAND)—RE-NAMING OF CARLISLE BRIDGE, DUBLIN—Questions, Mr. Dawson; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster	621
THE LATE REGISTRAR GENERAL—RETURN ON MORTALITY (GENERAL AND INFANT)—THE NOTE—Question, Mr. Hopwood; Answer, Mr. Dodson ..	622
PUBLIC HEALTH—UNWHOLESOME MEAT—CASE OF GEORGE LAMB—Questions, Mr. Ritchie; Answers, Sir William Harcourt	623
SCIENCE AND ART—SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM—DUPLICATE OBJECTS OF ART—THE LIST AND RETURN—Question, Mr. Leeman; Answer, Mr. Mundella	623
SCIENCE AND ART—SALE OF DUPLICATES FROM THE NATIONAL COLLECTIONS—Question, Mr. Leeman; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish ..	625
THE ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS—ESTATE AT SEDGEFORD—Question, Mr. Monk; Answer, Mr. Evelyn Ashley	626
POST OFFICE—THE PROPOSED SMALL PARCELS POST—Question, Sir John Hay; Answer, Mr. Fawcett	626
LAW AND POLICE (METROPOLIS)—POLICE CONSTABLE HORSFORD—Question, Mr. Carington; Answer, Sir William Harcourt	627
PARLIAMENT—THE BUSINESS HOURS OF THIS HOUSE — Question, Mr. Broadhurst; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	628
CENSUS (IRELAND) 1881—EMPLOYMENT OF CONSTABULARY—Questions, Mr. W. Corbet, Mr. Sexton; Answers, Lord Frederick Cavendish, Mr. W. E. Forster	628
LAW AND POLICE—THE LICHFIELD ELECTION—Question, Mr. Jesse Collings; Answer, Sir William Harcourt	630
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT, 1878 — PHOENIX PARK, DUBLIN—Question, Mr. Ion Hamilton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster	631
TREATY OF BERLIN—MOBILIZATION OF THE GREEK ARMY—Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke	632
HACKNEY CARRIAGES (METROPOLIS)—THE FOUR-MILE RADIUS—Question, Mr. Macfarlane; Answer, Sir William Harcourt	632
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—APPOINTMENT OF SCHOOL INSPECTORS—Question, Mr. Firth; Answer, Mr. Mundella	633
AFGHANISTAN—WITHDRAWAL OF THE TROOPS FROM CABUL—Questions, Mr. E. Stanhope, Sir Alexander Gordon, Sir Henry Tyler, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, Mr. Onslow, Mr. Otway; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington	633
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT, 1878—CATTLE FROM THE UNITED STATES—Question, Mr. Bourke; Answer, Mr. Mundella	637
CRIME (IRELAND)—ASSASSINATION AT NEW ROSS—Questions, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster	637
LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND)—SUPERANNUATION OF OFFICERS AND SERVANTS—Question, Mr. W. Corbet; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster	638
PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—Questions, Mr. Newdegate, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Hinde Palmer, Mr. Gorst, Mr. W. Holms, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, Mr. Beresford Hope, Sir George Campbell, Mr. O'Donnell, Lord Randolph Churchill, Mr. Onslow; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington, Sir William Harcourt	639

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—o—o—

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART.

(1.) £58,257, to complete the sum for the British Museum.—After long debate, Vote agreed to	646
---	-----

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 9.]

Page

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Committee—continued.

CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS.

- (2.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £12,836, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for erecting and maintaining new Buildings, including Rents, &c., for the Department of Science and Art" .. 675
- Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £10,836, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Rylands:)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
- Original Question again proposed .. 683
- After short debate, Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (3.) £6,660, to complete the sum for Lighthouses Abroad.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 688
- (4.) £13,717, to complete the sum for Diplomatic and Consular Buildings.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 690

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS.

- (5.) £11,748, to complete the sum for the Board of Supervision for Relief of the Poor, and for Public Health, Scotland.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 694

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

- (6.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £102,416, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for such of the Salaries and Expenses of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, of the Court of Appeal, and of the Supreme Court of Judicature (exclusive of the Central Office), as are not charged on the Consolidated Fund" .. 694
- Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £95,616, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Rylands:)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
- Original Question again proposed .. 700
- After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £100,816, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor:)—After further short debate, Question put, and agreed to.
- (7.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £63,996, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Central Office of the Supreme Court of Judicature; the Salaries and Expenses of the Judges' Clerks and other Officers of the District Registrars of the High Court; the remuneration of the Judges' Marshals; and certain Circuit Expenses" .. 702
- Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £61,256, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Thompson:)—After short debate, Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 36, Noes 115; Majority 79.—(Div. List, No. 99.)
- Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (8.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £58,115, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Registries of Probates, and Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, &c. in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice" .. 706
- Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £57,929, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor:)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
- After further short debate, Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (9.) £6,945, to complete the sum for Admiralty Registry of the High Court of Justice.
- (10.) £8,466, to complete the sum for Wreck Commission.
- (11.) £22,834, to complete the sum for London Bankruptcy Court.
- (12.) £285,281, to complete the sum for County Courts.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 708
- (13.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £3,328, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Land Registry" .. 709
- Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £2,328, be granted, &c."—(Sir Walter B. Barttelot:)—After debate, Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 39, Noes 141; Majority 102.—(Div. List, No. 100.)
- Original Question put, and agreed to.
- (14.) £18,690, Revising Barristers, England.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 9.]	Page
SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Committee—continued.
(15.) £9,501, to complete the sum for the Police Courts, London and Sheerness.— After short debate, Vote agreed to	725
(16.) £226,705, to complete the sum for the Metropolitan Police.—After short debate, Vote agreed to	727
(17.) £897,248, to complete the sum for the County and Borough Police.—After short debate, Vote agreed to	729
Moved , "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Finigan :)—Question put:—The Committee divided ; Ayes 7, Noes 133; Majority 126.—(Div. List, No. 101.)
(18.) £263,697, to complete the sum for Convict Establishments in England and the Colonies.—After short debate, Vote agreed to	737
Resolutions to be reported To-morrow , at Two of the clock; Committee to sit again upon Wednesday .

Census (Ireland) Bill [Lords] [Bill 284]—
Bill considered in Committee	747
After short time spent therein, Bill reported ; as amended, to be con- sidered To-morrow , at Two of the clock.

Census (Scotland) Bill [Lords] [Bill 286]—
Bill considered in Committee	755
After short time spent therein, Bill reported ; as amended, to be considered To-morrow , at Two of the clock.

WAYS AND MEANS—

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the service of the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, the sum of £10,818,274 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom.
Resolution to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock; Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

LORDS, TUESDAY, AUGUST 10.

REPORTING IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS—REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE —RESOLUTIONS—Question, Observations, The Earl of Redesdale:— Short debate thereon	756
AFGHANISTAN—MILITARY OPERATIONS—THE DEFEAT BEFORE CANDAHAR— Questions, Observations, Lord Dorchester; Reply, The Earl of Morley : —Short debate thereon	758
ARMY—LORD STRATHNAIRN'S NOTICES—Observations, The Duke of Somerset; Reply, Lord Strathnairn	763

COMMONS, TUESDAY, AUGUST 10.

QUESTIONS.

CRIMINAL LAW—ASSAULTS UPON CHILDREN—Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor; Answer, Sir William Harcourt	765
POST OFFICE—THE AUSTRALIAN MAILS—THE RETURNS—Question, Mr. Cheetham; Answer, Mr. Fawcett	765
DISTRESS (IRELAND)—ASSISTED EMIGRATION—Question, Mr. Newdegate; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster	767
POOR LAW (IRELAND)—SUPERANNUATION OF MEDICAL OFFICERS—Question, Mr. Meldon; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster	767
POST OFFICE (SCOTLAND)—POSTMASTER OF INVERARY—Question, Sir Herbert Maxwell; Answer, Mr. Fawcett	768

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 10.]	Page
AFGHANISTAN (MILITARY OPERATIONS)—WITHDRAWAL OF BRITISH TROOPS— THE SHEERPUR CAMP—Question, Sir William Palliser; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	769
Moved , "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Sir William Palliser :)— After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .
ARMY RESERVE PENSIONS—Question, Colonel Colthurst; Answer, Mr. Childers	776
PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—THE MACMAHON TELEGRAPH—Question, Mr. Montague Guest; Answer, Mr. Adam	777
DISTURBANCES (IRELAND)—THE CONSTABULARY—Questions, Mr. Dillon, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answers, The Solicitor General for Ireland	777
IRELAND—THE HOME RULE MEMBERS—Question, Mr. Tottenham; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	779
TREATY OF BERLIN—TURKEY AND MONTENEGRO—Question, Mr. Bourke; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke	779
PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—Question, Observations, Mr. Chaplin	780
Moved , "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Chaplin :)—After debate, Question put:—The House divided ; Ayes 23, Noes 236; Majority 213.—(Div. List, No. 103.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Hares and Rabbits Bill [Bill 194]—
Order for Committee read	798
Moved , "That it be an Instruction to the Committee, that they have power to extend the provisions of the Bill to all game,"—(Mr. Labouchere .)
After short debate, it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till this day .
Census (Scotland) Bill [Lords] [Bill 286]—
Order for Consideration, as amended, read	820
After short debate, Consideration, as amended, deferred till this day .
The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.
—————
The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Hares and Rabbits Bill [Bill 194]—
Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [10th August], "That it be an Instruction to the Committee, that they have power to extend the provi- sions of the Bill to all game,"—(Mr. Labouchere .)
Question again proposed :—Debate resumed	821
After short debate, Question put :—The House divided ; Ayes 12, Noes 169; Majority 157.—(Div. List, No. 104.)
Moved , "That it be an Instruction to the Committee, that they have power to make pro- visions to restrict the buying and selling of eggs of game,"—(Mr. Hicks)	826
After short debate, Question put, and negatived .
Moved , "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,"—(Sir William Harcourt :)—After debate, Question put, and agreed to :—Bill considered in Committee	849
After short time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow .

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 10.]	Page
Census Bill [Lords] [Bill 285]—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Dodson) ..	861
Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Arthur Balfour :)
After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .
Main Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and com- mitted for Friday , at Two of the clock.
Census (Scotland) Bill [Lords] [Bill 286]—
Moved , "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration,"—(Mr. Arthur Peel) ..	864
After debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill, as amended, considered ; to be read the third time upon Friday , at two of the clock.
SUPPLY—REPORT—Resolutions [9th August] reported ..	872
Moved , "That the said Resolutions be read a second time."
Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Sir John Hay :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .
Main Question put, and agreed to :—First Five Resolutions agreed to .
Sixth Resolution.
Moved , "That the Resolution be re-committed,"—(Lord Frederick Caven- dish :)—Motion agreed to :—Sixth Resolution re-committed to the Com- mittee of Supply.
Subsequent Resolutions agreed to .
WAYS AND MEANS—
Consolidated Fund (No. 2) Bill—
Resolutions [August 9] reported , and agreed to :—Bill ordered (Mr. Playfair, Lord Frederick Cavendish, Mr. John Holms); presented , and read the first time ..	873

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 11.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS—BOROUGH OF SANDWICH ELECTION—
Judges' Certificate and Report read	874

QUESTIONS.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS—THE "MARLBOROUGH"—
Question, Mr. J. W. Barclay ; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain	875
PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—
Question, Lord Eustace Cecil ; Answer, Sir William Harcourt	876

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Hares and Rabbits Bill [Bill 194]—
Bill considered in Committee [Progress 10th August]	877
After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday .

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.
(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

Resolved, That, in addition to the sum of £100,816 already granted to Her Majesty to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for such of the Salaries and Expenses of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, of the Court

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 11.]

Page

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Committee—continued.

of Appeal, and of the Supreme Court of Judicature (exclusive of the Central Office) as are not charged on the Consolidated Fund, the sum of £100 be granted as an Allowance to the Gentleman of the Chamber to the Lord Chancellor, for discharging the duties of Purse-bearer, making together the sum of £100,916.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again upon Friday.

Post Office Savings Banks Bill—Ordered (Mr. Harcourt, Mr. Stanhope, Mr. Brand); presented, and read the first time [Bill 309] 952

LORDS, THURSDAY, AUGUST 12.

REPORTING IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS—REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE —Motion for an Address, Lord Sudeley 953

After short debate.

Moved, "That until the end of the Session the reporters be provided with temporary accommodation on each side of the Peers Gallery under the two centre windows,"—
(The Lord Sudeley.)

On Question? Resolved in the Affirmative.

AFGHANISTAN—CANDAHAR—Question, Observations, The Earl of Camperdown, Lord Stanley of Alderley; Reply, Earl Granville 957

ARMY—CONDITION OF REGIMENTS EMBARKING FOR SERVICE IN INDIA— MOTION FOR A RETURN—

Moved for "Return of the non-commissioned officers and privates of 1st-23rd, 77th, and 1st-R.B., as they embark for active service for India, showing ages, length of service, and number who have not completed their drill and musketry instruction; also, number drawn to complete for service from other regiments, in a classified tabular form; also, similar Return respecting the 2nd-24th, 61st, and 98th, going to India from the Mediterranean; and also, similar Return respecting the 26th, 38th, and 41st as they embark for the Mediterranean to relieve; also for the Report of the General commanding the brigade marching a few years since from Aldershot to Windsor when a collapse of the brigade, owing to tender age and physical debility, took place on the high road between those two places; with a report of the General-commanding and of the responsible medical officer,"—(The Lord Strathnairn) 960

After short debate, Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

COMMONS, THURSDAY, AUGUST 12.

QUESTIONS.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—BAUNBOY UNION, Co. CAVAN—Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster 966

ROAD REPAIRS (IRELAND)—Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster 966

THE INDIAN MEDICAL SERVICE—Question, Mr. Pugh; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington 966

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—CORN RETURNS BILL—Question, Mr. Duckham; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain 967

CONFERENCE OF BERLIN—GUARANTEE OF TURKISH TERRITORY—Questions, Mr. Otway, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke 968

TURKEY—RUMOURED NAVAL DEMONSTRATION—Question, Mr. Otway; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke 968

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—CASTLEBAR UNION—OUT-DOOR RELIEF—Question, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster 969

PRISONS (IRELAND) ACT—PRISON REGULATIONS—CASTLEBAR GAOL—Question, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster 970

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 12.]	Page
LAW AND JUSTICE—THE PRISONS SERVICE (ENGLAND AND IRELAND)—Question, Mr. William Corbet; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish ..	970
NAVY—MAJORS OF MARINES—Question, Mr. Gabbett; Answer, Mr. Shaw Lefevre ..	972
STREET AND ROAD TRAMWAYS—THE RETURN—Question, Mr. Whitworth; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain ..	973
STATISTICS (IRELAND)—POTATO DISEASE—Question, Major Nolan; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster ..	973
EASTERN SEAS—THE ISLANDS OF SAMOA—Question, Mr. A. M'Arthur; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke ..	974
THE COMMISSION ON BOUNDARIES OF CITIES AND TOWNS (IRELAND)—Question, Mr. Corry; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster ..	974
ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—THE WORCESTERSHIRE MILITIA — Question, Sir Edmund Lechmere; Answer, Mr. Childers ..	974
DOMINION OF CANADA—THE "SCOTT TEMPERANCE ACT, 1878"—Question, Sir Alexander Gordon; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff ..	975
AFGHANISTAN—DEFEAT OF GENERAL BURROWS'S FORCE — THE NATIVE INDIAN REGIMENTS—Questions, Sir Henry Havelock-Allan, Sir George Campbell; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington ..	975
ARMY—REGIMENTAL COLOURS—Question, Sir Alexander Gordon; Answer, Mr. Childers ..	976
THE PATENT OFFICE MUSEUM—Question, Mr. Hinde Palmer; Answer, Mr. Adam ..	976
RAILWAYS (IRELAND)—THE GREAT SOUTHERN AND WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY OF IRELAND AND THE WATERFORD AND LIMERICK RAILWAY COMPANY—THE LIMERICK JUNCTION—Questions, Mr. E. Stanhope, Mr. Gibson; Answers, Mr. Chamberlain ..	977
PUBLIC WORKS LOANS ACT—LOANS BY LOCAL BODIES — Question, Mr. Dawson; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish ..	978
FIJI — THE COOLIE SHIP "LEONIDAS" — Question, Mr. Alderman W. M'Arthur; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff ..	979
REVENUE OF CUSTOMS FOR 1879—Question, Mr. Meldon; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish ..	979
AFGHANISTAN—MILITARY OPERATIONS—THE LATEST TELEGRAMS—Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington ..	980
ROYAL COLLEGE OF SCIENCE AND ART (DUBLIN)—ATTENDANCE—Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. Mundella ..	981
ARMY—SURGEONS MAJOR OF HOUSEHOLD CAVALRY—Question, Captain Milne Home; Answer, Mr. Childers ..	981
THE WAR DEPARTMENT—THE PIMLICO FACTORY—Question, Sir Charles Russell; Answer, Mr. Childers ..	982
STATE OF IRELAND—ATTACK ON THE POLICE AT LOUGHREA—Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster ..	983
TREATY OF BERLIN—MONTENEGRO AND TURKEY—CESSION OF DULCIGNO—Question, Mr. Bourke; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke ..	984
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT, 1878—IMPORTATION OF AMERICAN CATTLE—Questions, Mr. J. W. Barclay, Mr. Arthur Arnold; Answers, Mr. Mundella ..	984
ARMY—RIDING MASTERS—Question, Captain Milne Home; Answer, Mr. Childers ..	985
PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE — Questions, Major Nolan, Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Sir George Campbell, Lord Randolph Churchill; Answers, Lord Frederick Cavendish, The Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Shaw Lefevre ..	985
IRELAND—SEIZURE OF ARMS AT CORK—Question, Sir Patrick O'Brien; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster ..	987
AFGHANISTAN—THE EVACUATION OF CABUL—Question, Mr. A. J. Balfour; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington ..	987
POOR LAW—SEPARATION OF AGED MARRIED PAUPERS IN WORKHOUSES—Question, Mr. A. M. Sullivan; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster ..	988

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 12.]

Page

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Burials Bill [Lords] [Bill 248]—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Osborne Morgan) .. 989

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months,"—(Mr. Beresford Hope.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question :"—After long debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 258, Noes 79; Majority 179.

Division List, Ayes and Noes .. 1068

Main Question put, and agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

Post Office (Money Orders) Bill [Bill 172]—

Bill considered in Committee .. 1071

After some time spent therein, Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

County Courts Jurisdiction in Lunacy (Ireland) Bill [Lords]

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland) .. 1081

Motion agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

Assaults on Young Persons Bill [Bill 304]—

Bill considered in Committee .. 1082

After short time spent therein, Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

LORDS, FRIDAY, AUGUST 13.

Railways Construction Facilities Act (1864) Amendment Bill (No. 180)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Earl of Cork and Orrery) .. 1087

After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Elementary Education Bill (No. 106)—

Commons Amendments considered (according to Order) .. 1088

Commons Amendments agreed to.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE SESSION — Question, Observations, The Earl of Redesdale; Reply, Earl Granville:—Short debate thereon .. 1089

COMMONS, FRIDAY, AUGUST 13.

QUESTIONS.

IRISH CHURCH TEMPORALITIES COMMISSIONERS—THE TRUSTEES OF ST.

CATHERINE'S PARISH, DUBLIN—Question, Mr. William Corbet; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland .. 1093

HOSPITALS AND INFIRMARIES (IRELAND)—Question, Mr. William Corbet;

Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish .. 1095

COMMISSIONERS OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—SPECIAL EXTRA SUB-JECTS—THE IRISH LANGUAGE—Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster .. 1096

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 18.]	Page
THE BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND)—Question, Mr. Dawson; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish ..	1096
FOREIGN GAME LAWS—Question, Mr. Bryce; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke ..	1097
MERCANTILE MARINE—LIGHTHOUSES AT THE ENTRANCE TO THE RED SEA—Question, Sir John Hay; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain ..	1097
AGRICULTURE—INSURANCE OF CROPS—Question, Sir Eardley Wilmot; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain ..	1097
AFGHANISTAN—MILITARY OPERATIONS—THE MARCH OF GENERAL ROBERTS—Questions, Mr. Onslow, Sir Henry Tyler, Sir William Palliser, Lord Randolph Churchill; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington ..	1098
NEWFOUNDLAND—MINING RIGHTS—Question, Captain Aylmer; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff ..	1101
AFGHANISTAN—BRITISH RESIDENT AT CABUL—Question, Sir Henry Tyler; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington ..	1101
MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—LEGISLATION—Question, Mr. Hanbury-Tracy; Answer, Mr. Arthur Peel ..	1101
THE BRITISH MUSEUM—THE NEW BUILDING—Question, Captain Aylmer; Answer, Mr. Adam ..	1102
ARMY (INDIA)—CAPTAIN CHATTERTON—Question, Captain Aylmer; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington ..	1102
RAILWAYS—CONTINUOUS BRAKES—Question, Mr. Lea; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain ..	1103
IRELAND—THE ROBBERY OF ARMS IN CORK HARBOUR—Question, Colonel Makins; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster ..	1103

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Employers' Liability Bill [Bill 303]—

Moved, "That the Bill, as amended, be now taken into Consideration,"
—(Mr. Dodson) .. 1104

After short debate, Question put, and agreed to:—Bill, as amended, considered.

After debate, it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, further Proceeding on Consideration, as amended, stood adjourned till this day.

It being now five minutes to Seven of the clock, House suspended its Sitting.

House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:"—

FEVER IN THE WEST OF IRELAND—RESOLUTION—
Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the present condition of the agricultural population in Mayo, Sligo, and other parts of the west of Ireland, demands the serious and immediate attention of Her Majesty's Government; that effective sanitary arrangements should be carried out in those districts under the authority of the Local Government Board; that it is essential, with a view to preventing the spread of contagious disease, that a change of nutritious food should be given to all persons receiving relief under the Poor Law, or under the system substituted for the Poor Law in certain localities, and that a competent medical staff should be organized without delay, and distributed over those parts of the country visited by fever,"—
(Mr. O'Connor Power,)—instead thereof .. 1129

807

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 13.]	Page
SUPPLY—Order for Committee read— continued .
Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn .
Amendment proposed,
To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the present condition of the agricultural population in Mayo, Sligo, Galway, and other parts of the West of Ireland, demands the serious and immediate attention of Her Majesty's Government,"—(Mr. O' Connor Power ,)—instead thereof.
Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived .
Words added :—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to .
SUPPLY—Committee upon Monday next.
Employers' Liability Bill [Bill 303]—
Further Proceeding on Consideration, as amended, resumed	.. 1156
After long debate, Bill to be read the third time upon Monday next.
EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS—
Ordered , That the several Accounts and Papers which have been presented to the House in this Session of Parliament relating to the Revenues of India be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the whole House,—(Lord Frederick Cavendish .)
Committee thereupon upon Tuesday next, at Two of the clock.

LORDS, MONDAY, AUGUST 16.

TREATY OF BERLIN—THE GREEK FRONTIER—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—
Moved , That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for any diplomatic correspondence which has passed with foreign powers on the subject of a naval demonstration to effect a change of frontier between Greece and the Ottoman Empire,—(The Lord Stratheden and Campbell) 1194
After short debate, Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn .
Fraudulent Debtors (Scotland) Bill (No. 193)—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read 2 ^a ,"—(The Lord Chancellor) 1197 Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 ^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow .
LORD PLUNKET'S INDEMNITY BILL—Question, Observations, Lord Bray; Reply, The Lord Chancellor :—Short debate thereon
	.. 1198
WATER SUPPLY (METROPOLIS)—Question, Observations, Earl Fortescue; Reply, The Earl of Fife
	.. 1200

COMMONS, MONDAY, AUGUST 16.

QUESTIONS.

PETTY SESSIONS FINES IN IRELAND—Question, Mr. Dawson; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster 1207
THE ECLESIASTICAL COMMISSION—Question, Mr. Arthur Arnold; Answer, Mr. Evelyn Ashley 1207
UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1879—SCHEME OF THE SENATE—Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster 1208
LAW AND JUSTICE—OBJECTING TO SWEAR OR AFFIRM—Question, Sir Henry Peak; Answer, Sir William Harcourt 1208
REPRESENTATIVE ASSEMBLIES (FOREIGN)—Question, Mr. Thomasson; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke 1208
VOL. COLV. [THIRD SERIES.] [d]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 16.]	Page
STATISTICAL ABSTRACT FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM—EDUCATIONAL STATISTICS—Questions, Mr. William Corbet; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster, Mr. Chamberlain ..	1209
RAILWAY ACCIDENTS—PROPOSED REGULATIONS AS TO FAST AND EXPRESS TRAINS—Question, Mr. Macfarlane; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain ..	1211
LOWER THAMES VALLEY DRAINAGE SCHEME—REPORT OF THE INSPECTOR—Questions, Mr. Brodrick, Mr. Warton; Answers, Mr. Dodson ..	1211
IRELAND—CARLISLE BRIDGE, DUBLIN—Question, Mr. Dawson; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster ..	1212
IRELAND—TROOPS AND CONSTABULARY—Questions, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster ..	1213
ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—PROMOTION IN THE HIGHER GRADES—Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster ..	1213
IRELAND—REPORTED DISTURBANCE AT LOUGHREA—Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster ..	1214
TREATY OF BERLIN—THE SLAVE TRADE IN TURKEY—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke ..	1214
NORTH BORNEO COMPANY—GRANT OF CHARTER—Question, Mr. Whitwell; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke ..	1215
CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS—COMMISSION OF INQUIRY—Questions, Sir George Campbell, Mr. S. Leighton; Answers, The Attorney General ..	1215
PARLIAMENT—AFGHANISTAN—MILITARY OPERATIONS—GENERAL ROBERTS'S MARCH—Questions, Mr. Gorst, Sir Walter B. Bartelott, Mr. J. Cowen, Mr. S. Leighton; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington ..	1215
AFGHANISTAN—MILITARY OPERATIONS—Questions, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington ..	1217
SCIENCE AND ART—THE ASHBURNHAM COLLECTION—Question, Mr. Dawson; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish ..	1219
CIVIL SERVICE (INDIA)—Question, Mr. Gibson; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington ..	1219
PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—Questions, Mr. W. H. Smith, Lord Randolph Churchill, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Magniac; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington ..	1220
PARLIAMENTARY REPORTING—ENLARGEMENT OF REPORTERS GALLERY—Questions, Mr. Hutchinson, Mr. J. Cowen; Answers, Mr. Adam ..	1222
HOUSE OF COMMONS—THE LIBRARY—Question, Sir Alexander Gordon; Answer, Mr. Adam ..	1223
EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL—Question, Mr. Gorst; Answer, The Attorney General ..	1223
POOR LAW (IRELAND)—Questions, Mr. A. M. Sullivan; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster ..	1224
LAW AND POLICE—BURGLARY IN DORSETSHIRE—Question, Mr. A. M. Sullivan; Answer, Sir William Harcourt ..	1225

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—•••—

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—
(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

- | | |
|---|------|
| (1.) £289,731, to complete the sum for Prisons, England.—After long debate, Vote agreed to .. | 1225 |
| (2.) £130,616, to complete the sum for Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Great Britain. .. | |
| (3.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £16,051, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for the Maintenance of Criminal Lunatics in the Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, England, and of one Criminal Lunatic in Bethlem Hospital" .. | 1262 |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 16.]

Page

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Committee—continued.

After debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £15,651, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Biggar :)—After further short debate, Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) £41,730, to complete the sum for the Lord Advocate and Criminal Proceedings.—After debate, Vote agreed to .. 1274

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £38,755, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Courts of Law and Justice in Scotland, and other Legal Charges" .. 1281

After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £38,710, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed .. 1297

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £38,665, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Finigan :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(6.) £22,650, to complete the sum for the Register House Departments, Edinburgh.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 1305

(7.) £50,787, to complete the sum for Prisons, Scotland.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 1307

CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART.

(8.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £7,050, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for Grants in Aid of the Expenditure of certain Learned Societies in Great Britain and Ireland" .. 1309

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £6,050, be granted, &c."—(Mr. A. M. Sullivan :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

After further short debate, Vote agreed to.

(9.) £8,726, to complete the sum for the London University.—Vote agreed to .. 1315

(10.) £2,700, to complete the sum for the Deep Sea Exploring Expedition (Report).—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 1318

(11.) £1,220, to complete the sum for the Sydney and Melbourne International Exhibitions.

(12.) £11,519, to complete the sum for Universities, &c. in Scotland.

(13.) £1,200, to complete the sum for the National Gallery, &c., Scotland.

CLASS V.—COLONIAL, CONSULAR, AND OTHER FOREIGN SERVICES.

(14.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £115,910, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for the Expenses of Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions Abroad" .. 1319

After short debate, Moved, "That the Chairman do now report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Lord Randolph Churchill :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed .. 1327

After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £115,910, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Biggar :)—After further short debate, Question put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed .. 1330

After short debate, Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

Moved, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Gorst :)—After short debate, Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 17, Noes 83; Majority 66.—(Div. List, No. 117.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £155,667, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for the Expense of the Consular Establishments Abroad, and for other Expenditure chargeable on the Consular Vote" .. 1340

Moved, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair,"—(Mr. Thornhill :)—After short debate, Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 17, Noes 75; Majority 58.—(Div. List, No. 118.)

Moved, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Lord Randolph Churchill :)—Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock; Committee also report Progress; to sit again upon Wednesday.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 16.]	Page
Post Office (Money Orders) Bill [Bill 172]—
Further Proceeding on Consideration, as amended, resumed ..	1350
Moved , "That the Bill be now read the third time,"—(Mr. Fawcett :)— Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read the third time accordingly, and passed .
—
Ground Game Bill—Ordered (Lord Elcho, Mr. Puleston); presented, and read the first time [Bill 312]	1351

LORDS, TUESDAY, AUGUST 17.

RAILWAYS—CONTINUOUS BRAKES—CIRCULAR OF THE BOARD OF TRADE—
Question, Earl De La Warr; Answer, Lord Sudeley ..	1352
PARLIAMENT — PUBLIC BUSINESS — Observations, Question, The Earl of Redesdale; Answer, Earl Granville ..	1353
Railways Construction Facilities Act (1864) Amendment Bill (No. 196)—
Amendments reported (according to Order) ..	1354
Amendment made; and Bill to be read 3 ^d on Thursday next.
MALTA— Question, Observations, Earl De La Warr; Reply, The Earl of Kimberley ..	1355
INDIA—THE GOVERNORSHIP OF MADRAS— Question, Observations, The Earl of Camperdown, Lord Stanley of Alderley; Reply, The Earl of Northbrook; Observations, Lord Ellenborough ..	1355
PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—
Ordered, That on and after Friday next the Bills which are entered for consideration on the Minutes of the day shall have the same precedence which Bills have on Tuesdays and Thursdays,—(The Earl of Redesdale .)

COMMONS, TUESDAY, AUGUST 17.

QUESTIONS.

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE OF FREETHINKERS— Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, Sir William Harcourt ..	1363
TURKEY—NAVIGATION OF THE RED SEA— Question, Mr. Arthur Arnold; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke ..	1364
SOUTH AFRICA—CONSTITUTION OF NATAL— Question, Sir Henry Holland; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff ..	1365
CRIMINAL LAW—THE LICHFIELD ELECTION ASSAULT CASE — Question, Mr. Jesse Collings; Answer, Sir William Harcourt ..	1365
INDIA—THE MAHARAJAH DULEEP SING— Question, Mr. Bradlaugh, Answer, The Marquess of Hartington ..	1366
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT—CATTLE DISEASE — Question, Mr. Arthur Arnold; Answer, Mr. Mundella ..	1367
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)—THE STEAMER "IOWA"—TEXAN FEVER — Questions, Mr. Whitley; Answers, Mr. Mundella ..	1367
CROWN RIGHTS TO THE FORESHORE—SKERRIES (IRELAND)— Question, Mr. W. Corbet; Answer, The Solicitor General for Ireland ..	1368
EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL— Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, Mr. Mundella ..	1370
AFGHANISTAN—MILITARY OPERATIONS—THE ADVANCE OF GENERAL BURROWS— Questions, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington ..	1370

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 17.]

Page

STATE OF IRELAND—Questions, Sir Walter B. Barttelot, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, Mr. J. Cowen; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster, Sir Walter B. Barttelot	1871
CRIME (IRELAND)—RIOTING AT DUNGANNON—FIRING ON THE PEOPLE BY ROYAL CONSTABULARY AND LOSS OF LIFE—Questions, Mr. Sexton, Mr. W. Corbet; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster	1875
INDIA—LAND LAW ADMINISTRATION OF BEHAR—Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	1877
INDIAN ORDNANCE CORPS—RETIRED OFFICERS—Question, Lord Elcho; Answer, Mr. Childers	1878

ORDER OF THE DAY.

—o—o—o—

INDIA (FINANCE, &C.)—EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS—FINANCIAL STATEMENT—

Order for Committee read:—Moved, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,”—(The Marquess of Hartington) .. 1379

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “the public expenditure in India and the charges on the Indian Revenues defrayed in England are excessive; and that, in the interests of the people in India, it is desirable to effect a prompt and large diminution of such expenditure,”—(Mr. Otway,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—After long debate, Moved, “That the Debate be now adjourned,”—(Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett:)—Motion agreed to:—Debate adjourned till this day.

The House suspended its Sitting at ten minutes before Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

—o—o—o—

INDIA (FINANCE, &C.)—EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS—FINANCIAL STATEMENT—

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [17th August], “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”

—Question again proposed:—Debate resumed .. 1434

After long debate, Moved, “That the Debate be now adjourned,”—(Sir George Balfour:)—After further short debate, Question put, and agreed to:—Debate further adjourned till Tuesday next.

Summary Jurisdiction (Ireland) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Errington, Sir Patrick O'Brien); presented, and read the first time [Bill 313] .. 1477

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 18.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—o—o—

Employers' Liability Bill [Bill 311]—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read the third time,”—(Mr. Dodson) .. 1478

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “this House is of opinion that the workmen employed in Her Majesty's

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 18.]

Page

Employers' Liability Bill—continued.

arsenals and dockyards ought to have rights conferred upon them in reference to injuries received in their employment similar to those which are conferred by this Bill upon all other workmen throughout the United Kingdom,"—(Mr. Gorst)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After debate, Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to:—Bill read the third time, and passed.

Savings Banks (No. 1) (re-committed) Bill [Bill 273]—

Order for Committee read:—Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:"—Question put, and agreed to:—Bill considered in Committee .. 1498

After long time spent therein, it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Chairman reported Progress; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

LORDS, THURSDAY, AUGUST 19.

Employers' Liability Bill—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 1^a,"—(The Earl of Redesdale) .. 1543

After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 1^a (No. 199.)

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU CAMPAIGN—MILITARY ORGANIZATION—MOTION FOR A PAPER

Moved for, Return of the annual expense (including all charges for clothes, &c.) of the 1st Class Army Reserve, from its creation to 1st April 1880; and also the expenses of the maintenance of the families of this Reserve during the time the husbands were called to arms on the Russian emergency; and also the annual expenses of the brigade dépôt system from its creation to April 1, 1880,"—(The Lord Strathnairn) .. 1544

After debate, Motion amended, and agreed to.

Address for—

Return of the annual expense (including all charges for clothes, &c.) of the 1st Class Army Reserve, from its creation up to the 1st April 1880; and also the expenses of the maintenance of the families of this Reserve during the time the husbands were called to arms on the Russian emergency.—(The Lord Strathnairn.)

COMMONS, THURSDAY, AUGUST 19.

QUESTIONS.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—OUT-DOOR RELIEF—Questions, Mr. J. G. Talbot ; Answers, The Solicitor General for Ireland, Mr. Childers ..	1567
THE BRITISH MUSEUM—THE NATURAL HISTORY MUSEUM—Question, Mr. Gibson ; Answer, Mr. Spencer Walpole ..	1568
HIGHER EDUCATION IN WALES—DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE—Question, Mr. B. T. Williams ; Answer, Mr. Mundella ..	1569
ADMIRALTY AND WAR OFFICE REGULATION ACT—COMPENSATION ALLOW- ANCES—Question, Sir Richard Musgrave ; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish ..	1569
EDUCATION RETURNS—EDUCATIONAL PASSES—Question, Sir Massey Lopes ; Answer, Mr. Mundella ..	1570
ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—THE GALWAY MILITIA—Question, Major Nolan ; Answer, Mr. Childers ..	1571
INSPECTORS OF IRISH FISHERIES—Question, Mr. Blake ; Answer, The Soli- citor General for Ireland ..	1571
TREATY OF WASHINGTON—THE FORTUNE BAY FISHERY DISPUTE—Question, Mr. Gourley ; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke ..	1571

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 19.]	Page
TURKEY—THE SULTAN'S HAREM—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke	1572
TREATY OF BERLIN—ARTICLE XI.—RASURE OF THE FORTRESSES OF BULGARIA — ARTICLE XLII. — THE TURKISH DEBT—Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke	1572
MERCANTILE MARINE—THE STRAITS OF MALACCA—Question, Sir John Hay; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff	1573
FJI—LIEUTENANT E. G. CHIPPENDALL—Question, Mr. Birley; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff	1573
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT—CATTLE DISEASE AT LIVERPOOL—Question, Mr. J. W. Barclay; Answer, Mr. Mundella	1574
THE LOWER THAMES VALLEY DRAINAGE—REPORT OF THE INSPECTORS—Question, Mr. Brodrick; Answer, Mr. Dodson	1574
POLICE SUPERANNUATIONS (SCOTLAND)—Question, Colonel Alexander; Answer, Sir William Harcourt	1575
POST OFFICE—APPOINTMENT OF POSTMASTERSHIPS — Question, Sir John Kennaway; Answer, Mr. Fawcett	1575
THE EVIDENCE ACT — OATHS AND AFFIRMATIONS—OBJECTION TO TAKE AN OATH—Question, Mr. Evans Williams; Answer, The Attorney General	1576
AFGHANISTAN (MILITARY OPERATIONS)—THE GARRISON AT CANDAHAR—Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	1577
THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—KENSINGTON GARDENS—Question, Mr. Ritchie; Answer, Mr. Adam	1577
EDUCATION OFFICE (DUBLIN)—WRITERS—Question, Mr. Blake; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish	1579
PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—Questions, Mr. Justin M'Carthy, Mr. Beresford Hope, Sir Henry Holland, Mr. A. J. Balfour, Mr. Chaplin; Answers, Lord Frederick Cavendish, The Marquess of Hartington	1579
TREATY OF BERLIN—BULGARIA—ILL-TREATMENT OF MUSSULMANS—Questions, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke	1581
LEGACY DUTY DEPARTMENT (DUBLIN)—Question, Mr. Meldon; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish	1582

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Hares and Rabbits Bill [Bill 194]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 11th August] 1583

After long time spent therein, Moved, "That the Chairman do now report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Sir Stafford Northcote :)
—Question put, and agreed to :—Committee report Progress.

Moved, "That this House will, this day, at Two of the clock, again resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(The Marquess of Hartington.)

After short debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Sir H. Drummond Wolff :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to :—Resolved, "That this House will, this day, at Two of the clock, again resolve itself into the said Committee."

Merchant Shipping (Carriage of Grain) Bill [Bill 287]—

Order for Committee read :—Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,"—(Mr. Chamberlain) 1691

Question put, and agreed to :—Bill considered in Committee.

After short time spent therein, Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

LORDS, FRIDAY, AUGUST 20.	Page
PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE SESSION — Observations, The Earl of Redesdale; Reply, Earl Granville :—Short debate thereon ..	1701
 Post Office (Money Orders) Bill (No. 197)—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read 2 ^a ,"—(The Viscount Enfield) ..	1704
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 ^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.
 INDIA—THE PROVINCE OF BEHAR—THE JUDICIAL LANGUAGE—Question, Observations, Lord Stanley of Alderley; Reply, The Earl of Northbrook ..
	1706
 STATE OF IRELAND—THE LAND LEAGUE—Question, Observations, Lord Oranmore and Browne; Reply, Earl Spencer ..
	1706
 INDIA—SYSTEM OF ADMINISTRATION—Petition, Observations, The Earl of Camperdown ..
	1718
Moved , "That the Petition do now lie upon the Table,"—(The Earl of Camperdown :)—Motion agreed to .
Petition for an inquiry into the system of administration which has been in force in India since 1858, in conformity with the periodical parliamentary inquiries on each renewal of the Charter of the East India Company; and also for certain reforms and a representation of the Indian people in the Councils of the Empire; of British Indian Association;
read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

COMMONS, FRIDAY, AUGUST 20.

QUESTIONS.

AFGHANISTAN—BRITISH REPRESENTATIVE AT CABUL—Question, Sir Henry Tyler; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington ..	1720
THE EVIDENCE ACT—OATHS AND AFFIRMATIONS—Question, Mr. Bradlaugh; Answer, The Attorney General ..	1721
THE BURIALS BILL—TOLLING BELLS AT FUNERALS—Question, Sir Eardley Wilmot; Answer, Mr. Osborne Morgan ..	1721
AFGHANISTAN (MILITARY OPERATIONS)—REPORTED ATTACK ON CANDAHAR—Question, Sir Walter B. Barttelot; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington ..	1722

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Hares and Rabbits Bill [Bill 194]—
Bill considered in Committee [Progress 19th August] ..	1722
After long time spent therein, it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Chairman reported Progress; Committee to sit again this day .
The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.
The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 20.]

Page

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair :”—

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—RESOLUTION—Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “it is inexpedient, in the interest of Public Business, that important measures should be brought under the consideration of the House at a period of the Session at which it is impossible that they should receive adequate discussion,”—(Mr. Arthur Balfour,)—instead thereof 1777

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :”—After long debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 119, Noes 59; Majority 60.—(Div. List, No. 133.)

Question again proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair :”—Motion, by leave, withdrawn:—Supply Committee upon Monday next.

Hares and Rabbits Bill [Bill 194]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 20th August] 1816

After long time spent therein, Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Tuesday next, and to be printed. [Bill 314.]

Irish (Relief of Distress) Loans Amendment Bill—Ordered (Lord Frederick Cavendish, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland); presented, and read the first time [Bill 317].. 1839

Thames Steam Navigation Regulation Bill—Ordered (Mr. Charles M'Laren, Mr. Otway, Mr. James, Mr. Brodrick); presented, and read the first time [Bill 316] .. 1839

COMMONS, MONDAY, AUGUST 23.

QUESTIONS.

EDUCATION (IRELAND)—MODEL SCHOOLS—Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster 1840

INDIAN COOLIES AT LA REUNION—Question, Mr. A. M'Arthur; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke 1840

COURT OF RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS—LEGISLATION—Question, Mr. Monk; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain 1841

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS—PROSECUTIONS—Question, Mr. Onslow; Answer, The Attorney General 1841

TURKEY—REPORTED FLIGHT OF A FEMALE FROM THE SULTAN'S HAREM AT CONSTANTINOPLE—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke 1842

RELIEF OF DISTRESS (IRELAND) ACT—LOANS TO LANDLORDS—Question, The O'Donoghue; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster 1843

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL—THE INSURANCE CLAUSE—Question, Mr. T. C. Thompson; Answer, The Attorney General 1843

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION—Question, Mr. Justin M'Carthy; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster 1844

STATE OF IRELAND—SECURITY FOR LIFE AND PROPERTY—LEGISLATION—Questions, Lord Randolph Churchill, Mr. A. M. Sullivan, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster, The Marquess of Hartington 1845

STATE OF IRELAND—THE RIOTS AT DUNGANNON—Questions, Mr. Finigan, Mr. Parnell, Mr. Mitchell Henry; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster .. 1847

Moved, “That this House do now adjourn.”—(Mr. Mitchell Henry :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 23.]	Page
THE ROYAL AGRICULTURAL COMMISSION—ADMISSION OF THE PRESS—Question, Mr. Finigan; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster ..	1860
NAVY—VACANCIES IN PEMBROKE DOCKYARD—Question, Mr. Henry Allen; Answer, Mr. Shaw Lefevre ..	1860
TRAMWAY COMPANIES — RAILWAY PASSENGER DUTY — Question, Mr. Hanbury-Tracy; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish ..	1860
ARMY—FLOGGING—LEGISLATION—Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Childers ..	1861
DISTRESS (IRELAND)—RELIEF WORKS—Questions, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster ..	1861
THE TOWER OF LONDON—ADMISSION OF VISITORS—Questions, Mr. Ritchie, Mr. Bryce; Answers, Mr. Childers ..	1862
IRELAND—THE NEW LIFFEY BRIDGE—Questions, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answers, Mr. W. E. Forster ..	1863
MEDICAL ACT, 1858 — THE GENERAL MEDICAL COUNCIL—Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Mundella ..	1865
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—EXAMINATION OF JEWISH MONITORS—Question, Mr. Serjeant Simon; Answer, Mr. Mundella ..	1865
THE COMMISSIONERS OF INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (IRELAND)—EXAMINATIONS AT PARSONSTOWN—Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster ..	1866
EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—HARSH TREATMENT—Question, The O'Donoghue; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster ..	1866
BRIDGES (IRELAND)—THE CUNNIGAR BRIDGE—Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster ..	1867
PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—Question, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington ..	1867
THE NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY—Question, Mr. Beresford Hope; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish ..	1869
NIGHT POACHING ACT (SCOTLAND)—Question, Sir David Wedderburn; Answer, Mr. Arthur Peel ..	1869
THE HOUSE OF COMMONS — THE REFRESHMENT BAR — Question, Mr. Montague Guest; Answer, Mr. Adam ..	1870
THE MINT—THE NEW BUILDING—Question, Mr. Mitchell Henry; Answer, Lord Frederick Cavendish ..	1870
STATE OF IRELAND—SPEECH OF MR. DILLON AT KILDARE—Observations, Mr. Dillon ..	1870
Moved , "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Dillon:)—After long debate, Question put:—The House divided ; Ayes 21, Noes 127; Majority 106.—(Div. List, No. 134.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS.

- (1.) $9,500, to complete the sum for the Science and Art Museum, Dublin.
- (2.) $12,500, to complete the sum for the Shannon Navigation.—After short debate, Vote agreed to 1936

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

- (3.) $23,827, to complete the sum for the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, &c. Ireland.—After short debate, Vote agreed to .. 1940
- (4.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding $17,709, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for such of the Salaries and Expenses of the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer Divisions of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice in Ireland as are not charged on the Consolidated Fund; including provision for certain

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 23.]	Page
SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Committee—continued.
Officers of the Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland, and for the Trial of Election Petitions" ..	1944
After short debate, Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £17,469, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Sexton :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .
Original Question again proposed ..	1948
Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £17,669, be granted, &c."—(Mr. Sexton :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .
Original Question put, and agreed to .
Moved , "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Bigger :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .
(5.) £7,121, to complete the sum for the Land Judges' Offices, Ireland.
(6.) £7,242, to complete the sum for Probate, &c. Registries, Ireland.
(7.) £995, to complete the sum for the Admiralty Court Register, Ireland.
(8.) £12,195, to complete the sum for the Registry of Deeds, Ireland.
(9.) £1,805, to complete the sum for the Registry of Judgments, Ireland.
Moved , "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Finigan :)—After short debate, Question put, and agreed to .
Resolutions to be reported To-morrow ; Committee to sit again To-morrow .
Irish (Relief of Distress) Loans Amendment Bill [Bill 817]—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Lord Frederick Cavendish) ..	1953
After short debate, Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday .

LORDS, TUESDAY, AUGUST 24.

AFGHANISTAN—MILITARY OPERATIONS—THE LATEST TELEGRAMS—Question,
Lord Emly ; Answer, Earl Granville	1954
Employers' Liability Bill (No. 199)—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read 2 ^a ,"—(The Lord Chancellor) ..	1955
After debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 ^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, AUGUST 24.

Q U E S T I O N .

THE FRENCH MARRIAGE LAW—MARRIAGE OF ENGLISH WOMEN WITH FRENCH SUBJECTS—Question, Mr. L. Fry ; Answer, Mr. Arthur Peel ..	1994
---	------

O R D E R S O F T H E D A Y .

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read ; Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair :"—

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—RESOLUTION—

Moved, "That it is unconstitutional and inexpedient to grant supplies of public money for the maintenance of the armed force known as the Royal Irish Constabulary, whose regulations and rules of discipline have not been communicated to Parliament,"—(Mr. O'Donnell) 1994

[The Motion, not being seconded, was not put.]

BULGARIA AND EASTERN ROUMELIA — CONDITION OF THE MAHOMEDAN POPULATION—RESOLUTION—Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the oppression and barbarity to which the Mussulman population of Bulgaria and of Eastern Roumelia has been subjected during and since the con-

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 24.]

Page

BULGARIA AND EASTERN ROUMELIA — CONDITION OF THE MAHOMEDAN POPULATION— RESOLUTION—continued.

clusion of the Russo-Turkish War of 1877, deserves the strong condemnation of Europe; that Her Majesty's Government should take, with or without the co-operation of other European Powers, effectual steps to secure the complete repatriation of the remnant of the Mussulman population of those provinces, and to secure protection for their persons and property from outrage and robbery; that Her Majesty's Government should urge the fulfilment of those provisions of the Treaty of Berlin which are intended to insure justice for Turkey and equal rights for her Mahometan inhabitants,"—(Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett),—instead thereof .. 2000

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—After short debate, Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair :"—

ENGLAND AND IRELAND—THE LEGISLATIVE UNION—Observations, Mr. Parnell; Reply, Mr. W. E. Forster:—Long debate thereon .. 2003

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £88,262, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Commissioners of Police, the Police Courts, and the Metropolitan Police Establishment of Dublin" .. 2060

Moved, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Finigan :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) £56,613, to complete the sum for Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Ireland.

(3.) £4,286, to complete the sum for Dundrum Criminal Lunatic Asylum, Ireland.—After short debate, Vote agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

SUPPLY—REPORT—Resolutions [23rd August] reported .. 2072
Resolutions agreed to.

LORDS.

—o—o—SAT FIRST.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 3.

The Lord Ramsay (The Earl of Dalhousie), after the death of his father.

COMMONS.

—o:o:—
NEW MEMBER SWORN.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 10.

Liverpool—Lord Claud John Hamilton.

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

IN THE

FIRST SESSION OF THE TWENTY-SECOND PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, APPOINTED TO MEET 29 APRIL, 1880, IN THE FORTY-THIRD YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

FOURTH VOLUME OF SECOND SESSION 1880.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 3rd August, 1880.

MINUTES.]—Sat First in Parliament—The Lord Ramsay (The Earl of Dalhousie), after the death of his father.

SELECT COMMITTEE—Office of the Clerk of the Parliaments and Office of the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, The Lord Chamberlain added.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Inland Revenue* (177); Kinsale Harbour* (178); Epping Forest* (179).

Second Reading—Courts of Justice Building Act (1865) Amendment* (174); Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) (162), negatived.

Committee—Tramways Orders Confirmation (No. 2)* (134).

Committee—Report—Inclosure Provisional Order (Llanfair Hills)* (145); Tramways Orders Confirmation (No. 1)* (133).

SOUTH AFRICA—SIR BARTLE FRERE—PAPERS AND CORRESPONDENCE IN BASUTOLAND.

EARL CADOGAN asked the noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he could give any information when the Government would be able to lay on the Table a further instalment of Papers relating to affairs in South Africa, including any Correspondence, telegraphic or otherwise, on the subject of the recall of Sir Bartle Frere? He would also take this opportunity of asking a Question of which he had given private Notice—namely, Whether the Secretary of State for the Colonies was able to give the House any official information on the subject of the alleged disturbed state of Basutoland?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Another instalment of Papers with respect to the recall of Sir Bartle Frere will very shortly be laid before the House, as also Papers with respect to South Africa generally. With respect to Basutoland, I have to state that on Thursday last, the 29th July, I received a telegram from Cape Town, to the effect that the intelligence from Basutoland was still favourable; that the Basutos were falling away from the rebel Chiefs; that the stolen cattle were being restored; and that a large number of arms had been surrendered. I have since been informed, in a further telegram, that the Ministers are confident they can support the law throughout the Colony with Colonial Forces only.

AFGHANISTAN—STATE OF AFFAIRS AT CANDAHAR—DEFEAT OF GENERAL
BURROWS'S FORCE.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET asked his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he would be kind enough to inform their Lordships what was the present state of affairs in Afghanistan?

EARL GRANVILLE: No news has been received to-day or yesterday from Candahar. There is, consequently, no confirmation of the reports which have appeared in the newspapers this morning about General Burrows's action. Telegrams received from Simla this morning make no mention of the telegraph wire having been cut between Cabul and Peshawur, and there is no reason to suppose there is any truth in the report that the communications have been interrupted. The following telegram has just been received from the Viceroy:—

"A powerful force of all arms, under General Sir Frederick Roberts, has been ordered to march on Candahar."

COMPENSATION FOR DISTURBANCE
(IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 162.)

(The Earl Granville.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED

DEBATE RESUMED.

Order of the Day for resuming the Debate on the Amendment to the Motion for the Second Reading, read; Debate resumed accordingly.

EARL CAIRNS: My Lords, the noble Earl the Secretary of State, who closed the debate last night, deprecated what he termed "the language of exaggeration" which, he said, had been used with regard to this Bill. I hope I shall avoid the use of any language of exaggeration. My object will be to lay before your Lordships the facts which appear to me to be important for the consideration of the Bill, and I shall be quite satisfied that if I am able to do this, your Lordships will be able to come to a proper conclusion without any use of strong words on my part.

My Lords, I think it is the more important that this should be done, because I am not able altogether to agree with the view which the noble Earl gave last night of the present state of the law in Ireland. It is desirable that we should, in the first instance, know what is exactly the present position of an Irish tenant with respect to his holding. My Lords, the great statute with respect to the law of landlord and tenant in Ireland was passed in 1860. It begins by declaring that the relation of landlord and tenant in that country is founded upon contract, and it states that that contract may be either express or implied—that is to say, where the landlord and the tenant have stipulated between themselves upon particular terms the contract is express; where they have not done so, and where the law imports certain terms into the contract, the contract is implied. But, whether it is express or whether it is implied, it is one entire contract upon which the relation of landlord and tenant is founded.

Now, let us put aside for a moment the cases arising under the custom of Ulster, which are somewhat confusing and have little or no bearing upon the present measure, and let us see what is the position of a tenant in Ireland to whom the custom of Ulster does not apply. He is bound to pay his rent. If he does not pay his rent, there are three remedies which the landlord possesses. He may distrain for the rent in arrear; he may bring a civil action for its recovery; or, if there is a whole year's rent in arrear, he may proceed to evict the tenant from his holding. And then, supposing that to be done, the law steps in and imports further consequences into the contract. If the tenant is entitled to compensation for improvements, he maintains that title and continues to possess that right even though he should be evicted for non-payment of rent. Eviction for non-payment of rent in no way injures his right to compensation for improvements. If he is evicted for any other reason but non-payment of rent, he may have a claim for disturbance. But, with the law as it stands now, if he is evicted for non-payment of rent, he has no claim for any payment in the shape of damages for disturbance except in two particular cases specified—the one where there is an old arrear of rent hanging over him, and the other where, under tenancies existing in 1870, he can show in the case of a holding under £15 a-year that the rent is exorbitant. My Lords, those are the conditions under which the Irish tenant at present holds. But let me say one word with respect to the question of eviction. In addition to the rights which I have mentioned, the tenant in Ireland who is about to be evicted by virtue of the general law for non-payment of rent has certain other privileges which are peculiar to that country, and which are of considerable value. In the first place, he has the right, for six months, to come to his landlord and tender the rent in arrear, and so redeem his holding; in the next place, he has a privilege which is not unimportant—the Judge who directs the process of eviction has a power which, I believe, is entirely peculiar to that country, and which would very much surprise a Judge in this country—that, in all cases of decrees for ejectment, the Judge shall be at liberty to grant such stay of execution as he may in the circumstances consider reasonable. So that the tenant is guarded in this way—he has six months to redeem his holding, if he is able to do so; and if he can show the Judge any reason why, as a question of mercy and kindness, he should not be evicted, the Judge has a discretion to suspend the execution of the eviction which has been decreed.

That being the present state of the law, let me show your Lordships, in the next place, what this Bill proposes to do. In the first place, with respect to the area which is covered by the Bill, I do not know whether your Lordships have observed the map now exhibited in your Library, which shows by colours the portions of Ireland to which this Bill is to be applied; but I may, for the convenience of the House, state roughly that the Bill would apply to more than half the acreage of Ireland—to over 11,000,000 out of about 20,000,000 acres. But that is not a complete statement of the case. Of the four Provinces, Ulster, Leinster, Munster, and Connaught, we may put aside Ulster, because the Bill would have really no operation in it; and of the other three Provinces, your Lordships may take it roughly that the whole of Connaught and the whole of Munster are covered by the Bill, and that the only Province out of Ulster not covered by it is Leinster. Therefore, putting aside the Province of Ulster, you have two out of the three remaining Provinces covered by the operation of the Bill. Well, what does the Bill propose to do? It takes possession of all existing contracts between landlord and tenant—and not only of all existing contracts, but of all existing actions between landlord and tenant—actions actually commenced, actions in progress up to any point short of complete execution. The Bill takes possession of the whole of those contracts, the whole of those actions, and suspends the landlord's right of eviction. My Lords, I say suspends the right of eviction, because I do not expect I shall hear in this House what I most respectfully say is nothing more than a quibble used out-of-doors, that this is not a suspension of the right of eviction, but merely the affixing to the right of eviction certain penalties. It is just the same thing whether you say to a landlord—"You shall not use your right of eviction," or whether you say—"If you do use your right of eviction you shall pay such a sum as is certain to prevent you from resorting to the exercise of that right." The whole foundation of the case for the Bill is that evictions have increased, and that they ought to be limited, and unless the Bill is meant to suspend or limit the right of eviction the foundation of the Bill falls to the ground. Now, my Lords, I dwell for a moment upon this for the purpose of reminding you that this is not a question of the freedom of contract. No doubt, there was a time in this country when all Parties in the State, and more especially the Liberal Party, were jealous of any infringement of freedom of contract. The fashion, however, of the Liberal Party is now to sneer at the idea of maintaining the freedom of contract. But, my Lords, we have not to argue that question at this time. That is not the question raised by the Bill. The question of restraining freedom of contract does not appear to me to arise. The question which does arise is a very different and a much higher one—it is the question of maintaining contracts actually entered into. The question which your Lordships are called upon to investigate and determine is not whether this is a Bill interfering with the freedom of contract, but whether it is a Bill destroying contracts already freely entered into. Although I do not desire to question the omnipotence of Parliament in this respect, yet it is well to remember that there are countries—countries, too, which we are accustomed to regard as not fettered by traditions which are supposed to restrain the freedom of our legislative action—in which the possibility of legislation of this kind is not contemplated. No Legislature of any State in America could pass this Bill, or could impair in any way contracts actually entered into; nor could even Congress impair the efficacy of such contracts. I listened with interest, last night, to hear from the noble Earl who introduced this Bill (Earl Granville) whether he could mention any precedent for a measure of this character introduced into Parliament. He referred to the question of tithe commutation; but that has no connection whatever with the present subject. The two cases, and the only two, he mentioned with regard to contracts were these. He was good enough to refer to a Bill introduced by me this year, and which passed through this House. It was a Bill to amend the Law of Conveyancing, and it contained one provision between landlord and tenant, and raised the question whether relief should be given to forfeiture for breach of certain conditions in leases. All I can say is, that if the noble Earl will introduce into this Bill the provisions which were in mine with regard to the terms upon which relief for forfeiture should be given as between landlord and tenant I will undertake to vote for the Bill. My measure proceeded on the principle that every shilling damage that could be shown by the landlord to be occasioned to him by the tenant's breach of the conditions of his lease should be paid fully before the relief could be given to the tenant. So much for the first instance. The second was a Bill relating to the Law of Hypothec in Scotland. But did that Bill interfere with any existing contract? If the noble Earl will refer to that Bill—which I do not think he has done—he will find that it referred only to future contracts. Now, these are the precedents, and the only precedents, which the noble Earl could produce for such Parliamentary interference with existing contracts as is here proposed.

I wish to ask your Lordships next to consider the way in which it is proposed to suspend the right of eviction by the Bill. I heard, last night, a noble Lord on the other side (Lord Emly), who is not present to-day, express his opinion about the Bill. If I understood him, he said that it was very certain that the Bill, if it passed, would be little resorted to, that there would be scarcely any disputes between landlords and tenants, and that their affairs would usually be settled amicably and peaceably. Now, it is one of the unfortunate things about the Bill that, by an ingenuity which I cannot but admire and lament, it has been arranged in such a way as to make it all but impossible to avoid constant collisions and controversies between landlord and tenant. In the jurisdiction of each County Court Judge there may be 800 or 1,000, or even, in some cases, several thousand tenants. Unless Irish tenants differ strangely and totally from the rest of mankind, they will be absolutely tempted and driven by this Bill to make a claim against their landlords in every case. The tenant will naturally say—"Here is a Bill which gives me such a chance as I never had before of getting a considerable sum of ready money. I will take that chance, and decline to pay rent. My landlord will proceed to eviction, and will bring me before the Judge. I shall then make a case against him under the Bill, and I shall proceed to show that, owing to the badness of the times, I cannot pay my rent." Well, there are 33 County Court Judges in Ireland, of whom I wish to speak with the greatest respect—they execute their office with very great ability; but it must needs be that among them there will be differences of action, of thought, and of judgment. One will lean, perhaps, to a more liberal scale of compensation than others, and another will be more severe on the tenant. But the tenant will take his chance, and, we will suppose, will receive from the Judge a sum of compensation money—seven years' rental, possibly, or, at least, four or five. The landlord, of course, cannot draw back, and the tenant, in this way, remains the mortgagee in possession till every shilling of the compensation is paid. The landlord is compelled either to pay or to allow the tenant to remain in possession till the money is paid. But is the tenant bound by the decision? No; he is free as air. If he does not get the sum he reckoned on, all he has to do is to pay his rent within the six months allowed, and to keep his holding. Therefore, if the case goes against the landlord, the landlord is bound; but if against the tenant, the tenant is free. If a tenant does not avail himself of a chance like this, where he has everything to gain, and nothing to lose, he must be more than human.

Earl Cairns

I come next to the inquiry, what are the terms indicated in the Bill as sufficient to justify the right of the tenant to compensation from his landlord? He is to prove his inability to pay the rent, and then to show that he is willing to continue in the occupation of his holding on just and reasonable terms as to rent, arrears of rent, and otherwise. I ask if any of your Lordships has a clear and definite impression of the meaning of these words? I own honestly that I have not; and the Government, last night, gave no indication as to the sort of agreement that the tenant is expected to offer. We must, therefore, endeavour by ourselves to examine the words and see what they mean. I may assume, I suppose, that the Government do not consider it reasonable that the tenant should pay no rent at all. Do the Government mean that the tenant is to give security for the rent due? If that had been meant, it would have been easy to have said so in the Bill. But if the words mean neither that the tenant is to pay no rent, nor that security is to be given for the amount he owes, the only alteration that remains is that the tenant is to propose to pay a smaller rent than that which he at present pays. In the first place, I will ask your Lordships to consider how far that view is in accordance with the great inducement held out to Parliament to pass the Land Act of 1870. On that occasion, the Prime Minister gave the following description of that measure:—He said—

“The Bill will proceed upon the principle . . . that, from the moment the measure is passed, every Irishman, small and great, must be absolutely responsible for every contract into which he enters.”—[3 Hansard, cxcix. 380.]

And the right hon. Gentleman also said, on the third reading of the Bill—

“By any contract made by any tenant from the day the Bill receives the Royal Assent, to pay any rent whatsoever, reasonable or unreasonable, he will be absolutely bound, and he will not be able to escape from the obligation.”—[Ibid. 1609-10.]

Ten years have passed away, and I contrast those statements with the explanation of the Chief Secretary as to what the tenant is expected to do by the Bill now before the House. Mr. Forster says—

“The tenant must be willing to try his utmost to pay a reasonable rent”—observe, not to pay, but only to try to pay—“that is, to submit to pay rent either reasonably reduced under the circumstances of the year, or with reasonable time given in which to pay, and the landlord must be unwilling to make that reasonable reduction, or to give him that reasonable time.”—[Ibid. ccliii. 846.]

Is it possible that, in 10 years, such a spirit has come over the minds of the Government opposite—the same men who passed the Land Act—that one of those very Ministers can now come forward and propose, by interlarding every line of the Bill with the word “reasonable,” to cut down the obligations by which they so recently declared the tenant would be absolutely bound? The Bill proposes, in substance, a revision of rent; and I am not surprised that it was welcomed on that account, when it was before the other branch of the Legislature, by some who are in favour of a system of revision of rents, but who consider the Bill in itself of little importance. But what does that mean? Certain language was used a short time ago which attracted a good deal of attention in this country, and concerning which an impression pretty widely prevails that in some way such language ought to be checked. Mr. Parnell said—

“It is the duty of the Irish tenant farmers to combine among themselves and ask for a reduction of rent, and if they get no reduction where a reduction is necessary, then I say that it is the duty of the tenant to pay no rent until he gets it. And if they combined in that way—if they stood together, and if, being refused a reasonable and just reduction, they kept a firm grip of their homesteads, I can tell them that no power on earth could prevail against the hundreds of thousands of the tenant farmers of this country.”

Putting aside the figurative expression about “keeping a firm grip of their homesteads,” I see very little difference between this language and the language used by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, who says that the tenant is to come forward and ask for a reduction, and if the landlord does not make a reasonable reduction, not that the tenant is “to keep a firm grip of the land,” but the landlord is to be prevented from evicting him. The noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Lansdowne), in his most masterly argument last night, used an expression which I thought was entirely justified. The noble Marquess said one of his objections to this Bill was that, in a short compass, it contained the greatest possible amount of vicious principle combined with the smallest possible amount of relief. Well, that is exactly the view which is taken by one of the organs of what is called the National Party in Ireland with regard to the Bill. The Nation speaks in these terms of the admissions of the Chief Secretary as to the necessity of reducing rents—

“These, we repeat, are admissions of the utmost importance from the point of view of the Irish tenantry. The fact is, they cover the whole ground of the Irish demand in the matter of Land Law Reform, and would justify not merely the wretched little Bill in behalf of which they were made, but a measure as sweeping as any that had been recommended by Mr. Parnell or Mr. Davitt. It is, indeed, almost ridiculous to think that such weighty arguments as were used by Mr. Gladstone should be urged in support of a proposal which, even within the restricted limits of time and area in which it is to operate, will probably be of no practical good whatever. The Land Bill, however, gives expression to a principle which all tenant right advocates look upon as a vital one, and, no doubt, it is for this very reason that the landlords have worked themselves into such a rage in its regard.”

I think that is a fair statement of the case. Here you have in this Bill, taken in conjunction with the explanation given of its meaning and object, the principle which has been contended for by the agitators in Ireland on the subject of the land—the principle of breaking contracts between landlord and tenant, and calling for a revision of rent. If it were possible to apply the principle in a way more objectionable—I might almost say ludicrous—than another, this Bill supplies the means. It actually proposes that in a case where it is admitted that the object of the Bill is to enable a tenant to claim a reduction of rent, and to press upon the landlord the obligation of reducing the rent, if the landlord does not do so, the right of the tenant to compensation shall be reckoned by a certain number of years' value of the actual rent that the tenant declines to pay, and says he is unable to pay. Could absurdity be carried to a greater height than this provision in the Bill?

Now, let me say a word or two about the only shelter the Bill proposed to the landlord—the clause which provides that the landlord may propose to the tenant a “reasonable alternative.” There has been no explanation given but one of what is meant by a “reasonable alternative.” No doubt, it is what was referred to last night—namely, that an option is given to the landlord to allow the tenant to create a property in his holding called the goodwill, and to sell that for whatever money can be obtained for it. I have not the least objection to any landlord in the South or West of Ireland introducing into his property the custom of Ulster if he thinks it a good thing. A noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Portsmouth) has told the public that he has introduced it on a property of his in the South of Ireland, and that he thinks it is an advantage. That course any person may adopt, if he thinks fit to do so. But, I ask, is it right to create for the first time a property in a holding which, once created, cannot afterwards be disregarded, and to introduce a custom like the Ulster Custom into parts of Ireland where it does not at present prevail, and where the landlords have hitherto had the greatest trouble and anxiety to prevent its introduction—is it right to say to a landlord in that part of the country—“The only condition on which you shall escape from the obligation of giving to your tenants compensation for disturbance is your conceding the introduction on your property of a custom which you have spent your life in endeavouring to ward off?”

Earl Cairns

I now ask what is the justification for this Bill? I will not forget the justification which was most relied on last night with regard to the state of the country. But the first argument upon which the Bill is rested is this—it is said that this Bill is merely an expansion of the Act of 1870, that the germ of the present measure is to be found in that Act, and that this Bill is simply the development of that germ. If, however, this Bill is a necessary and proper development of the Act of 1870, on what possible principle is it that the Bill is to be a limited, a local, and a temporary measure? How are you going to maintain that proposition to the tenants of Leinster, for example, to whom the Bill does not apply? Are you going to tell them that this Bill is a necessary complement and development of the Act of 1870?

EARL GRANVILLE, interposing, was understood to deny that no Member of the Government in that House had used such an argument.

EARL CAIRNS: I understood the noble Earl to refer to the Act of 1870, and to say that this Bill was the outcome of a clause in that Act. The noble Lord behind him used the same argument.

LORD EMLY: I can assure the noble and learned Earl that I used no such argument.

EARL CAIRNS: At all events, the noble Earl's Colleague, in introducing the Bill "elsewhere," and the Prime Minister, rested the justification of the Bill on that argument.

EARL GRANVILLE: I do not remember that that is a fact.

EARL CAIRNS: Of course, I cannot answer for the memory of the noble Earl; but I distinctly recollect that that was the argument adduced by the Prime Minister.

EARL GRANVILLE rose—

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I rise to Order. It is entirely contrary to the practice of the House to maintain an argument across the Table in this way. It is open to any noble Lord to answer the arguments of the noble and learned Earl when he has finished.

EARL GRANVILLE: The noble and learned Earl was hardly in Order in referring to a debate in the other House, and to the words said to have been used by the Prime Minister. I must say that when arguments of Members of the Government are put forward, with which other Members of the Government are not familiar, we have a right to ask what were the exact words used to which the noble and learned Earl refers.

EARL CAIRNS: I did not mention the other House, and therefore the reference to Order is wholly unnecessary. But I must further remind the noble Earl that whatever a Minister says publicly in any place his Colleagues in either House are legitimately supposed to be acquainted with and to concur in. I have not at this moment the precise words before me; but I say on my own authority, which will be borne out by the great majority of your Lordships, it was the case that the Prime Minister and his Colleagues founded one of the great arguments in support of the Bill upon this—that it was a legitimate development of the Land Act of 1870. Now, the Act of 1870 upon the question of compensation for disturbance was a measure which excited, no doubt, a great deal of attention and a great deal of criticism; but everyone who recommended that measure to Parliament described it as an Act, which, as regards compensation for disturbance, was intended to do this, and to do this only—namely, to prevent capricious evictions; and a capricious eviction was described as an eviction by a landlord who was receiving his rent punctually from his tenant, but who, notwithstanding, for some purpose of his own, wished to get rid of the tenant and to obtain possession of the land; and I say, without hesitation, that if that had not been the condition on which compensation for disturbance was proposed to be given by the Bill, the Act would never in that respect become the law of the land. What does the clause of the Land Act say? The 9th clause of the Land Act provides that, for the purposes of the Act, ejection for non-payment of rent shall not be deemed to be disturbance of the tenant by the act of the landlord; and, as if to make assurance doubly sure, it goes on to say that any person who is ejected for non-payment of rent or for any breach of condition, and who is not disturbed by an act of the landlord within the meaning of the Act, shall "stand in the same position in all respects as if he were quitting his holding voluntarily." It is, therefore, clear that by the Act of 1870—although with regard to improvements, and although with regard to the custom of Ulster, the tenants might have an interest in the land, independent of any question of the payment of rent, yet in regard to compensation for disturbance, he is not deemed to have any interest in the land at all. He is only to be paid compensation if disturbed while properly paying his rent. So strongly was this point insisted upon, that in 1870 the Prime Minister, having been asked by the late Mr. Ward Hunt in the House of Commons to explain the word "goodwill," which had dropped from him in the debate, said—

"I did unquestionably use the word goodwill several times. The most correct phrase is damage for eviction, or some equivalent phrase."
—[3 Hansard, cxcix. 1501.]

I do not see, therefore, how the Act of 1870 can be taken in any way as forming a precedent for the present Bill, unless your Lordships are prepared to hold that a Bill which is meant to restrain capricious evictions is a precedent for a Bill which is to restrain evictions which are not capricious; that the right to compensation given to a tenant who is disturbed while paying his rent is to become a precedent for compensation to a tenant who is disturbed while paying no rent, and that damages for terminating a contract are to be a precedent for damages for enforcing a contract.

But then it is said that if the Act of 1870, as it became the law of the land, does not contain the germ of this Bill, at all events, there was in the Bill of 1870, as it left the House of Commons, a clause which afforded a precedent for the present Bill. Now, I entirely object to the principle that after a measure has passed into law you can go behind it and dwell upon what one House of Parliament or the other said or did with reference to it while the measure was still incomplete. Before any measure can be passed both Houses must be agreed. How they arrived at that agreement is quite immaterial. But I am rather glad this reference has been made, because it is satisfactory to know what, after all, the history of this clause is. The Bill of 1870, as it first came up to this House, contained the following clause:—

“That ejectment for non-payment of rent shall not be deemed a disturbance unless the Court decide on special grounds that it ought to be deemed a disturbance in the case of tenancies existing at the time of the passing of this Act.”

That clause your Lordships held—and I am not surprised at it—to be much too general, much too wide and roving, and that it would give power to interfere to any extent with existing contracts; and, accordingly, your Lordships rejected the clause. When the clause came back a discussion took place, to which the noble Baron (Lord Emly) referred last night. I took the liberty of saying, in the course of that discussion, that this was a clause which would enable every one of the County Court Judges in Ireland to hold, with regard to existing tenancies, that a tenant should be absolved and relieved from paying his rent on various excuses. One tenant might come forward and say that it was a bad harvest, exactly what has happened; another might say that he had had losses in cattle, and one County Court Judge might say that this was a ground for relief, and another might say that it was not. I, therefore, submitted that it was quite impossible that the clause could be left in these general terms. Did the Government say that these objections which I made to the clause were really a statement of what was the object and policy of the Government, and that what they intended was to give the Judges a dispensing power with regard to existing tenancies on any grounds they might think fit? No; they said nothing of the kind. The present Lord Chancellor of Ireland explained the view of the Government, and said that the clause—

“Was intended to refer to two classes of cases merely—one in which the tenantry under some exceptional landlords had been kept in a state of coercion, owing to a system of long arrears, extending sometimes to 10 or 15 years; the other, in which the rents, altogether exorbitant, had been imposed under circumstances of oppression.”—[3 Hansard, cciii. 337.]

I then said—

“If these were the only cases would Her Majesty's Government put on the face of the clause that eviction for non-payment of rent should not be deemed disturbance, unless upon the ground that the Court thought the rent exorbitant?”—[Ibid. 338.]

What happened? Your Lordships put into the clause the first proviso which now stands in the 9th section, that eviction for non-payment of rent might be a disturbance in existing tenancies where the arrears of rent amounted to three years. In this form the clause went back to the House of Commons, and the House of Commons agreed to that Amendment, adding merely the other case—that in the case of holdings not exceeding £15 the Court should certify that non-payment of rent had arisen from the rent being exorbitant. The two cases which were laid down by the Government as the only cases they desired to reach were met by the clause as it now stands; and, therefore, there is nothing in the idea that in 1870 a greater measure of relief was asked for by the Government than the House of Lords was willing to concede.

The next ground on which it is sought to justify the Bill is, that it is not a novel principle that the tenant should obtain an abatement or cancellation of rent when he has suffered a great loss by the act of God, from bad harvests and the like. The noble Earl opposite referred, in connection with this matter, to the example of France and other countries. Such a principle is, I grant, not in the least a novelty. It is the general law of some countries, and contracts are made in those countries with reference to that general law. In old times, when rent was paid in kind, that result necessarily took place; and where rent is paid in kind at the present day, as it is in some parts of Italy, the landlord gains when the harvest is abundant, and loses when it is bad. What is novel, however, is, that in a country where no such law exists it should suddenly be introduced and applied to existing contracts. What happens in the cases to which the noble Earl referred? In the case of France, and, I believe, Germany, it is open to the landlord and the tenant to enter into what arrangement they please. If the tenant renounces his right to claim abatement under exceptional circumstances, his rent is lower than it would otherwise be: if, on the other hand, he reserves his claim to abatement, his rent is higher. It is open to any statesman to say that that is a better law than ours, and that it ought to be substituted for the existing law in this country; but I entirely demur to anyone coming down to this House and saying that because that law may be good in itself, people in this country, where contracts are made under a law entirely different, ought forthwith to obtain the benefit of it. Well, but, says the noble Earl, it is the law of Scotland, and I understand that one of the learned Advisers of the Crown in Ireland laid down in "another place" distinctly the proposition that, by the law of Scotland, upon the failure of the harvest, the tenant could claim to be exempted from the payment of rent. Now, I want to know whether it is the case that the Scotch tenant can claim to hold the land and yet pay no rent? That is the real question, the answer to which will show whether there is any analogy for this Bill in Scotch law. There is in Scotland a law of this kind—that when the property under lease becomes, from sterility or bad harvests, so utterly unproductive that the tenant can make nothing of it, he may go to the landlord and give back the land, or, according to the expression of the Scotch law, "reduce the lease." But there is no law in Scotland, like that proposed in this Bill, which enables the tenant to keep the land and yet pay no rent. Well, what is eviction but an application of the Scotch law? In the case of eviction in England and Ireland, the landlord does what in Scotland the tenant is by law allowed to do—he says to the tenant—"Give back the land if you are not able to pay the rent." In Scotland, the tenant says to the landlord—"I cannot pay the rent, and I claim the right to give back the land."

So much, then, for the argument that the law of Scotland or of foreign countries is a justification for this Bill. But here let me say that I cannot conceive anything so dangerous as to found a measure on a principle which, if sound, cannot stop at the point to which it is proposed that it should be limited. Do you seriously imagine that you can apply the doctrine contained in this Bill with reference to the exemption from the payment of rent on account of bad harvests to Ireland without finding yourselves compelled to apply it to the cases of England and Scotland also? That is, to my mind, utterly impossible. Once this measure—temporary, limited, and local as it may be—is placed upon the Statute Book, it will become a precedent, the logical consequence of which will be the application of the principle which it contains to the whole country.

But, it is said, there is another justification for the Bill. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) told us last night that the law of eviction in Ireland was very peculiar, and we know that that was one of the reasons put forward "elsewhere" why the Bill should receive the assent of Parliament. Now, I should like to say a word as to the law of eviction in Ireland. That law has some apparent, but no real, difference from the law of England, and if there be any difference between the two it is in favour of the Irish tenant. The difference is this—In England, wherever you have a lease reduced to writing it is almost invariably the case that a provision is inserted in it to the effect that if a tenant does not pay his rent that terminates the lease. That is done in the case of Ireland by the general law which provides that, whether stipulated in the lease or not, the same result shall follow. If this were not the general law there would otherwise be a provision in leases in Ireland such as we find in similar instruments in England. There must, further, I may add, according to the law of eviction in Ireland, be a year's rent due, which is not necessarily the case in England; there is also a right of redemption within six months, which, in evictions after notice to quit, is unknown in this country, as well as a right of suspending the execution of a writ. Now, it seems to me that this idea as to the difference between the law of England and Ireland with regard to evictions was entirely an afterthought on the part of those who brought forward this Bill. An ingenious member of the Legal Profession said something about it, and it was seized upon by the Government as an article of faith, and put forth as a strong argument in favour of their measure. I say it was an afterthought for these reasons. I recollect that in 1863 there was a Royal Commission, on which my noble and learned Friend the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, served. I, too, had the honour of being a Member of that Commission, which was appointed for the purpose of considering the differences between the law of England and Ireland in reference to procedure and practice. A very full examination was made into these various differences, and your Lordships will find in the Report of that Commission a most interesting Paper setting forth very minute particulars of the difference in procedure with regard to evictions between the two countries. It never, however, occurred to that Commission to report that there was anything so different in the law that it was desirable any alteration should be made. But what happened in 1870? We are now told—if I have read rightly what passed in "another place"—that the law of Ireland, which enables a landlord to evict for non-payment of rent, was framed in the dark ages, when the landlords ruled the legislation of the country; that it was almost a fraud upon the tenants of Ireland; and that it was passed behind their backs. I will not say merely that the statute of 1860, regulating the Irish law of eviction, was passed by a Government of which the present Prime Minister was a Member. I will assume that he may not have considered personally the details of that measure. But I will take the Act of 1870, which we may take to be his own creation. If your Lordships will refer to the well-known speech of the Prime Minister in introducing the Bill of 1870, you will find that he says some persons took objection to this power of eviction in Ireland adding that a well-known dignitary, who exercised great influence in Ireland—Father Lavelle—had written a pamphlet against it; yet the right hon. Gentleman did not propose to make any alteration in the law. But that is not all. In the Act of 1870 a provision was inserted authorizing a tenant for life to make agricultural leases which should be binding on his successor, and providing that those leases should imply—observe, not merely the landlord and tenant might, if they pleased, insert, but that the leases should necessarily imply—a condition of re-entry for non-payment of rent in order to make them valid. Is it not too much, after that, to hear it announced to the Irish tenant, who catches readily enough at any idea of the kind, that the law which allows of his being evicted for non-payment of rent is a law which was passed in fraud of the tenant, and almost behind his back?

But then, it is said, the landlord may resort to other remedies. It is true he has other remedies beside eviction; but then I should like, in the first place, to ask, is it fair, when he is by his contract entitled to three remedies, to propose, by legislation, to take away one of the three—more especially if the remedy you propose to take away is the best of the three? Is not that an interference with his contract? But let me say a word as to the two remedies which are to be left to him. There is the remedy by distress and the remedy by action. Your Lordships have read in the papers something about distraint in Ireland. When a landlord resorts to distraint in that country, there may be something to distraint or nothing. If there be nothing, the remedy is not worth much. But suppose there is something to distraint—cattle, for example—I wish to know whether the Government suppose resort to the legal process of distress would be more popular in Ireland, or less likely to excite the feelings of the people, than the process of law known as eviction. Is the process of distress a course which they would recommend the landlord to adopt as preferable? I happen to have read, within the past week, an account of a meeting of that well-known body—the Land League—at which a Member of Parliament (Mr. Dillon) presided. I find he stated that—

“From Sligo a cheering state of affairs was reported, which, if used as an example, might go very far to settle the Land Question. A seizure having been made for rent, the cattle were offered for sale at Tobercurry and Ballymote; but no purchasers could be found. They were then brought into Sligo, where the first beast put up realized 4s. 6d., and the others were sold at an equally remunerative price.”

This remedy of distress, then, is one which is not likely to be very profitable or useful to the landlord. But then it is said—“You have your remedy by action—why should not you, the landlords of Ireland, act in the same manner as other creditors—like the baker, or the small tradesman, or the banker?” Well, in the first place, the contract with the landlord is altogether a different contract from that entered into by the baker or small tradesman. The baker does not contract that he shall have his loaf of bread back again if it is not paid for; but the contract with the landlord is that if the tenant does not pay the rent he shall give back the land. A really analogous case would be this:—Suppose there was a contract for the sale of a horse under which a sum should be paid monthly, and that if not paid the horse should be returned, and suppose the money were not paid, would you think it right to say that proceedings must not be taken to get the horse back again? I do not believe that any considerate or liberal landlord in Ireland has ever been in the habit of bringing a civil action for the recovery of his rent, and I think there are strong reasons why he would prefer not to do so. But the Bill, according to what we are told, is not meant for good and considerate landlords, but for those who act without consideration. And this is the advice that the Government give them:—“Submit to this Bill, and bring your civil action for the recovery of your rent.” Now, let me suppose that the landlord acts under the advice which the Government thus gives him. He brings a civil action for the recovery of his rent; there is no defence, and he recovers judgment. What happens then? He puts a writ of fieri facias into the hands of the sheriff, who will sell the property of the tenant. Have the Government considered this? Have they informed themselves as to the practical effect which the advice which they are giving to the landlords of Ireland on this occasion will have upon the poor tenants of Ireland? You may depend upon it that if you pass this Bill those landlords for whom you say the Bill is intended—those harsh and inconsiderate landlords who, as you say, are to be found in Ireland—will bring their actions, and the sheriffs, on judgment being recovered, will sell the farm and with it the improvements on it. Any interest that the tenant has will go; his right to redemption will go, and he will be evicted just the same as if the landlord had evicted him—with this difference, that he will have no compensation for improvements, no right of redemption, no right of any kind against his landlord. The tenant will be evicted under the title created by the Sheriff's sale, and the eviction will have to be enforced by the law. Have the Government realized what it is they are doing? The Lord Chancellor of Ireland knows that I am saying what is true when I say that the sheriff will sell the interest of the tenant by a forced sale. But you will say—“Suppose the sale does not produce the money required for the rent; suppose no bidders are found?” My Lords, all the better for the landlord. The landlord, who is the execution creditor, can himself buy; he will get a bill of sale from the Sheriff which will enable him to put himself into possession; but he will be put in possession, not as landlord, but as the assignee of the tenant, and with a freedom from the payment of any compensation. I will ask my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor of Ireland if he thinks that this state of things will be popular with the tenants of Ireland? I feel this matter rather deeply. I do not stand here as an Irish landlord or an Irish tenant. Years ago, 27 years ago, before many Members of the present Government had turned their attention to this subject, and when Members of the present Government made light of the claims of the tenants of Ireland, I felt it my duty to lay upon the Table of the House of Commons proposals for securing the tenants proper compensation in respect of their improvements. When the interests of the tenantry of Ireland, under the Act of 1870, were placed in jeopardy by certain doubt expressed from the Judicial Bench in Ireland, I introduced and carried through this House a measure to set these doubts at rest. I speak, therefore, now, with the same desire I have ever felt to see the just rights of the tenants of Ireland maintained, and I repeat that in those cases, if there are such, where there are harsh and inconsiderate landlords, the course of bringing civil actions for rent which the Government are now urging, and even compelling the landlords of Ireland to take, is the course which of all others must be disastrous to the tenants of Ireland.

I now come, my Lords, to the other two grounds upon which this Bill is put forward—namely, the large number of evictions which are said to have taken place lately, and the number of families said to be without house and home; and, secondly, the difficulty which is stated to exist in executing the process of the law in evictions. The argument with regard to evictions is what I may term the social argument, and the other the police argument. Let us take them separately. With regard to evictions, one of the greatest authorities on social and economical questions in Ireland—Dr. Longfield—makes some observations on this subject which deserve great attention—

“The number of evictions in Ireland as compared with those in England is increased in appearance by two causes. First, every case is proclaimed and made a subject of public complaint. It is assumed, as a matter requiring no proof, that the fault lies with the landlord, not with the tenant; that it is the case of a tyrannical landlord, and not of a knavish tenant. Secondly, in cases where in England the tenant would voluntarily surrender his holding, in Ireland he puts his landlord to the expense and delay of an ejectment. When a tenant, from idleness, or want of thrift, or capital, or skill, is unable to pay his rent, or even to make any profit from his land, he will still hold on to the possession of it until deprived of it by legal process, and then he will be readily persuaded that he has sustained a grievous wrong. For this supposed wrong he will not find it difficult to get friends to aid him in taking a murderous revenge on the landlord or agent, or the ministers of the law, or the tenant who gets the farm of which he was deprived. Thus every eviction makes a good deal of noise.”

There can be no doubt that there have been scores of families who have given up or been evicted from farms in England during the late agricultural distress who have endured every privation which poverty can entail, but of whom we have heard nothing, and about whom no Returns have been presented to Parliament. But matters are different in Ireland. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) stated last night the number of actions of ejectment which have been commenced. Those figures have no bearing upon the case before us. Everyone who knows Ireland knows that the best way of collecting rent is by instituting a process called “process of eviction.” The fact of the number of actions commenced has no bearing upon the question—the real question is the number of families actually dispossessed of their holdings. The argument of the Prime Minister with regard to the evictions that have taken place contains two errors. First, there was the error of supposing that because the numbers reached a certain figure in the first half of the year, you are to double them for the whole of the year. Anyone who knows Ireland knows that, for reasons to which I need not refer, the evictions in the first two quarters of the year are much more numerous than those for the last half of the year. The second error into which the Prime Minister fell—I am sure most inadvertently—in making this statement was the assumption that in all these ejectments the tenants and their families have been turned out on the world, as the Prime Minister said, houseless and homeless. And, no doubt, if 15,000 persons were turned out under any circumstances houseless and homeless in the country it would be a serious matter to consider. But what is the case? We have got a Return which I am told was not before the other House on the last occasion of the discussion on this Bill, but was before it the day afterwards, and which has been laid before your Lordships. In some respects the Return is not a very satisfactory one; but, although it is not so favourable in its arrangement to my argument as, perhaps, it ought to have been, I will take it as it stands. Now, what is the result of this Return? The question, as it seems to me, is—What is the number of families who have been actually evicted in the present year in the districts to which this Bill refers? I do not enter into the question whether they have been continued as care-takers or not—that may be a point for consideration; but it is not material to the present question, and makes no real difference. The question is—Are these families thrown on the country without houses and homes? I believe it is the common practice in Ireland that during the period in which a tenant can redeem he is continued in possession as a caretaker. The circumstance that the landlord keeps the tenant in possession as caretaker is, I think, a pretty strong indication that he does not intend to exercise his extreme rights, because, if so minded, he might put him out of possession altogether. The question I want to ask is, What are the numbers actually turned out without a home and a shelter? What are the facts in this Return? If your Lordships are disposed to look at it you will find that it is the Return which is numbered 169. And the result of it is this. How many do your Lordships suppose in Munster and Connaught—the two divisions which are roughly to be taken as being covered by this Bill—how many families have in the present year been turned out of possession and not re-admitted? The statement of the Prime Minister, which he led the House to believe was accurate, was that, in 1878 there were 1,749 evictions; in 1879 2,677 evictions, and that in the first half of 1880 there were 1,690 evictions, and that, if they continued at the same rate during the year, 15,000 families would be ejected from their homes. What are the actual facts of the case? New Returns have been laid before us, and what is the number of families that have been evicted in the present year in the districts to which this Bill refers? How many persons do your Lordships think have been turned out of their holdings in Munster and Connaught and not re-admitted? Well, the number is this, according to this Return:—In Munster, 126, and in Connaught 89; making altogether 215 tenants. [A NOBLE LORD: Families]. They are tenants; they may be families or they may not. Of course, that is a very serious thing; but, as compared with 1,690, 215 is a very different matter. But the question is one which admits of a much shorter test than this, because afterwards, when it was explained that there had been a mistake as to the numbers, I find that the Prime Minister took up a new position. I am quite willing to accept the test which he proposed in his new argument on the third reading of the Bill. This was his view—

Earl Cairns

“No doubt evictions were referred to, and now let us come to them. The hon. Member for Leitrim appeared to produce a great impression on his friends (and was exceedingly bold in his challenges to opponents) by the confidence with which he stated his case, and his contention seemed to be that in the non-scheduled districts and counties the evictions were quite as numerous, if not more numerous, than in the scheduled districts.”

I do not wonder, my Lords, that that point appeared to have greatly struck hon. Members. And what does the Prime Minister say to that?

“If that is true it is undoubtedly important. It goes almost to the root of the Bill. We do not admit the statement of the figures of the hon. Member. I take 1879. In the scheduled districts there were 826 evictions, and for the rest of Ireland 272 evictions. I take the first quarter of 1880, and in the scheduled districts there were 383 evictions, and in the rest of Ireland 107 evictions. I am now speaking of the Constabulary Returns. So much for that very imposing statement of the hon. Gentleman, which he said it would be impossible for us to escape from.”

Since, then, my Lords, we have got the authentic Returns of the Sheriffs for 1880, and we have got the official statistics—that is, the Judicial Returns for 1879. Now, I own that in a matter of figures I look with great satisfaction on the fact that the Prime Minister is at one with the argument on which I rely. I accept readily the test of the Prime Minister; I want no other. It is very short and very simple; there cannot be any controversy about it. He says if you show that in the parts of Ireland to which the Bill does not extend there have been as many evictions as in the parts to which it does extend, it goes to the root of the Bill. Let us then go to that at once. I rejoice that we have got one short test by which to judge this matter. The Prime Minister believed that he had got the proper statistics in some Constabulary Returns; but he had not. I take the two years—the year 1879 and the first half of 1880. The one year is in one Return and the other year in another. I take 1880 first, because it is in my hand. I take Leinster and Ulster as not being covered by the Bill, and Munster and Connaught as covered by it. What do I find? That the evictions in 1880 up to the 30th of June were—in Leinster, 403; in Ulster, 567; making 970 in the non-scheduled districts. I take the actual cases of evictions irrespective of any restoration of the tenant as caretaker or otherwise. Well, but what about the scheduled districts? In Munster the number was 495; in Connaught, 236; making a total of 731 as against 970. Thus you have more than 200 evictions in the non-scheduled districts in excess of those in the scheduled districts; and yet you are going to legislate for the scheduled districts on the ground that they show an excess of evictions. Was there ever anything brought before Parliament in the shape of statistics equal to this? The House of Commons, before this Return was presented to it, was asked to accept figures from the Constabulary Returns, which were utterly erroneous. Next day the President of the Council laid on our Table the Return which I am quoting, entirely going to the root of the Bill, as the Prime Minister calls it. Now I come to 1879. According to the Prime Minister, there were 826 evictions in the scheduled districts, and for the rest of Ireland 272. Your Lordships have got the Judicial Statistics for 1879, which, I suppose, are the best. They are from the forthcoming volume of Judicial Statistics. This Return, No. 167—what do I find there? In Leinster the number of evictions was 683, in Ulster 758; the total for the two non-scheduled Provinces being 1,441. In Munster the number is 748, in Connaught, 488; the total in the scheduled Provinces being 1,236. Thus, you have just the same proportion, or more than 200 less, in the scheduled districts; and you are going to have legislation for the scheduled districts because the evictions are there fewer than in the non-scheduled districts!

My Lords, I will show you that the statistics as to the other part of the case—the danger of disturbance and breaches of the peace—equally break down. But, first, what is the argument in regard to that part of the case? The argument as to that part of the case was this—that there was so much difficulty in enforcing the law of the country with regard to eviction, that Parliament must be asked to suspend the operation of evictions. Now, supposing that to be the case, what does it really mean? Here is a Bill which interferes—to use no harsh term—very sensibly and materially with the rights of property. If it is right to do that, you do not want any argument with regard to the danger of disturbance of the peace. But if it be wrong to interfere with the rights of property, and you base your interference on the ground that you say you cannot maintain the peace of the country without such a measure, is not that a confession that the Government cannot maintain the public peace? What a confession for a Government to make as a basis for legislation of this kind! But now, let me ask, what is the ground for this assertion? This was the first case put forward on what I may call the police argument. This was the Chief Secretary's view—

“I find that since the 1st of January in this year 107 officers of Constabulary and 3,300 men have been employed in protecting process-servers in the West Riding of Galway, and 16 officers and 626 men in carrying out the actual evictions. The number by the amended Return turns out to be greater, for I find that in protecting process-servers alone in the West Riding of Galway there were employed altogether in 63 cases 145 officers and 4,290 men—an average of 70 men being necessary to protect the men engaged in serving the common processes of the law.”

How does the Prime Minister say these evictions are enforced?—

“In one portion of Galway alone nearly 3,500 men are employed in supporting the processes of law, and the processes are now being enforced, not by units of police officers nor by scores, but by hundreds of the Constabulary, and you have now arrived at a state of things—however it be limited, and I rejoice to think it is—which may be called local civil war. . . . We contemplate with repugnance, which some seem not to share, the existence of armies of agents and regiments of Constabulary for the purpose of conducting what ought to be peaceful operations.”

I own, when I read these statements, I understood that they were representations made by Ministers of the Crown, that these were processes of evictions for non-payment of rent, which had to be supported by this number of the Constabulary. There was a Return laid before Parliament; but I shall not trouble your Lordships with more than one figure. It was stated that in the West Riding of Galway there were 145 officers and 4,290 men of the Constabulary so employed. That was an extraordinary number of men to be employed. What turned out to be the case? These figures were repeated last night by the noble Earl, who does not seem to have been apprised of the discoveries which have been made for weeks with regard to these figures; he repeated them last night as if they were still Gospel. I am sure it was an inadvertent mistake; but it was a very serious mistake for the Government to make. What was the fact? In the first place, it turned out that these men, whatever their numbers might be, were not merely employed, nor, indeed, chiefly employed, in the service of processes connected with evictions at all, but they were employed in serving the ordinary processes of the law; and I will show your Lordships that the Chief Secretary has given us information that the ordinary processes of the law were in the proportion of 10 to 1 as compared with any process of eviction for the non-payment of rent; and these process-servers were not persons connected with evictions for rent, they were collecting the small debts of the country; serving processes for the tradesmen—the baker, the small banker, and the retail dealer, and other persons who had civil bill processes to serve. But, further than this, as regards the numbers employed, the fact was, these men were men of buckram. They were imaginary. There was no such army in Galway as 4,290; on the contrary, the nominal strength was 567 men, and the greatest number at any one time was 850; the 4,290 were produced and put on the paper by multiplying the small number of men by the number of processes which they served! That was a great mistake—a serious mistake—for the Government to make when asking for this Bill by reason of the dangers to the peace of the country. I shall presently show your Lordships how many process-servers there were. There is a very remarkable story as to why it was that the number engaged in serving processes was so large.

EARL GRANVILLE: In the statement I made I did not repeat the figures the noble and learned Earl has referred to.

EARL CAIRNS: Does the noble Earl say that he did not refer to the number of men engaged in serving processes?

EARL GRANVILLE: Yes; I said in one case 200 men were required to effect the evictions.

EARL CAIRNS: The noble Earl says "to effect the evictions." That is just the question. The men, I say, were employed in protecting those who were serving the ordinary processes of law. When the discovery of this serious mistake was made at the last stage of the Bill, the Prime Minister said—

"Again and again it had been repeated that the object of this Bill is held by us to be simply the relief of distress. . . . It has never been simply the amount of distress on which we have founded the justification of the Bill. It has been the amount of distress as connected with the government of Ireland, and as creating difficulties in the government of Ireland, which have brought us, I will not say to the verge of civil war, but I will say within a reasonable distance of that terrible catastrophe."—[3 Hansard, ccliv. 1437.]

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: "Measurable" distance.

EARL CAIRNS: It is "reasonable" here.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: From what paper do you quote?

EARL CAIRNS: The Times.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: The word was "measurable," and so it appeared in the papers I read.

EARL CAIRNS: I adopt the word "measurable." I attach no value to the word reasonable, as distinguished from measurable. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded—

"The most vital fact of a statistical character upon which we have founded a justification of this Bill is not the number of the evictions,"—that had come to grief—"but the difficulty found in giving effect to the processes of law. If there is one single fact upon which I will take my stand, it is that which has been repeated so frequently to-night. Putting aside evictions altogether, and looking only to the service of processes, in the single county of Galway, in a few months of this year, I say the conclusion is inevitable. In one part of that single county there were 63 processes of law which had to be sustained, on an average, by nearly 70 of the Constabulary Force. . . . That, Sir, is the main presentation of the case on which this Bill was originally justified."—[Ibid. 1438.]

Evictions were no longer the question; the question is as to "the ordinary processes of the law." What is the meaning of this? I speak in the hearing of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and I say the process-server is an officer who is not the person to execute evictions. The person concerned with them is the Sheriff. The process-server is a person who serves processes in all forensic proceedings connected with all civil actions. And now, what does this justification of the Bill come to? It comes to this—that the difficulty is not to avoid disturbances in anything connected with evictions or anything connected with the payment of rent, but to avoid disturbances in opposition to the process-servers who are serving the ordinary processes of the law. If that is the case, and the Government want a Bill on the subject, their plan is to bring in a Bill to suspend the execution of the ordinary processes of the law. If you cannot serve the ordinary processes of the law by reason of the danger to the process-server, and if this is a justification for any Bill at all, it must be a justification for a Bill which will suspend all processes of law. But on what earthly principle do you say that, because you apprehend disturbances in the serving of the ordinary processes of the law, you are, therefore, to pass a Bill suspending the right of landlords to recover their rent?

But, my Lords, I regret to say that I am forced to come to the conclusion that this argument for the Bill, founded on the number of evictions and the difficulty of executing the processes of the law, was entirely an afterthought on the part of the Government. I believe, and I will satisfy your Lordships, that these reasons, as reasons for introducing the Bill, never entered into the mind of the Government until after this Bill was introduced. I am perfectly satisfied the Government are sincere—I do not for a moment impute to them that they are not sincere in putting those reasons forward now—but I find that those reasons were never put forward until they got into difficulties in the debates upon the Bill; and I think, under these circumstances, I am entitled to distrust their judgment. The grounds on which I say this was an afterthought are simply these—Do your Lordships remember what took place in the present Session? Do you recollect the words delivered in the gracious Speech from the Throne? Her Gracious Majesty was made to say—

“The Peace Preservation Act for Ireland expires on the 1st of June. You will not be asked to renew it. My desire to avoid the evils of exceptional legislation in abridgment of liberty would not induce me to forego in any degree the performance of the first duty of every Government in providing for the security of life and property. But, while determined to fulfil this sacred obligation, I am persuaded that the loyalty and good sense of my Irish subjects will justify me in relying on the provisions of the ordinary law, firmly administered, for the maintenance of peace and order.”

That was the view of the Government, and they put these words into the mouth of Her Gracious Majesty. Was the Government ignorant at that time of the state of Ireland; of the agitation going on on the subject of the land? I cannot believe that they were. I believe that the Chief Secretary and the other Members of the Government were fully informed of everything that existed in Ireland in the shape of agitation at that time. If they had any doubt it would have been removed by what I find an eminent Member of the Government saying some months before. At the end of January, Mr. Bright, at Birmingham, said—

“In the West of Ireland—in the Province of Connaught—you find there is something like a general social revolt. Rents are refused to be paid even by tenants who could pay them. The revolt is really against the proprietors; but it is also against the tenants. If a tenant pays rent he comes under the condemnation of his brother tenants; and if a tenant be evicted and a farm vacant, and some other farmer enters upon the occupation of the farm, his peace and even his life are in danger.”

Therefore, the state of Ireland was well known to the Cabinet, and a pledge was put into the gracious Speech from the Throne that the Government was able to maintain the law without any exceptional legislation. But it does not rest there. My noble Friend (the Duke of Marlborough) called attention to the state of Ireland. That was in the month of May; and my noble Friend specially referred to the great question of the process-servers. The President of the Council (Earl Spencer) undertook to reassure us on that point. He said—

“Although the noble Duke had told them that the number of outrages had increased within the year, he (Earl Spencer) believed that they had diminished since the beginning of the year, and he also believed that the character of the outrages against life was not so serious as in 1870. The meetings which now took place were held, and the opposition to law shown against the process-servers was committed, openly, and those who committed a breach of the law could be prosecuted. . . . In this country there has been a considerable amount of exaggeration as to what had occurred. A very large portion of Ireland was now in a complete state of quietness, and those meetings which had so disturbed the country and also the minds of a large portion of the community were confined to a small and certainly limited district.”—[3 Hansard, ccli. 88-9.]

Again, on the 11th of June, the noble Earl said—

“They would not in any way strain the law, but they would put the law into execution with a firm hand; and they thoroughly believed, if they were supported, as they hoped they would be by all the loyal people in that country, that they would, even though those special measures were not re-enacted which were enforced under the Peace Preservation Act, be able to maintain order thoroughly in that country." — [Ibid. 1749.]

But what was the view of the Chief Secretary? Mr. W. E. Forster said, on the 20th of May—

"Mr. T. P. O'Connor said they might bring forward an interim Bill for the suspension of payment of rent. [Mr. T. P. O'Connor: No. Suspension of evictions.] He thought that was almost the same thing."

I quite agree. I am glad to know that suspension of evictions is much the same as suspension of payment of rent. Mr. W. E. Forster continued—

"He was quite prepared to listen to any arguments which the hon. Member by whom such a Bill was brought in might advance. He had no desire to pre-judge the question; but would any hon. Member on either side of the House suppose that it would not bring in in its discussion, if brought forward by the Government, every branch of the Land Question, and every sort of consideration that underlaid the relation of landlord and tenant?" — [Ibid. 156-7.]

Next day, the Chief Secretary returned to the subject. He said—

"He had no proof himself that there was any desire on the part of the landlords of Ireland to take advantage of the present distressed condition of the tenantry to enforce their rents. . . . If the existing law were allowed to be disobeyed in one case it would be disobeyed in many cases, if not in all. . . . An illustration was furnished by the case of a process-server, serving processes under circumstances of which he knew nothing, who had been stopped and searched and robbed of a number of processes, those for debt being ten times the number of those for rent. . . . He came to the conclusion that the Peace Preservation Act clauses might be abandoned, and he remained at that conclusion; but he was sure that the Government and himself would be showing an utter disregard of human life if they were to allow the process-servers to go about, carrying out the law as it stood, with the possibility of resistance, without such a force as would make that resistance almost impossible. . . . With regard to those who unfortunately might have been encouraged to resist the law, the kindest and most merciful thing he could do—the only thing the Government had a right to do—would be to accompany the officers with such force as to make resistance almost impossible." — [Ibid. 256-7.]

We find here the reason for the numbers of the Constabulary who accompanied the process-servers in Galway.

"He took care," says the Chief Secretary, "that there should be such a force as would make resistance almost impossible." So that you have the Chief Secretary, at the end of May, not intimating the slightest doubt that he had amply sufficient power to enforce the law, and taking credit for the extraordinary force by which the process-servers were accompanied; and you have the Prime Minister, afterwards, referring to the number of the process-servers and the Constabulary as an argument in support of this Bill. I come next to the 4th of June. On the 4th of June, was it the opinion of the Government, as represented by the Irish Executive, that they wanted any alteration of the Land Act, or that the state of the country required exceptional legislation? I find there was a Bill proposed in the other House by a private Member (Mr. O'Connor Power) for the suspension of evictions. It was a subject entirely new at that time to the Chief Secretary. He said—

"The discussion had taken him somewhat by surprise. Though short, the discussion was a most important one, for, to a great extent, the Bill proposed to alter the relations between landlord and tenant; and he could only say on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, that they had no intimation that the discussion was likely to come on at that time. . . . For his own part, he would candidly state that he was not prepared to oppose the principle of the Bill. . . . Reference had been made to the Land Act of 1870, and he could not but admit that in that Act, as originally brought forward by his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, there was a clause—turned out in 'another place'—which was, in some respects, in the direction of the present Bill. . . . The measure came before the House in some sort as a surprise." — [Ibid. 1295-6-7.]

Mr. Gladstone said—

"He did not hesitate to say that he had had no opportunity of examining the Bill with the care which he should desire. More especially, he had not had an opportunity of comparing this Bill with the original intention of the Land Act of 1870." — [Ibid. 1298.]

So that, on the 4th of June, there was not a suggestion on the part of the Government as to any necessity, founded on the state of the country, for legislation of this kind. On the 16th of June—I now come to about six weeks ago—there was the first intimation by the Chief Secretary of what he was going to do. Was it an intimation that the state of the country, that law and order, required such legislation? Nothing of the kind. On the 16th of June, Mr. W. E. Forster said—

"We cannot assent to the second reading of Mr. O'Connor Power's Bill; but, in consequence of the distress prevailing in some parts of Ireland, we shall think it right to ask Parliament to enlarge for a time—that is, until the end of 1881—the discretionary power of the County Court Judge, so that he may, under certain circumstances, give compensation to tenants in certain districts who are ejected for non-payment of rent."

Your Lordships will observe that no reason is here assigned for the measure but that of the distress which prevailed in some parts of Ireland. So far Mr. Forster is quite consistent, for I find his last statement was this—

"I never said, and no Member of the Government has said, that we brought forward this Bill because we could not keep the peace of the country without it. We know it is our duty to keep the peace of the country; we know we must do that; we know we must make the law obeyed. We are determined to do our utmost towards attaining that end. As far as my experience has gone, I have succeeded in getting process-serving conducted with less resistance than previously, because I have sent a large force with the process-servers, showing that we were determined the law should be obeyed. It is not that we want this amendment of the law in order to make the law obeyed in Ireland; the whole power of this country is behind us in doing that."

So that, from the beginning to the end, as far as the Chief Secretary is concerned, it appears to me he has disavowed distinctly requiring this Bill for any police purpose—for any purpose connected with the peace of the country—and that the police view of the Bill comes, not from the Chief Secretary, but from the Prime Minister.

The result of the whole appears to be this. You have here legislation of an exceptional kind, I venture to think it is legislation of a violent kind. I venture to say, without hesitation, it is legislation for which no precedent has been given, or can be given. With the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) who spoke last night, I recognize the power of Parliament in a great national emergency to sanction legislation of this kind, or of a more violent kind; but I maintain there are two conditions on which legislation of that kind can and must be justified. They are these:—In the first place, there must be a provision that those whose property you interfere with for the purpose of a great national emergency must be compensated by the nation for whose benefit the interference takes place. The other condition is, you must show that the great national emergency actually exists. We all know and admire the noble Earl's powers of reasoning, and I watched carefully in the course of his speech how narrowly he examined the question whether the emergency had arisen; but he entirely passed over the other condition—that the nation should pay the cost of providing for the emergency, if it has arisen. Now, I say, with regard to the proof of this emergency, the statistics on which it has been attempted to support it have entirely and utterly broken down. And what are the other circumstances under which, and the time at which, this legislation has been proposed? The Government have just appointed a Commission to inquire into the working of the Land Act of 1870—to inquire whether it is susceptible of any particular Amendment; and in the face of that Commission, before they have held a meeting or made a Report, a proposal is made to amend in one of the most material respects that Act. And, however you may limit it in area, or declare that it is to be of temporary duration, you will place on the Statute Book an enactment from the consequences and mischief of which it is impossible there can be any escape. But what is the state of that part of the country connected with the distress at the present time, and what is the character and extent of the distress upon which you rely? Will the Government give trustworthy information on the subject of the present state of out-door relief? That is a very good test of the state of the country. I have no accurate Returns as to the number of acres; but I am informed that there are about 6,000,000 of acres over which out-door relief can at present be legally administered. But this Bill extends to 11,000,000 acres. Another question is, what is the extent of acreage over which out-door relief is actually administered? I am told that out-door relief is not actually administered over more than between 2,000,000 to 3,000,000 of acres. Did any of the noble Lords who, last night, supported the Bill, maintain that the Bill was justified by the state of things which exists? The noble Lord who spoke early last evening disputed the fact, and said that the only object in reading the Bill a second time was to put it into Committee, and there strike out large portions of the Bill dealing with places where distress did not exist.

We understand that the relief funds in Ireland have closed their operations. Your Lordships have got the fact that even in the distressed districts the deposits in the savings banks have been increasing. I am told, also, that the Customs receipts in Ireland are increasing, indicating, of course, an increase in the consumption of spirits in the country. There is a very remarkable Paper which may be interesting to your Lordships; it gives the half-yearly Returns of the Midland Railway, which runs into the very heart of the distressed districts—the counties of Galway and Mayo—and which depends mainly for its earnings on the produce which passes along it. For the six months ending July, 1879, the traffic Returns were £208,354 odd; up to December, 1879, they had risen to £223,147; and for the six months ending July, 1880, to £224,464. There was a meeting of the Land League, lately held in Dublin, to which I have already referred, presided over by a Member of Parliament (Mr. Dillon). What did Mr. Dillon say with respect to the state of the country? He said—

“From what he had seen of the country he did not desire that the hat should any longer be sent round begging for relief. He thought the time had come when they should put a stop to begging. He was convinced that there was enough money in the hands of the Bishops of Ireland and of the Relief Committees, to tide the people over till the harvest, which promised to be magnificent. The time had come when the people should help themselves, and not seek for relief outside. He moved a resolution to the effect that it was unnecessary to issue a Commission to inquire into the working of the Land Act, and that the composition of the present Commission made it impossible for the Irish people to expect fair play in its proceedings or Report.”

Now, the Land League has been loud in its cry for relief to the distressed districts; and, at a meeting of that very body, we have this authentic statement—that the time has come to cease giving this exceptional aid; that the people do not want further assistance, owing to the magnificent harvest.

My Lords, I wish to ask you to consider, for a few moments, what the effect of legislation of this kind must be. If there be one thing which we know better than another to our cost, it is that there is nothing in Ireland by which the hopes, the aspirations, and the passions of the people can be excited so easily as by the question of the land. You have had dangerous agitations in Ireland, Fenianism, agitations for Home Rule, and other agitations of the same kind; but all these agitations—whatever outward form they may have taken—were really based upon, and resolved themselves into, a desire for a radical change in the possession of the land of the country. My Lords, however you may make light of the actual extent to which this Bill will operate, it is perfectly clear that it is calculated to raise—in fact, it has actually raised—the hopes and the passions of the people of Ireland to a very considerable, and, I believe, very dangerous extent. And this, my Lords, is not an observation which applies merely to the humbler and uneducated people of the country. Take the newspapers, the educated writers in the newspapers of the country, which advocate the views of the Home Rule Party; take the expressions of the Representatives of that party in the Legislature—and you will find, beyond doubt, every one of them unanimous in this—they hail this Bill, they support it, not for the extent of good which they think it will do, but for the principles which it contains, and for the colour which it gives to further proceedings hereafter. You are asked, therefore, to assent to a Bill which, besides the mischief it will do at once, will have the effect of raising to a dangerous degree the passions, hopes, and cupidity of the people of the country. But, then, I ask your Lordships to consider what effect will it have upon the administration of the law? You say the Bill is to be administered by the Judges of the country. I am willing to bear my testimony, as far as I know, to the impartiality and ability with which those gentlemen perform their duties; but the duty they will have to perform under the Bill is not to deal with a legal question, but with a social question. It is not to decide a question of law; but it is to regulate the pecuniary arrangements between landlord and tenant, the amount which the tenant can pay, the amount which the landlord should expect to receive, and, as I have said, to deal with questions which are not questions of law, but questions of economy, of morals, of policy. For the decision of such questions there is no legal standard. Now, is that a proper risk to which to expose the administration of justice in Ireland? I am quite sure that the endeavour of the Judges would be not to lean to the side either of the landlord or the tenant. But will it not be supposed that they will lean to the one side or the other. If the landlord supposes that they lean to the side of the tenant, will it raise the Judges in the estimation of the landlord? And, if the tenant supposes that they lean to the side of the landlord, will that raise the Judges in the estimation of the tenant? I maintain that it is an unfair strain to subject those to who ought to stand in the country aloof from all questions of a social and political kind, and who ought to be occupied merely with the decision of the legal questions that may arise.

Now, let me ask your Lordships what will be the effect on another matter—the investment of capital in Ireland? We are all agreed, that if there be one thing more than another which Ireland wants it is the introduction of capital. Is this Bill likely to discourage or to promote the introduction of capital; is it likely to increase or to diminish the saleable value of the land? Look, my Lords, at the Returns of the sales of land in the Landed Estates Court. We have very important Returns on the subject coming up to the 17th of July of this year. There is a note appended to the Returns stating that, practically, business transactions and sales of land are over by the 17th of July. We are told that—

“There are no Sales between the end of July and the 1st of November in any year, and the number of lots advertised for Sale between the 17th and the 31st of July of the present year is 23, so that the Return for the period from the 1st of November, 1879, to the 17th of July, 1880, represents the entire Purchase Money for the year 1879-80, less by the produce of the 23 lots (if sold).”

Well, the saleable value of the land sold in 1877 was £1,430,453; in 1878 it fell to £1,217,027; and in 1879 to £799,008. That decrease may be accounted for, to a considerable extent, by the distress in the agricultural districts; but that will not account for the decrease in the present year, when the sales from November 1, 1879, to July 17, 1880, have dropped down to £334,466. And the Return also adds that 112 country lots have been withdrawn from sale because there were no bidders, or none who bid a sum which could be accepted. What does

Mr. Freshfield, the Solicitor of the Bank of England, say on this question? He writes—

“I have to-day had a most striking instance of the inconvenience arising from the Irish Disturbance Bill. I make no doubt that the result has been foreseen by the Government, but, nevertheless, it must operate most prejudicially in business. In consequence of a death, a mortgage for a very considerable sum—nearly £100,000—on lands in Ireland, not in the counties operated on by the Bill, has been called in. The mortgagor must re-borrow to pay off the original mortgage. I made an application to a well-known and first-class Insurance Office to advance the money wanted. The Office replies that it objects to the principle of the Bill, and, regarding it as a concession to agitators, considers great damage is being done to securities by the mere proposal. The manager, who sends me this information by telegram, intimates to me that his Board will in all probability not entertain the proposal, which, but for this Bill, would have been considered a first-class security.”

And what does Mr. Hussey, one of the largest land agents in Ireland, say? These are his words—

“I receive rents from about 5,100 tenants, paying about £90,000 a-year, in the districts to be scheduled under Mr. Forster's Land Bill, and, in my opinion, if it becomes law, demanding rent will be a useless formality, and landowners will probably be met by a general combination to demand compensation, which they will wholly be unable to meet; no rents will be paid, and creditors, as in 1846 and 1847, will call in their money and force sales with unusual rapidity, and, in fact, all properties will stand a fair chance of being confiscated. In illustration of this, I wish to mention that a friend of mine had agreed to borrow £6,000 on a rental of £2,000 a-year, free of charges, and Landed Estates Court title; the deeds were draughted; but the moment Mr. Forster's Bill was announced, the lender's solicitor said he would break off and would not lend 1s. on an estate affected by Mr. Forster's Bill, no matter how large the margin was; and I have heard of similar cases.”

Mr. Bentham, of the Standard Assurance Company in Dublin, writes—

“I have never seen anything in my time of equal importance or danger with this Bill. Even the mere attempt to introduce it, whether it pass or not, is of serious importance, and shows to what length they are prepared to go. For myself, I am disgusted beyond measure. You know how I have struggled to like everything Irish and to see all that is good in the country. Now I feel quite disheartened. We thought the Land Act, 1870, went quite far enough. We recognized in that Bill that the landlord might have a difficulty in dealing with the land as a commodity and with the tenants. But we thought it made the rents absolutely secure. This Bill will make them absolutely insecure. Since 1870, I suppose I have lent to my own hand something like £1,250,000 in Ireland. But I have closed my doors, and I have refused to carry out two loans already agreed to when some want of promptitude on the borrower's part (in completing title) gave me the excuse. I am sick of their eternal legislation, and wish I was out of it. I am determined to discourage all Irish loan business in future, from the constant worry and strain as to what the Government may do."

Now, you have the state of things in the Landed Estates Court, and the testimony of the Solicitor of the Bank of England, of one of the largest land agents in Ireland, and of one of the chief lenders of money, and they all agree that the Bill will have the effect of making property well nigh unsaleable, and of preventing the introduction of capital into the country, even in the shape of loans, to say nothing of the possible improvement of the country by developing its manufactures and industries.

And now let me say a word about the effect of the Bill upon the owners of land. There is one thing about which there is no doubt; the greater part of the moderate landowners of Ireland, however well-off they may be when in receipt of their ordinary income, as a rule derive their incomes almost entirely from land. It is also the case that, in consequence either of their own acts or of those of their predecessors, their land is very frequently mortgaged. The persons who own these mortgages are, perhaps, the trustees of married women or of infant children, who have no right to make any allowance, and who cannot give any indulgence to those who have to pay. What does this obligation to pay the interest of an Irish mortgage mean? It means that 4½ or 5 per cent must be paid, with a stipulation that after 30 days 6 per cent, and after 60 days 7 per cent, will be charged. Now, whose are the rents? As far as the mortgage covers them they really are the rents of the mortgagee, and if he is not paid the mortgagee's interest becomes a fixed charge on the estate, not at 4½ or 5 per cent, but at 6 or 7 per cent. If the rent is not paid, what happens? The person to whom the mortgage belongs cannot wait, and the property must be sold in the Landed Estates Court, and sold, as the Returns show, at a serious depreciation of value. My Lords, are there no evictions but the evictions of tenants? Is there no such thing in Ireland as a landowner, whose family has, perhaps, been for generations on his land, being turned out—to use the phrase of the Prime Minister — "houseless and homeless" upon the world? If you deprive a man of the power of paying a mortgage debt on his property, and the property is sold at a sacrifice, and the purchaser comes and turns the owner out, have you no pity, no commiseration? Is all your pity for the tenant, and none for the landlord? I heard the expressions used by the two Members of the Government who spoke last night—highly creditable to their feelings—in which they described the position of the Irish tenants who are unable to pay their rent. But commiseration is a quality that acts in different ways on different people. We know the story of the auditor of a charity sermon who was so much moved by the tale of woe and misery which he heard, that he put his hand into his neighbour's pocket and, pulling out his neighbour's purse, laid it as a charitable offering upon the plate. The tenderness and commiseration of the Government for the Irish tenants has something of the same sort about it. They appear to me to draw marked distinction between the sentiment and the substance. The Government are ready and willing to supply all the commiseration, but they expect the landlords to furnish all the funds. But I ask you, my Lords, to consider the condition to which this Bill would reduce the landlords in Ireland; and while I feel deeply for the tenants, I ask you also to sympathize with the landlords, who, if the Bill were to pass, would be, to use the words of the Prime Minister, "turned homeless and houseless upon the world."

The only other thing I have to ask you to consider is what will be the effect of the Bill in 1882. Have the Government reflected on its probable operation at that date? You are going to dam up the ordinary proceedings of the law for the space of 18 months. Your Bill says that at the end of that time the dam is to be taken away, and the accumulated stores of evictions are to pour forth. Is that a pleasant prospect in reference to the peace of the country? Are the Government really serious in this matter? Will any Member of the Government rise in his place and say that he seriously and honestly believes that on January 1, 1882, it will be possible to let loose the flood of evictions which they propose to suspend and accumulate between that time and this? My Lords, the Government are not serious on this subject. I cannot believe it. I believe their idea is that in the chapter of accidents there will be some further legislation which will carry on this suspension which at present they declare to be necessary.

My Lords, I have had my share in responsibility for the government of Ireland, and I heartily feel for any Administration that is charged with that responsibility. As far as I am concerned, any statesmanlike measure that may be introduced for the benefit of that country shall receive my respectful consideration. Some think a measure of emigration very desirable; others think that a system of peasant proprietorship might be advantageously established; others, again, hold that the Ulster Custom ought to be extended beyond its present limits to the other Provinces of Ireland. All these, my Lords, whatever view we may take of their relative or absolute merits, are projects worthy of statesmen. But I cannot include in that description a measure like the Bill now before us. This is a measure which impairs and alters the obligations of existing contracts on which the rights of property and the arrangements of the owners of property are based. It does this on the plea of a great public emergency, which is not known to exist, and which was not thought of till after the introduction of the Bill. It proposes that the cost of meeting this public emergency should be borne, not by the public who are to be benefited, but by a small fraction of the public who are directly to suffer the loss. It works out its ends in a way which will deeply injure good and considerate landlords, and which will deeply injure the tenants of landlords who are not good or considerate. It is a Bill which will excite hopes and passions among the people that can never be satisfied, which will check the flow of capital into the country, and diminish the value of property in it, and will store up and accumulate, against a future day, evils and dangers greater than any that now exist. And, my Lords, because it will do all this, I, for my part, without doubt and without hesitation, give my vote for the rejection of the measure.

EARL GRANVILLE: I rise to give an explanation. The noble and learned Earl has stated that he founded one of his arguments on a statement made by the Prime Minister to the effect that this Bill was a development of the Land Act of 1870. I said I did not recollect any such statement being made. The noble and learned Earl very properly replied that he could not take my recollection of what occurred. I have now referred to the passage to which I think the noble and learned Earl alluded, and I wish to show your Lordships how far I was right. The Prime Minister, speaking in the other House in defence of the Bill, said—"We are now going to constitute an exception to the Land Act." And, again, he asked—"What justification have we for making an exception to the Land Act?"

EARL CAIRNS: I have here the passages to which I referred, and also the passages to which the noble Earl has referred. I have no doubt expressions of various degrees of strength may be found in the Prime Minister's numerous speeches. The Prime Minister said, on the second reading—

"Let me ask hon. Members to place themselves upon the starting point of the Land Act before it is possible for them to form any just or comprehensive judgment upon this Bill."—[3 Hansard, ccliii. 1656.]

Mr. W. E. Forster, also speaking on the second reading, remarked—

"Before I sit down I hope to show that this Bill is expedient and just—that it is brought in to carry out the spirit of the Land Act, and that it is required as a temporary modification of that Act under the special circumstances of the case."—[Ibid. 844.]

Again, on the third reading of the Bill, Mr. W. E. Forster said—

"I believe the 9th clause of the Land Act has in its letter very much of the principle of this temporary Bill. . . . We say that we are carrying out the spirit of the Land Act."—[Ibid. ccliv. 1367-8.]

EARL GRANVILLE: Long paragraphs from Mr. W. E. Forster's speeches are no proof of the thing having been said by Mr. Gladstone.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I do not complain of the length to which the observations of my noble and learned Friend have extended; but I must ask your Lordships to bear with me, and to give me some part of your attention, while I endeavour to make a reply to those observations. In the first place, I shall deal with the arguments on this question without any reference whatever to the mischievous agitation which has prevailed in Ireland—though not forgetting that, before my argument closes, it will be my duty to consider the measure in its relations to that agitation. But if I give reasons which, in my judgment, ought to satisfy your Lordships that, apart from that agitation, the principles of this Bill and its provisions can be justified, and that there is a sufficient necessity for it, then I do not despair of also offering to you sound and reasonable grounds for believing that, so far from tending to advance the objects of that mischievous agitation, this Bill in its true and real operation would tend to allay and counteract it. Let me, shortly, recapitulate to your Lordships the real facts on which the necessity for this Bill, in the judgment of the Government, has been founded—facts which have been placed before your Lordships by my noble and learned Friend in a light which I think your Lordships will find to be a false and a fallacious one. I will not dwell on the peculiar character of the small tenants of Ireland, who are so broadly and entirely distinguished from the tenant-farmers of England, by their historical circumstances, by their more permanent connection with the land, by the small extent of their holdings, by the tenacity with which they cling to the land, and by the series of measures which Parliament has adopted to meet so peculiar a state of circumstances. We are dealing with the case of the Irish tenant under these peculiar circumstances, and under the additional circumstances of a special and remarkable distress. With regard to that distress, what are the facts from which we start—for, beyond all question, this Bill is based on that distress? According to the statement of the Registrar General for Ireland, the loss of crops by the peasantry in 1879 was valued at not less than £10,014,788. In addition to that loss, the poor peasantry of Mayo and Galway, and generally of the Western counties of Ireland, lost a resource on which in most years they had very much relied for payment of their rent—namely, the employment they had been accustomed to find in harvest-time in England and Scotland. That loss has been valued at, at least, an additional £1,000,000. Such was the position of these poor people; and but for the public and private charity which was so largely extended to them through the year which has now passed, they would—as every one of your Lordships knows—long before now have been starving by thousands. My noble and learned Friend spoke, I think, ungenerously, as well as unjustly, of the Government as putting their hands into other people's pockets and contributing nothing themselves towards the emergency. My noble and learned Friend is well aware—because he was a Member of the Government which saw the necessity of doing it—that the Government have devoted public funds—originally £750,000, now raised to £1,500,000—substantially to the relief of that distress, and to the relief of that distress in a manner equally beneficial to the peasantry, to the tenantry, and to the owners of land—because the burden of meeting that distress by means of the Poor Law would have been thrown mainly and ultimately on the owners of land, if no other means of providing for it had been devised. I do not say that by way of reproach to the Irish landlords—far from it. But I do say that the Government has done its part. The Government has contributed these large funds; and that contribution has gone indirectly to the relief of the owners of land in Ireland, as well as directly to the employment and relief of the people. In addition to the funds contributed by the Government, more than £400,000 has been contributed by private benevolence. The distress was such as to need all these exertions on the part of both public and private charity. I do not say that, because the landlords of Ireland have benefited by the Loans Acts, therefore you are to impose upon them, as a condition of the loans so received, ex post facto, and without previous notice, terms which were not mentioned when the loans were granted; but I do say it appears to me impossible to deny that the distress, and the means taken for its relief, are indications of a state of things that may justify and require extraordinary remedies in other respects also, and that the landlords have no moral right whatever to complain if, for the public good, the State uses its power of legislation in order to abridge in some degree remedies which they would ordinarily have. With regard to the legislation which has taken place in the direction of relaxing the Poor Law in favour of out-door relief, it will be seen how largely the powers so given have been used, when I state that the aggregate of all the Unions in which the Poor Law has been relaxed at different times during this year is not less than 10,943,482 acres—an area very nearly as large as that of the districts scheduled under this Bill. No doubt, that total amount does not represent the maximum at any one period of time; but it shows that the distress has been moving to and fro, and varying over different parts of that large area. The number of acres affected by that relaxation of the Poor Law in April last had fallen to 2,600,000, but by the 30th of July it had risen again to 5,980,544, showing how much during that period the distress had been increasing. It is true that since that time the acreage has again fallen to a much lower figure; but no man can tell what may hereafter be necessary should the hopes of a good harvest be disappointed. We are all anxious that these hopes should be fulfilled; but with the uncertainty of our climate, even during the past month, it would be the height of presumption and folly to take it entirely for granted that prosperous times are returning, and that the harvest will be such as to make it unnecessary to take precautions against further distress. I pass from the subject of distress to that of evictions. My Lords, it is an old and familiar saying that nothing is so fallacious as figures except facts, and of that abundant example has been afforded us by the speech of my noble and learned Friend. I must frankly admit, on the part of the Government, that considerable difficulty was for some time experienced in distinguishing between the evictions for non-payment of rent and those arising from other causes, and also between those where the evicted persons altogether left the property and those in which they were re-admitted on new terms as tenants or as caretakers. But the Government have exerted themselves to obtain this information accurately, and the latest Return—the most accurate of all—was issued from the Irish Office on the 29th of July last. For the purpose of the present argument, I will attribute to the position of caretaker all the advantages which the opponents of the Bill can claim for him. I will assume that he is to be regarded as if he were retained as a tenant. Making all that allowance, I maintain that when these facts are properly examined and sifted there is still abundant evidence to be gleaned from them that evictions are dangerously increasing, and that they may result in serious peril to the peace of Ireland if no check is placed upon them. My noble and learned Friend, with that ingenuity which we have often had occasion to admire, laid hold of all the weak portions of his adversaries' armour, and pulled them to pieces; but he did not disdain to erect them again, when it suited his purpose, into a formidable part of his own argument. So my noble and learned Friend dealt with the area of the Bill. He criticized the area of the Bill; but he also found it the most convenient thing to lay hold of, and even to enlarge, for the manipulation of his statistics. With regard to the statement of Mr. Gladstone, to which reference has been made, I would point out that, after all, allowance must be made for some unavoidable latitude of expression in the conduct of a public argument. My noble and learned Friend himself may sometimes stand in need of that allowance. To nail an adversary down to the letter of his remarks, after a considerable lapse of time, is, no doubt, a good rhetorical device; but it does not tend to conviction the least in the world, when the statement, if somewhat too broadly made, is, nevertheless, found to have been in substance true. And that is the case here. I will give my noble and learned Friend my own view of the case, as derived from the latest Return on the subject—that presented on the 30th of July last. Taking, not the whole area of the scheduled districts, but those counties only where there appears to have been an abnormal number of evictions—namely, Cork, Donegal, Galway, Kerry, Limerick, Mayo, Meath, Roscommon, and Waterford—what do we find? I find that in those nine counties, comparing 1877, the year of comparative prosperity, with 1879, the year of distress, and again comparing 1879 with 1880, the figures are these. In 1877 there were 96 evictions for non-payment of rent, excluding every case in which the tenant was retained as a caretaker. In 1879 that number had grown to 264. In the first half of the year 1880 there were 395, being more than 100 in excess of the whole year 1879. I had doubled that number to obtain the result for the whole year 1880; but being warned by my noble and learned Friend that this assumption of equality throughout the year might be fallacious, I have compared the Returns of the first half with the second half of the different years, and find that they stand to each other in the proportion of 5 to 4, or thereabouts. Making the computation for the year 1880 on that footing, I find that in those nine counties, for the whole of the year 1880, there would be 695 families evicted, without putting in caretakers, or anything else, against 264 in the preceding year; and if these families are multiplied by the number of persons I am led to suppose we might estimate by this Return, at the very least 3,550 persons would be thrown adrift upon the world by evictions at that rate. I agree that this is not 15,000, but it is a number which may have a tendency to increase; and these figures appear to me to be amply sufficient to justify the Government in regarding the case as one of emergency. Now, as to the question of process-servers. It would be a misconstruction of the figures in the Return, no doubt, to suppose, with regard to process-servers, that there were 4,290 Constabulary called out to protect them in West Galway. But there were 63 processes served in West Galway, and the number 4,290 gives an average of 66 policemen required to serve each process. What is the state of the country when you cannot serve a process without such a small troop of armed men, in charge of two officers, and that happening in 63 different places in one Riding of one county? The whole of those processes were, as I am informed, cases of ejectment, not for other causes, but by landlords for non-payment of rent. I, therefore, think there is abundant ground for some action to check this growing and dangerous evil. I will not trouble the House with the statistics of agrarian outrages, which are more voluminous; but during this period of distress they have greatly increased. Many of them have been of a serious, and some of an atrocious, character. That state of outrage must necessarily have become a subject of great anxiety to the Government; and I should have hoped that the House would be willing to grant them, if they deemed it expedient to apply for them, much larger powers than are asked for in the present Bill to meet such a position of affairs. My noble and learned Friend, who will not grant us those powers, says, indeed, that if we were to propose other and larger measures, to which he referred, for the benefit of Ireland, he would be prepared to give them a candid consideration; but I have, I confess, great misgivings as to whether such measures, which, as he described them, appeared to be of an exceptional character, interfering permanently with the actual state of the tenure of land in that country, would not be dealt with by my noble and learned Friend with something of the same candour with which he has met this Bill. The probability is, I am afraid, that he would find stronger and more conclusive reasons to urge against them than any which we have heard from him this evening. My noble and learned Friend referred to the gracious Speech from the Throne, and to the position in which the Government stand with regard to their determination not to apply to Parliament for a renewal of the Peace Preservation Act. I acknowledge, on the part of the Government, their full responsibility for that determination; but I am bound to say that, in my opinion, some portion of that responsibility also rests with their Predecessors in Office. I do not know what they intended to do; but, judging from a speech which was made by a noble Duke who is not here to-night—I allude to the late Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (the Duke of Marlborough)—who, possibly, does not object to leaving the responsibility of rejecting this Bill on the shoulders of his Colleagues—for otherwise I should not have thought that the attractions of Norway would have prevailed over his desire to be present on this occasion—judging from that speech only, the late Government must, I imagine, have thought that the Peace Preservation Act ought to be renewed. From the silence, however, at that time, of the noble Duke's Colleagues, as well as from statements which appeared in some of the public journals which usually support noble Lords opposite, I have been led to entertain some doubt upon that subject. But whatever may be the decision with regard to it at which the late Government arrived, if they arrived at any decision at all, they, at all events, took no steps to renew the Peace Preservation Act; and when the present Parliament first met for the despatch of Public Business, 10 days only, including Sunday, remained before the Act would expire by effluxion of time. It was impossible not to take that state of things as forming an important element in the case; and, looking at the whole situation in which we were placed, and for which we were indebted either to the determination or the omission of the late Government, we decided that we should best discharge our duty by endeavouring with firmness, but in the spirit of conciliation and justice, to govern Ireland without having again recourse to that kind of exceptional legislation. From that determination we have not flinched; but it is perfectly consistent with the desire that we should be armed by Parliament with the means of mitigating the severity of the law in those cases in which we thought that, the execution of the law being placed in the power of private persons, it was liable to be enforced indiscreetly or with undue severity, thus greatly adding to the difficulties which stand in our way in maintaining the public peace. That was and is our view of the subject.

My Lords, the House has been treated to extracts from various speeches of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in which he stated that it was undesirable to raise, during this Session, such questions as those which undoubtedly have been raised by the present Bill. The House might suppose that Mr. W. E. Forster had never explained to Parliament under what circumstances it was that, having in the first instance hoped without any exceptional legislation to carry on the Government of Ireland, he afterwards found it his duty to ask Parliament to place this particular power in the hands of the Government. My right hon. Friend, however, on the 25th of June, said—

“Now you might say, with these facts before you, why did you not bring in this Bill at the beginning of this Session? You knew the distress—you knew the meaning of the Land Act—you knew the relative positions of the Ulster tenant and the non-Ulster tenant. Well, we did not do so, because we hoped that we might put off legislation until we had all the facts before us, and knew how the Land Act was working, and then we might bring it before the House, and inquire how far it required amendment. Then it may be said, ‘If you did not bring it in then why have you brought it in now?’ Well, for this reason—that we found we could wait no longer. Facts are accumulating upon us. Evictions have increased and are increasing.”—[3 Hansard, ccliii. 854.]

And what is the measure which, in consequence of that state of things, the Government have brought forward? It is a simple check on the abuse of a dangerous power, and a check which would operate in the most limited manner possible. I deny that it is a just description of this measure to say that it is a Bill for the suspension or remission of rents, or even for the suspension of evictions, for it will only operate upon that class of evictions which it describes, and which is the particular class which the Government have good reason to check. The measure was very well called, last night, “a legislation of postponement.” Practically, it does postpone in certain cases the exercise of a particular remedy—only in those cases, however, in which the public interest may require that postponement. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne), the ability of whose speech, delivered last night, I am sure every one of your Lordships recognized, used a severe and pungent expression, which was repeated by my noble and learned Friend this evening. He said that he found in this Bill the maximum of vicious principle and the minimum of relief. That is a very epigrammatic sentence, yet I venture to say it will be found that there is no vicious principle in the Bill; and as to the minimum of relief, that is exactly what we endeavoured to provide, believing that relief of this kind ought only to be given where it was absolutely required. I maintain, my Lords, that, whether you look at this measure from the point of view of principle or in the light of precedent, it does not deserve any of those condemnations which have been so lavishly heaped upon it by my noble and learned Friend. It is not irrelevant to observe that, whether the principle is in this Bill carried far enough or too far, it still is a principle which has not been without previous recognition. The legislation of the Digest, and that of France and other countries which has been founded upon it, is, of course, no rule to us; but it may, at least, serve to show us what the most civilized nations have, in circumstances of the same kind, held to be consistent with justice. The law laid down by Ulpian and Papinian was part of the Prætorian or equitable system of the Roman jurisprudence, and not made law by positive enactment. That law was, not that there should be a remission of rent, but that there should be a suspension of it during a failure of crops from extraordinary bad seasons, which might afterwards be made good if times should improve. That equitable principle is not so entirely unknown to Ireland. Something extremely like it has been known there as part of the settled equitable system of the country. There are two cases, which bear out this view, reported among the decisions of your Lordships' House, the one decided in 1701, and the other in 1715. In the rubric, or head-note, to one of these cases it is stated that—"It has been the constant rule of Courts of Equity in Ireland that where, by a general and national calamity, nothing is made out of lands which are a fund for the payment of interest, no interest ought to run during the continuance of such public calamity."

The Lord Chancellor

And that rule has been not merely applied to the case of a jointure, and interest due to a mortgagee, secured in each case by a lease reserving a fixed rent, but also in favour of an ordinary tenant under the mortgagor, who was held to be equitably excused from paying his rent, when his farm had been laid waste by Rapparees. The principle lying at the bottom of these cases is one applicable generally to public calamities; and there is, I maintain, an unwritten equity which all men's hearts and consciences acknowledge, even when they do not think it expedient to make it the foundation of law, which prescribes forbearance and moderation and a postponement of claims under such calamitous circumstances. It is that unwritten equity which leads English landlords so liberally and generously to make voluntary remissions of rent. It is that unwritten equity which was the foundation of that enormous precedent for interference with contracts—the Irish Land Act. Before that Act, the landlord, as far as law or contract went, might have appropriated the improvements of his tenants, might have disregarded the Ulster Custom, and elsewhere might have turned tenants out of their holdings without any payment. But by that Act you interfered with contract, allowing no compensation for the interference, in the interests of the public peace and public good, and in the real interests of property itself. I do not represent this Bill to your Lordships as a development of, or as a corollary from, the Irish Land Act; but, in principle, it is a far smaller interference with the rights of property than that Act was. We have other Dependencies besides Ireland, and those immutable principles of justice to which the noble and learned Lord appealed are applicable wherever we rule. In India we have done permanently by our legislation more than your Lordships are asked to do temporarily by this Bill. The 23rd section of the North-West Provinces Rent Act, 1873, enacts that—

"Whenever in any land the crops have been damaged or destroyed by any cause beyond the tenant's control, any officer empowered by the local Government in this behalf may, subject to such rules as to appeal, confirmation, or otherwise, as may from time to time be prescribed by the Board, order that the whole or any part of the rent then payable for such land shall be remitted, or that the payment thereof be suspended for such period as he thinks fit."

The rent here spoken of is not the land revenue payable to the Government, but the rent, properly so called, payable by the ryot, or cultivator, to the zemindar or landlord. Again, in a Blue Book just presented to this House—the Report of the Indian Famine Commission—they recommend an extension of that law to the other Provinces of India. It says—

"The relief to the tenants might be secured in one of two ways—either by passing a law similar to the provision in the present rent law in the North-Western Provinces, under which the Government might declare, in any given case, that the payment of the whole or a part of the rent shall be suspended, a corresponding suspension of the land revenue being at the same time granted to the lawful recipient of the rent; or, if such law were thought inexpedient, by making the suspension of the land revenue contingent on the suspension of the rent. We are not in a position to say how far the extension of the principle of the law of the North-West Provinces to all parts of India might become practicable; but we are of opinion that the principle is equitable, and should, if possible, be so extended."

We do not by this Bill propose—and I agree that we ought not to propose—any such large and extensive legislation as that. The differences are all in the landlord's favour. They are differences of the most important character. This Bill is not—as nine-tenths of my noble and learned Friend's argument treated it—intended as a permanent and general measure; nor has it any tendency to become so. It is a Bill of an entirely local and temporary description. It is a Bill in which proof is required that the non-payment of rent is caused by the particular distress to which the Bill refers, and that the landlord is seeking to evict his tenant, not in the reasonable exercise of his rights, but unreasonably. These are the provisions of the Bill; and it is not true, as has been represented—no doubt, in good faith—in the course of the discussion, though not, indeed, by my noble and learned Friend, that it places the landlord in a secondary position as compared with all other creditors. The Bill only affects those remedies which specially belong to the landlord. I agree with almost all that my noble and learned Friend said as to the reasonable character generally of the law in regard to the remedies of the landlord. But nothing is suspended by this Bill except the summary process of ejectment for non-payment of rent. The law of distress remains. My noble and learned Friend thought it convenient for the purpose of his argument to represent it as of little value; but, whether it be of much or of little worth, it is an exceptional law in Ireland, because by statute the landlord may follow the tenant by distress off the farm, and he has other exceptional privileges. My noble and learned Friend said that if the landlord attempted to put that remedy in force the whole country would be up in arms against it. That is an argument which in itself would rather tend to confirm our view as to the state of the country; and, if that is the state of the case, it goes some way to show that we may hope, by checking those wholesale, arbitrary, and capricious evictions which this Bill is intended to restrain, to do something conducive to the peace and order of the country. Where force or intimidation could successfully be used to prevent the use of the remedy by distress, I should think the remedy by ejectment might, in like manner, be obstructed. My noble and learned Friend was quite right in saying that the landlord will, under the Bill, be exactly in the same position as any other creditor. He may sue for his rent, he may issue execution, he may sell the interest of the tenant in the market—and my noble and learned Friend expatiated pathetically on this point, observing, "This is what the Government are inviting the Irish landlords to do." When your Lordships heard that portion of my noble and learned Friend's speech, you would hardly have been prepared for the latter portion of it in which the terrible ruin that was coming upon all Ireland through this interference with the remedies of the landlord was so vividly depicted, together with the utter destruction of capital, the utter impossibility of paying mortgagees their interest, the foreclosures that would ensue, and the destitution that must follow. How can the two parts of my noble and learned Friend's argument hold together? He has pointed out that the entire remedy of the landlord as a creditor is preserved, and that it is capable of being prosecuted by him as a creditor to the length even of the eviction of the tenant without any interference under this Bill—that the landlord could not only get any possession of the holding, but also of the tenant's improvements. That could only be if somebody came forward and paid the whole of the saleable value of the holding and of the improvements. I do not know that a tenant in such a case could do anything better than dispose of his interest; and if he would not do it voluntarily, then there might be no great hardship in the landlord having the power to do it, like any other creditor, by law. But it is clear that my noble and learned Friend, in saying that there would be facilities by which the landlord wishing to do it might drive a coach and six through this Bill by using a creditor's remedy, completely destroyed the other part of his argument based on the serious injury done to the landlord.

EARL CAIRNS said, what I said was, that no good landlords would take such a course, but that you were holding out an invitation to bad landlords so to act.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I deny that we are inviting them to do any such thing. We are no more inviting any improper use of that remedy, than those who oppose this Bill are inviting landlords to use oppressively their power of eviction; but I say that if the tenant will not agree to a reasonable method of providing for his liability, this Bill will give him no relief, and he himself only will be to blame if the landlord uses his remedies. My noble and learned Friend shows that in a case in which it would be just to evict his tenant, the landlord has this remedy left to him. So much for the creditor's remedy.

I now turn to other objections which have been taken to the Bill. The Government has endeavoured to make the relief given by this measure proportionate to the need, and not to carry it beyond that need—to apply the Bill only to those cases in which landlords were making a dangerous, indiscreet, and arbitrary use of their power. And when it is said that it affords a minimum of relief, that is at least an admission that the Government have accomplished this object. I agree that since the great Famine of 1847 the general condition of Ireland has much improved. There are many signs of it, to some of which my noble and learned Friend has referred—the deposits in savings' banks, and other things. It is only this exceptional and temporary distress which has thrown the country back; and it is to meet this temporary and exceptional distress, and the non-payment of rent arising out of it, that a measure of this sort ought to be directed. With respect to the general objection, urged chiefly by the noble Earl who moved the Amendment (Earl Grey), that the effect of the Bill must be to check the operation of those natural processes which tend to remove from the land tenants who are incapable of living upon it, and whose removal would be a benefit to themselves and to the country, I do not think it is at all necessary to deny that there are such tenants, or that it would be well that they should go where they might find better and happier circumstances. But this Bill will, in no way whatever, interfere with the operation of those natural processes. What it deals with is the wholesale dispossession of those peasants, throwing them suddenly without any provision for their necessities on the world, without any means of emigrating, or in any other way of maintaining themselves—an operation which, if it were meant to enforce emigration, would tend to bring it into discredit, and which, while it might cause disturbance and disorder, would lead to no better social conditions in that part of the country. Then, as to the limitations contained in the Bill, we have been told that the area is too large. I am not going to argue the question whether the area might or might not be reduced, because that is a question for Committee. I will only state the reasons which induced the Government to propose the area which they have adopted. They found in the Loans Act of the late Government this area scheduled as one so affected by the prevailing distress as to make it fit that exceptional assistance should be extended to parts of all the Unions within that area by means of loans at an unusual and extraordinary rate of interest out of public funds. That was evidence that within those different Unions and that area the elements of exceptional distress existed; and the Government thought that as the safeguards of their Bill would prevent the application of its provisions to cases to which they ought not to apply, on the other hand it would not be safe or desirable, if such a measure were introduced, to except any of those districts which the prevailing distress had more or less affected. It has been said that we ought to have taken the area of Poor Law relaxation. That would have been, if its aggregate were taken, nearly as large an area as the one we have proposed; and, moreover, it fluctuates from day to day. Between the months of April and August it has varied very much. So much with regard to the area. With regard to the time, I think the criticism so minute that I do not intend to occupy more than a moment in dealing with it. If your Lordships think one year better than 18 months, that might be done in Committee. The Government thought it more prudent to cover two harvests, by which time they hoped the country would have returned to a normal state of things. With regard to the question of value, again, if you think it is fixed too high, this can be remedied. That matter is one entirely for Committee. As to the compensation; in the first place, it is required by the Bill as a condition of compensation for disturbance that the non-payment of rent by the tenant shall appear satisfactorily to the Court to be owing to the tenant's inability to pay, that inability being caused by distress as aforesaid. It has been said, How is the Court to discover that? In the first place, the burden of proof is laid on the tenant, and not upon the landlord. The tenant must satisfy the Court that he is unable to pay, and that his inability is caused by this particular exceptional distress. Well, it was suggested by the noble Marquess (the Mar-land, and for the honour of your Lordships' House.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, the arguments of the noble and learned Lord had conveyed to him the impression that he felt he had a very poor case to defend. He would not follow the noble and learned Lord into the history of the Land Act; but he was in the House on the 20th of May last, and he heard the Government declare their intentions about the measures they intended to introduce. They then knew the disturbed state of Ireland and the agitation which prevailed—they knew then all that they knew now—but, notwithstanding, they told them nothing that legislation of this nature was intended; they said they trusted to the good sense and loyalty of the people of Ireland; they said they would look into the question during the autumn, and consider what measures it would be desirable to bring in. He thought it wise in the Government to leave the question of Ireland to be considered in the autumn, because they all knew that there were a number of difficult questions before them. There was the Foreign Secretary, who had got Eastern Europe on his hands. There was the Colonial Secretary, who had got all the Colonies, including the most complicated case of South Africa. There was the Secretary of State for India, who was distracted with all the disasters in Afghanistan. And as for the Home Secretary, he was up to his neck in the Water Supply. How, then, could these Ministers give their attention to the important question of Ireland? The Bill was not introduced in obedience to a sudden emergency—it was not introduced as the result of any consideration or of any attention paid to the state of things in Ireland, because they had not given any attention to the state of Ireland. That they did not give their attention to it was clear, because, if they did, they would have their statistics ready. But they had no statistics ready, and after they brought in their Bill they got up their statistics. The statistics were not the foundation of their Bill, but were brought forward to support it after it had been introduced. He had not got any land in Ireland, and the Bill did not affect his rents; he was, therefore, able to look calmly at the question, calmly to consider what effect the measure would have, irrespective of the speeches of political partizans. He was able to look at the matter impartially, and form his opinion judicially. He would, in this view, read to their Lordships the remarks of Judge Lawson, uttered on the 13th July. He said—

“If once the belief goes abroad that any particular class of contract may be repudiated, that doctrine will be extended to every class of contract.”

And Judge Lawson said, further—

“If this state of things is allowed to go on unchecked, it must lead to the breaking up of all the bonds of civilized society.”

He (the Duke of Somerset) wanted also to see whether he could not get some independent opinion on the subject. He saw that a Member of that House had written a little book on the commercial principles applicable to contracts for the hire of land, and he found in that book this passage—

“To enforce new rules against either party to an existing contract, where it was made not subject to these rules, is to commit injustice between man and man.”

Who was the author of that passage? The noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) on the Bench below him. The noble Duke went into the whole question of Ireland, and said that—

“Certain clauses in the Irish Land Act of 1870 were held to justify an exceptional remedy. But this exception was strictly limited, and in the very Act its abnormal character was declared.”

He thought that a very good reason; and, therefore, he said—“We are quite safe while the noble Duke is in the Cabinet; he is not one who will give up his opinions; when he has founded them on what is right and honest, he will hold to them.” They were told that the measure was temporary, and that the reason for it was that it took so many officers to serve these notices. But, when the Act expired, what was to happen? Would they be able to serve the notices with one or two officers? And did not the Irish say—“You call this a temporary measure; we call it an instalment.” The fact is, they would probably find it more difficult to get the rents at the end of next Session than now. The Bill looked to him very like a Bill for the eviction of the landlords. They had been told that property had its duties as well as its rights. But here they imposed all the duties on the landlord while they gave all the rights to the tenant. It was said that "the germ" of the Bill was contained in the Land Act of 1870. He was glad to find that in that House the doctrine of germs was repudiated. Our Constitution was rich in germs. There was in it the germ of Absolute Monarchy and the germ of a Republic. But if they once got to the doctrine of germs he did not know how far they might germinate. He was, therefore, glad to hear his noble Friend give up that doctrine. He had in his pocket the book which the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) had written. In it the noble Duke repudiated the idea of compelling a bad landlord to do what the good landlords did of their own accord. The noble Duke said there never was a phrase invented with less right and reason than the phrase that the object was only to make bad owners do what good owners always did of their own accord, because that meant that men were to be made generous and liberal by Act of Parliament. The noble Duke ought to have read his book to the Cabinet, for it showed that the Act of 1870 was a very doubtful measure. But now his noble Friend proposed to go further. He believed that on both sides of the House they wished to improve the condition of Ireland, to improve their means of subsistence, and to raise the standard of comfort among the people; but the question was how was that to be done? He thought the Government ought to consider the whole question of Ireland, and not any one special or temporary measure, during the autumn. Whatever remedy was applied to the evils that were admitted to exist, it would be found necessary to give compensation. He was old enough to remember when the cry rose from all parts of the country against the West India planters, because they were the owners of slaves, and the demand was irresistible for the abolition of slavery. What did the Government of that day do? They regarded the matter as a question of property, and came to Parliament and asked and obtained £20,000,000 for the purpose of compensation to the slave owners. In this case, however, the Government desired to compensate the unfortunate tenants of Ireland who might be evicted, not, however, at their own expense, but at the expense of the landlord. This was most unjust, and if this were the last vote he should give in Parliament, he should give it against a measure that he believed to be dishonest, dishonourable, and detrimental to the best interests of Ireland.

THE EARL OF ZETLAND said, it was with the greatest regret that on this, the first occasion on which he had asked their Lordships' indulgence, he felt it his duty to speak in opposition to the noble Earl who had introduced this measure in their Lordships' House, and in opposition to those noble Lords, besides whose lead in political affairs he had hitherto followed with the greatest possible pleasure. But his honest conclusions were entirely at variance with the Government. He was perfectly aware that the farmers of England, Ireland, and Scotland had suffered greatly, and he would be perfectly ready to support a measure for their relief; but he could not admit that it was just or equitable to place a tax upon one class of the community to relieve the sufferings of another class. Nor was it agreeable to him to appear as an opponent to a measure for the relief of distress; but he could not think it consistent with the first principles of political economy and sound legislation to place a burden, such as was proposed, upon the resources of those whose energies were devoted to the improvement of their property, in order to meet the demands of another class. It might be presumptuous on his part to say, but he was bound to say, with all humility, that it was impolitic on the part of the Government to proceed with such a measure when a Commission to inquire into the Land Act of 1870 had been appointed, and had not yet had an opportunity of presenting its Report. He held, too, that when the Bill was introduced Her Majesty's Government were not sufficiently informed as to the condition of affairs in Ireland—for it had been proved in the House and "elsewhere" that the statistics in regard to evictions had been very greatly exaggerated. The question before the House was—whether this measure was calculated to make matters work more smoothly than hitherto? His own opinion was that it was calculated to irritate the existing sores, and, if possible, to increase the difficulties which they, unhappily, had to meet. They had been told that this was an exceptional measure, brought forward under exceptional circumstances ; and, indeed, the exceptional character of the Bill was so obvious that its advocates, unable to conceal its grave importance, insisted strongly on the limitation of time and space by which it was proposed to render it harmless. But, as to time, who was to say whether the agricultural prospects would be, in Ireland or elsewhere, any brighter than it was at the present moment ? And as for the limitation of area, he believed it required no great foresight to say that at the end of two years these districts adjoining the scheduled districts would clamour for the benefits which had been conferred on the latter. It was impossible not to foresee that the measure would not die a natural death, and that there was certain to be a clamour, not only for its continuance, but for its extension. He felt it would be wasting their Lordships' time if he entered into the details of a measure which had been so fully discussed ; but before he sat down he begged respectfully to say that it was with the greatest possible regret, the deepest sense of pain, that he felt bound to sever himself on this occasion from Her Majesty's Government. It was with the greatest possible pain that he had resigned the position under Her Majesty's Government, insignificant though it might be in a political sense, but a position which as long as he lived he would esteem it a high honour to have held. Deep, however, as was his regret at being obliged to take that step, much deeper would have been his regret in the future if, in order to retain that position under Government, he had given his support to a measure of this kind.

VISCOUNT MONCK said this Bill had been represented as an unwarrantable interference with the rights of property. He did not wish to say one syllable in disparagement of those rights or of the obligation which rested on the Government and on Parliament to maintain them, and he fully shared the satisfaction of the noble Earl (Earl Granville) at the respect the rights of property had always maintained in that House. But if their Lordships wished to destroy respect for rights of property and to bring them into disrepute, they could not adopt a better mode of doing so than by maintaining a rigid and pedantic adherence to those literal rights, and so allowing them to work injustice and defeat the end for which they were instituted. He did not think any good was ever obtained by refusing to recognize patent facts ; and he admitted that, in his opinion, this Bill was an interference with the rights of property. But the question they had to decide to-night was, not whether the Bill interfered with the rights of property, but whether the case put forward by the Government was sufficiently strong to justify the introduction of a temporary and exceptional measure. The rights of property in this country were all exercised under the control of the Government, and of that higher law which provided that they should not be used to the detriment of society or of the individuals who composed it. From the information they had received the Government had come to the conclusion that the right of eviction was being exercised, or was about to be exercised, in a manner which might compromise the public interests, and possibly lead to a breach of the public peace. He would ask their Lordships whether the rights of personal property were not at least as valuable and as deserving of being maintained as the rights of private property ? Yet their Lordships had over and over again passed laws in the interests of peace to abridge personal liberty in Ireland when a sufficient case was made out by the Government. For his own part, he was quite prepared to give a similar vote under similar circumstances. The Bill did not affect any of the ordinary rights or privileges of the landlord ; it only interfered with a right which was peculiar to the Irish land system, and to which there was no analogy in England ; and to describe the Bill as one for suspending the payment of rent was, to say the least of it, an exaggeration. It had been said that the word "reasonable" was so vague that it would be impossible for the County Court Judges to come to any conclusion upon it. But the same word occurred in the Land Act of 1870, and he had not heard that it had given rise to any difficulty. A great deal had been said about the possible indirect consequences of the Bill. That did not seem to him a sound basis upon which to legislate. But if they must consider the indirect consequences, then he would ask them to remember that the rejection of the Bill would put a powerful lever into the hands of unprincipled men in Ireland, and would give them a pretext to continue their mischievous agitation. He was not prepared to share the responsibility of doing that, and he should give the second reading of the Bill his cordial support.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: My Lords, the noble Lord who has just sat down has concluded his speech with something much in the nature of a threat as to the consequences likely to attend the rejection of this Bill; and the noble Earl below the Gangway who spoke last night (the Earl of Derby) gave us to understand as his only ground for assenting to this Bill was that the Government had laid it down that the only way by which they could maintain peace in Ireland was the introduction of this measure. The noble Earl's speech was one of the most singular to which I have ever listened. The first portion of his speech was addressed to the demolition of the Bill in all its principles and details, and the substitution of a measure which, he said, he would be prepared to support on the third reading—that is, he would support the second reading of the Bill, but solely on the understanding that it was to be completely emasculated in Committee. The arguments of the noble Earl were so conclusive on the different points of this Bill, that I really think they might have been left to stand almost alone against it; and when I add those of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) and my noble Friend behind me, I feel that I might have left this debate to conclude without saying anything; but I think that after the charges which have been made, and challenges that have been thrown out, in respect of the responsibility we incur if we reject this measure, it is the duty of those who are prepared to oppose it to accept the position of opposing it, and to do so on the ground that this Bill is neither right nor just, and that, be the consequences what they may, they cannot be worse than those which would follow if this Bill passed. We are warned that the rejection of this Bill will strengthen the hands of the agitators in Ireland; but the course adopted by certain Members of Parliament, and members of the Land League in Ireland, is of such a character, and is founded on such principles, that neither the passing of this Bill nor the passing of any similar Bill of a permanent character would have the slightest effect upon it. The agitation upon which those persons have embarked is avowedly directed to the object which the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Somerset) has happily described as the eviction of landlords; and Mr. Parnell, in one of his speeches in America, went even so far as to say—

“ I feel confident that we shall kill the landlord system, and when we have given Ireland to the people of Ireland, we shall have laid the foundation upon which to build the Irish nation. None of us, whether in America or in Ireland, or wherever we may be, will be satisfied until we have destroyed the last link which keeps Ireland bound to England.”

These are the issues before you; and it is supposed that the Bill will put an end to these great issues, by giving the people of Ireland what is called possession of the land. Your Lordships have heard from the opposite Benches some extraordinary views as to the rights of property. The noble Viscount (Viscount Monck) to whom I refer said a man was not allowed to erect a building which darkened the lights of his neighbour. That was quite true—but why? Because the neighbour has property in his lights. If he had no such property you might build your house as high as the Tower of Babel. In the same way a man is not allowed to burn down his house, not because of the inconvenience to himself, but because of the danger involved to the property of his neighbours. We have heard the history of this Bill to-night, and some of your Lordships, I am sure, will not have failed to be struck with the language quoted as having been held by the Chief Secretary for Ireland when a measure of the same kind was brought in by Mr. O'Connor Power. The Chief Secretary for Ireland observed on that occasion that the suspension of eviction was almost the same thing as suspension of the payment of rent. Up to the month of June, then, it is clear that the idea of this Bill had never entered into the mind of the Government, and nothing occurring since then has been put before us to explain or justify its introduction. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has spoken to-night in very much the same language as he used at the passing of the Land Act in 1870, following in the footsteps of his friends had been told that this was an exceptional measure, brought forward under exceptional circumstances; and, indeed, the exceptional character of the Bill was so obvious that its advocates, unable to conceal its grave importance, insisted strongly on the limitation of time and space by which it was proposed to render it harmless. But, as to time, who was to say whether the agricultural prospects would be, in Ireland or elsewhere, any brighter than it was at the present moment? And as for the limitation of area, he believed it required no great foresight to say that at the end of two years these districts adjoining the scheduled districts would clamour for the benefits which had been conferred on the latter. It was impossible not to foresee that the measure would not die a natural death, and that there was certain to be a clamour, not only for its continuance, but for its extension. He felt it would be wasting their Lordships' time if he entered into the details of a measure which had been so fully discussed; but before he sat down he begged respectfully to say that it was with the greatest possible regret, the deepest sense of pain, that he felt bound to sever himself on this occasion from Her Majesty's Government. It was with the greatest possible pain that he had resigned the position under Her Majesty's Government, insignificant though it might be in a political sense, but a position which as long as he lived he would esteem it a high honour to have held. Deep, however, as was his regret at being obliged to take that step, much deeper would have been his regret in the future if, in order to retain that position under Government, he had given his support to a measure of this kind.

VISCOUNT MONCK said this Bill had been represented as an unwarrantable interference with the rights of property. He did not wish to say one syllable in disparagement of those rights or of the obligation which rested on the Government and on Parliament to maintain them, and he fully shared the satisfaction of the noble Earl (Earl Granville) at the respect the rights of property had always maintained in that House. But if their Lordships wished to destroy respect for rights of property and to bring them into disrepute, they could not adopt a better mode of doing so than by maintaining a rigid and pedantic adherence to those literal rights, and so allowing them to work injustice and defeat the end for which they were instituted. He did not think any good was ever obtained by refusing to recognize patent facts; and he admitted that, in his opinion, this Bill was an interference with the rights of property. But the question they had to decide to-night was, not whether the Bill interfered with the rights of property, but whether the case put forward by the Government was sufficiently strong to justify the introduction of a temporary and exceptional measure. The rights of property in this country were all exercised under the control of the Government, and of that higher law which provided that they should not be used to the detriment of society or of the individuals who composed it. From the information they had received the Government had come to the conclusion that the right of eviction was being exercised, or was about to be exercised, in a manner which might compromise the public interests, and possibly lead to a breach of the public peace. He would ask their Lordships whether the rights of personal property were not at least as valuable and as deserving of being maintained as the rights of private property? Yet their Lordships had over and over again passed laws in the interests of peace to abridge personal liberty in Ireland when a sufficient case was made out by the Government. For his own part, he was quite prepared to give a similar vote under similar circumstances. The Bill did not affect any of the ordinary rights or privileges of the landlord; it only interfered with a right which was peculiar to the Irish land system, and to which there was no analogy in England; and to describe the Bill as one for suspending the payment of rent was, to say the least of it, an exaggeration. It had been said that the word "reasonable" was so vague that it would be impossible for the County Court Judges to come to any conclusion upon it. But the same word occurred in the Land Act of 1870, and he had not heard that it had given rise to any difficulty. A great deal had been said about the possible indirect consequences of the Bill. That did not seem to him a sound basis upon which to legislate. But if they must consider the indirect consequences, then he would ask them to remember that the rejection of the Bill would put a powerful lever into the hands of unprincipled men in Ireland, and would give them a pretext to continue their mischievous agitation. He was not prepared to share the responsibility of doing that, and he should give the second reading of the Bill his cordial support.

The Earl of Zetland

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: My Lords, the noble Lord who has just sat down has concluded his speech with something much in the nature of a threat as to the consequences likely to attend the rejection of this Bill; and the noble Earl below the Gangway who spoke last night (the Earl of Derby) gave us to understand as his only ground for assenting to this Bill was that the Government had laid it down that the only way by which they could maintain peace in Ireland was the introduction of this measure. The noble Earl's speech was one of the most singular to which I have ever listened. The first portion of his speech was addressed to the demolition of the Bill in all its principles and details, and the substitution of a measure which, he said, he would be prepared to support on the third reading—that is, he would support the second reading of the Bill, but solely on the understanding that it was to be completely emasculated in Committee. The arguments of the noble Earl were so conclusive on the different points of this Bill, that I really think they might have been left to stand almost alone against it; and when I add those of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) and my noble Friend behind me, I feel that I might have left this debate to conclude without saying anything; but I think that after the charges which have been made, and challenges that have been thrown out, in respect of the responsibility we incur if we reject this measure, it is the duty of those who are prepared to oppose it to accept the position of opposing it, and to do so on the ground that this Bill is neither right nor just, and that, be the consequences what they may, they cannot be worse than those which would follow if this Bill passed. We are warned that the rejection of this Bill will strengthen the hands of the agitators in Ireland; but the course adopted by certain Members of Parliament, and members of the Land League in Ireland, is of such a character, and is founded on such principles, that neither the passing of this Bill nor the passing of any similar Bill of a permanent character would have the slightest effect upon it. The agitation upon which those persons have embarked is avowedly directed to the object which the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Somerset) has happily described as the eviction of landlords; and Mr. Parnell, in one of his speeches in America, went even so far as to say—

“I feel confident that we shall kill the landlord system, and when we have given Ireland to the people of Ireland, we shall have laid the foundation upon which to build the Irish nation. None of us, whether in America or in Ireland, or wherever we may be, will be satisfied until we have destroyed the last link which keeps Ireland bound to England.”

These are the issues before you; and it is supposed that the Bill will put an end to these great issues, by giving the people of Ireland what is called possession of the land. Your Lordships have heard from the opposite Benches some extraordinary views as to the rights of property. The noble Viscount (Viscount Monck) to whom I refer said a man was not allowed to erect a building which darkened the lights of his neighbour. That was quite true—but why? Because the neighbour has property in his lights. If he had no such property you might build your house as high as the Tower of Babel. In the same way a man is not allowed to burn down his house, not because of the inconvenience to himself, but because of the danger involved to the property of his neighbours. We have heard the history of this Bill to-night, and some of your Lordships, I am sure, will not have failed to be struck with the language quoted as having been held by the Chief Secretary for Ireland when a measure of the same kind was brought in by Mr. O'Connor Power. The Chief Secretary for Ireland observed on that occasion that the suspension of eviction was almost the same thing as suspension of the payment of rent. Up to the month of June, then, it is clear that the idea of this Bill had never entered into the mind of the Government, and nothing occurring since then has been put before us to explain or justify its introduction. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has spoken to-night in very much the same language as he used at the passing of the Land Act in 1870, following in the footsteps of his friends with hesitation and doubt. The noble and learned Lord seems to imagine that the Irish people can be dealt with like a set of chessmen, and that, having placed them in a certain position this year, he may change it as he will next year. The noble and learned Lord ought to be aware by this time that the people of Ireland are moved by feelings and impulses, and not by learned dicta. They are swayed by influences of all kinds, which plunge them into crime and disturbances, whereby they bring misery upon themselves, and perpetuate that sad state of things which I am firmly convinced this Bill will tend to extend and make permanent. It is not the opinion of everybody, as it is of certain noble Lords opposite, that the jurisdiction of a Turkish Cadi can be safely intrusted to County Court Judges in Ireland; especially when it is considered, as the noble Duke opposite has told us in reference to Scotch tenants, that the prospect of obtaining money by means of the law will always induce men to resort to the most ingenious stratagems and devices. I hold in my hand a statement of Judge Longfield, who is thoroughly acquainted with the state of affairs connected with the tenure of land in Ireland, in which he says that where a single tenant succeeds in getting his rent reduced by pleading inability to pay, all the others will try to do the same, that the feeling of independence and honesty among them is gone, and that he could narrate many instances in which a tenant has pleaded poverty as an excuse for the non-payment of his rent, who was afterwards discovered to be in possession of far more money than was necessary for the purpose. Those are the people who seek to avoid the fulfilment of their engagements; those are the people who are conspiring, and who will continue to conspire, against the payment of their just liabilities. But beyond that there is this objection to the Bill—that it will have the effect of preventing even the good tenants from paying their rent, owing to that species of terrorism which, as we know, is brought to bear with such powerful influence in Ireland. It is, therefore, I maintain, opposed to the interests of the well-disposed tenants that such a measure should become law. It will demoralize them in spite of themselves. They will be driven to refuse to pay rent and to appeal to the Courts to assist them in pursuing that course. The bad tenants will say to them—"Parliament is on your side; it desires that you should withhold your rent, and that you should obtain from your landlord compensation for disturbing you in your holding." The Bill, then, in my opinion, while it may be an advantage to the bad, will operate as a great disadvantage to the good tenant, whose honesty it will tend to destroy. It has been made a great point by the supporters of the Bill that evictions have largely increased during the period of distress. Let us suppose for a moment that there is a vast increase in the evictions in the scheduled districts—or rather in the number of notices of ejectment, which may end in real evictions or not. Can anybody, I would ask, be surprised that they should have increased under present circumstances? There has been an anti-rent agitation with the object of deterring the people from paying their rent; and, therefore, the power residing in the landlords—a power which before was only resorted to in extreme cases—has now become necessary in a great number of cases. The noble Earl who moved the second reading of the Bill told us of a case without a name, in which 12 tenants paid about £70 a-year in the shape of rent among them; and he spoke in moving terms of their wretched homes, their children lying ill of fever on mud floors, and of the process of law having not been merely employed to obtain rents from them, but to eject them from their tenements, of which statement he, however, gave no proof. But be that as it may, does it not, I would ask, make your Lordships think a little when you hear such tenements as these described as homes? Does it not shock you to find people so wretchedly placed whom, nevertheless, you are called upon to fortify in their wretched position instead of trying to enable them to secure for themselves a better one? I have seen a letter from Mr. Bence Jones, whose interest in the cause of agriculture is well known, in which he speaks of the misery of keeping people occupying holdings such as I have referred to from offering themselves as labourers, and, instead of being tied down to those wretched spots, living in better homes and being in altogether a better position. I quite understand that the earth-hunger which seems to exist in Ireland cannot be eradicated in a moment. But why, I would ask, consolidate and strengthen that feeling in defiance of all that is reasonable and honest? You have had a Land Bill in operation for a period of ten years, and you say it has worked well. According to the Prime Minister, it has increased the value of land in Ireland, and the landlords have been deceived in supposing that it would work to their disadvantage. Now, I will avow that although I did not oppose that Bill in the House of Commons, I watched it with suspicion, and took a considerable part in endeavouring to qualify many of its clauses. It became law, however, and I want to ask whether, in spite of the improvement in Ireland, in spite of the riches which have since accumulated there, in spite of the money which is said to be in the Savings Banks, in spite of the increase in the Customs, and all other indications of prosperity, the operation of the Bill has not been rather to stimulate than to diminish the appetite of the people for land. For my own part, I will say without hesitation that I believe it has stimulated that appetite. It gave the Irish people the impression, not unreasonably, that it gave them something to which they were not previously entitled by law, and which had been taken from someone else. Despite, therefore, of all the advantages which might have resulted from the measure, I contend that it has had the effect of demoralizing the people, and that by this present wretched, this unhappy measure, as a noble Lord who spoke in favour of it last night called it, you are about further to excite their cupidity, and so to find them in 18 months either overwhelmed with debt, or coming to Parliament to wipe out the debt they have incurred. With the exception of the noble Viscount who spoke last, I have heard nothing like a real defence of the Bill, except from those noble Lords who sit on the Treasury Bench. The noble Earl who closed the debate last evening (the Earl of Kimberley) said the Land Bill of 1870 gave the tenant an interest in his holding; but what, I would ask, is that interest? We cannot, I maintain, too emphatically affirm that it was entirely based on the payment of rents which it is now sought to get rid of. To me it seemed that the speech of the noble Earl did not show a very great love of his work; he qualified very much his approval, and, like the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, said that whatever might be the result of the Bill the law must be put in force. But a Judge, he added, was required to stand between the Executive and the tenant. Now, I am not going to dwell on what may be the action of the Judges by whom the provisions of the Bill will have to be carried out. It is, however, I think, perfectly clear that 33 gentlemen with questions such as those with which the Bill deals thrown absolutely loose upon their hands must decide upon different principles, and in a different manner. It is utterly impossible that 33 men can act in harmony in such cases. I have no doubt that, as the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has told us, the County Court Judges are lawyers of ability. The noble and learned Lord himself is, as we all know, a very able lawyer; but I am not at all sure that I should like to put an agricultural question in his hands on the terms on which the County Court Judges will have to deal with those which come before them. I would rather take 100 men who are not lawyers to deal with such a question. No lawyer can get out of the habitual set of his mind—to effect a compromise when he cannot entirely have his own way; and I, therefore, think the Bill would impose on the County Court Judges a burden for which they are unfit, and a duty which they cannot discharge with a due regard to honesty and fairness. It is a duty which will involve so much feeling and passion, and require so little law, that a County Court Judge, in my opinion, is the last person to whose hands it should be intrusted. I would almost rather submit such questions as those with which they will have to deal to the common sense of a court martial. I do not believe the County Court Judges are at all the persons to contend with the trickery and dishonesty which will be sure to be rife in their Courts. A noble Lord (Lord Emly) who spoke in favour of the Bill told us that nothing could be so absurd as the Schedule, and the response we have had to our objections to the Schedule is that it was fixed by the loans which were granted to landlords. But the question is—What is now the state of the country, what is now the position of the different Unions that are scheduled? I have had the particulars of one of these sent to me. In a Union, part of which is scheduled, in the County Meath—the Union of Oldcastle—the population is about 2,000; the present poor rate, 1s. 6d. in the pound on a valuation of £5,350; the number of indoor paupers, 10—the number of able bodied men, none; the number of able-bodied women, 1; the number of children, none—so that there are 11 people in this distressed Union in the workhouse. The number of persons receiving outdoor relief, 24; six of whom are labourers, and one holds land. How many Unions in this country are ten times more distressed than such a Union as that? Why, I have seen a letter from the same place showing that there is no exceptional distress there to warrant its being classed as a starving Union, and that there is nothing approaching to starvation anywhere in it. Of course, in a country of early and prolific marriages there will always be distress; but is it reasonable that such a Union should be placed in this most exceptional position? Now that you know that there is no fear of starvation, and seeing that this is a measure which is contrary to the laws of political economy, and a breach of the ordinary relations between man and man, is it not contrary to justice to extend the application of the Bill to districts in which poverty and destitution do not exist? And when you extend it to such districts as those, upon what ground do you not extend it to the whole of Ireland? In some of the districts which are not scheduled, there are some places with far greater poverty than those I have mentioned. It has been said that the Bill is limited; but, however much you think you can limit it, there are watchful eyes who will take care that every precedent you lay down will be looked into; and when they find that you have included rich and prosperous districts, they will very soon be ready to call upon you to extend the Bill to poorer districts also. I remember, in 1870, the question arose as to the conduct of the landlords; and I think it was on that occasion that a statement was made by my noble Friend the Viscount opposite (Viscount Sherbrooke) that, though he had sat on Committees and heard general charges made against the landlords, he had never come across a well-au-

thenicated case of injustice on their part. At all events, we have this—that during the 10 years in which there has been a power in the tenants to proceed against landlords for exorbitant rents, no one has been able to bring before you a single instance of that kind. I cannot now help calling attention to this—that, with regard to the landlords upon whom you are going to force this Bill, you have not given us one tittle of evidence of any injustice on their part. Do you suppose that if exorbitant rents had been exacted tenants would not have come forward and claimed the rights conferred upon them by the Land Act? It seems to me that this is a distinct proof that the landlords of Ireland are, in the great majority, fairly doing their duty by their tenants. If there are a minority who do not do so to the same extent, we may bear in mind in reference to them the maxim—“De minimis non curat lex.” Surely you have no right, because of exceptional instances, to extend the law to the whole of these scheduled districts, and include in its application all the good landlords who are often, in the interest of the tenants themselves, endeavouring, by the issuing of these processes, to place their tenants ultimately in an improved position. A good deal has been said about the jointures and mortgages of landlords; but I go further, and, looking at that class who are not owners of land in Ireland, must ask what is to become of the labourers if you impoverish the landowners? If what you are doing is for the good of the present possessors of the land, it is to the injury of those who are not already possessors of it; for you are keeping them out of land which they might be ready to take if you were to give them the opportunity. As to the Bill being temporarily limited, that is one of the fictions which I do not think your Lordships will swallow. It is an impossibility—you cannot take a bone out of a dog’s mouth. Good and bad tenants you are equally putting under this law; and this you are doing, in my opinion, because there is an agitation to compel you to do so, and without statistics to justify your action, and with a condition of Ireland which is improving to such an extent that the prospect of the harvest is almost more magnificent than any that has ever been looked forward to in that country. A telegram has recently been placed in my hands showing the sort of terrorism which exists under the Land League in Ireland. Your Lordships know that in certain parts of Ireland the practice is to sell the grass upon the land, so that it may be cut and carried by those who buy it. This year, on an estate in Roscommon, an edict was issued prohibiting the practice in a particular case. This is the kind of terrorism which shows you what is at work in Ireland. Now, what is it you are doing by this Bill? There is a great controversy going on in Ireland on the subject of the land. You have men going about and declaiming against the rights of landlords, and calling upon you to give possession of the land to the occupants of it. The landlord is held up to execration as an evil monster who ought to be got rid of by any means. I should like to quote the opinions of an excellent priest, who said—

“He thought Providence might have sent the succession of bad harvests in consequence of the propagation of evil doctrines by designing persons, who were trying to mislead the people.”

I regret that some of those who should have been the apostles of peace have appeared at places where language of a character opposed to peace has been heard. But the language which has been held is the language of robbers and plunderers. It is to destroy the property of those who now possess it, or to take it from them, and, by legislation or otherwise, to force it into other hands. While this anti-rent agitation is going on the Government is found on the side, not of those who are within their rights, and are only enforcing contracts, but of those who are doing the reverse. There is a passage in the Book of Exodus which I have always thought a very remarkable one—“Thou shalt not countenance the poor man in his cause.” It is a very taking thing to countenance the poor man in his cause. I cannot help thinking that, in this case, the noble Lords opposite and others are acting on this principle. They are countenancing the poor man in his cause when it is an unjust one, when it is contrary to the compact by which he has bound himself, and contrary to the interests of justice, and when the consequences will be fatal alike to law and order both in Ireland and England. Your Lordships cannot suppose that you can lay down evil principles without their coming, some time or other, home like chickens to roost. Those principles which are hostile to the interests of order elsewhere will, some time or other, recoil on your own heads. In my opinion, the House of Lords has but one duty to perform—not to take the course which my noble Friend (the Earl of Derby)—pardon me for saying so—ignobly asked us to adopt. He destroyed this Bill by his merciless logic. He is not persuaded by the statistics which have been produced. But although it was said that confidence is a plant of slow growth in aged bosoms, and my noble Friend is no young politician, yet his confidence has grown so fast that, simply because the Government tell him they want a law that is contrary to all the principles he has ever advocated, and that they want it for a certain purpose—that of keeping the peace in Ireland—he supports it with the object of destroying in Committee every detail to which its friends are committed. And, supposing that the Government say they require all these details to carry their wishes into effect, what will he do then? He will have brought us, after forfeiting our own principles and convictions, into collision with the House of Commons on some point of detail or of limitation of money on which we should not have the means of standing with dignity. And, therefore, I call upon this House to be just and fear not, as my noble Friend near me said; and by doing justice, by throwing out this Bill, you will put a check on agitation by showing that there is in the Parliament of England a power which is not afraid to stand between right and wrong and to vindicate the right, and that the just claims of the Irish landlords are not altogether deserted by both branches of the Legislature.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, I think that those who rise to speak in favour of this Bill from the Government Bench to-night have need of all the courage of the Six Hundred that rode in the Balaklava charge. We have powerful batteries opposite to us; we have powerful batteries on the one flank and on the other flank; we have powerful batteries in our right rear and in our left rear; and the most powerful battery of all has been immediately behind us. I hope that my noble Friend (the Marquess of Lansdowne) will allow me to assure him that the pain I may have endured, as a Member of the Government, from his speech, was more than than overpowered by the pleasure I had, as a Member of this House, in listening to him last night. I have no hesitation in saying that, although we have had to-night a speech three hours long "by Shrewsbury clock," there has been no speech so able, so concise, so strong, as that of my noble Friend the noble Marquess behind me. I think it was a one-sided speech; but I rejoice—and every Member of this House will rejoice—in the discovery that we have made, not only for the first time, that we have in my noble Friend one who is able to give expression to his opinions with moderation, with dignity, and with force. My Lords, I will confess that in this Balaklava charge I am exposed to unusual difficulties; because not only do I encounter all the batteries to which I have referred, but a special battery mounted by myself has been seized by the enemy, the noble Duke behind me, and by all the noble Lords opposite, and all my guns have been turned against me in this debate. My Lords, I will be frank as to my view of this Bill. After listening to this debate for two nights, I can say with perfect truth that there is no Member of this House, on whatever side he may sit, who is more alive than I am to the many objections, some theoretical, some practical, which may be taken to the measure. All the more am I desirous of explaining how and why it is that I, nevertheless, find myself among the number of those who recommend it to the adoption of your Lordships. I confess I think that the Government have been unfortunate in many circumstances over which they have no control. The introduction of this measure was undoubtedly sudden and without previous warning. It was apparently introduced to meet partially a most unreasonable demand coming from a most unreasonable man. And, lastly, my Lords, it was introduced at a time when Ireland had been the victim of one of the most unprincipled agitations which have ever vexed the melancholy ocean of Irish politics. These are all circumstances which surrounded the Bill with fear and suspicion. I am not going to say anything, as far as I can help it, of a controversial or polemical nature. I think it is all the more the duty of the Government to maintain the strictest moderation of language, because I cannot forget that on the great question of land in Ireland we are playing with edged tools—with fire at the door of a powder magazine. During the course of this debate I have observed that fear and suspicion have had a large part in the arguments adduced against the Bill. It is not so much the immediate fear of this particular measure, as the ultimate results it may lead to, and, as it is called, the principles it involves, that have inspired the opposition of noble Lords opposite, and of my noble Friend behind me. And, therefore, I desire in the first place, to say a few words as to what this Bill is not, before I say what I conceive this Bill to be. First, then, this Bill is not intended by Her Majesty's Government—as some observations that have fallen from noble Lords opposite lead me to believe they fear it is—as a prelude and a preparation for an attack on the settlement of 1870. I confess that this is a point on which I am extremely sensible. We are practically the same Government as that which brought in the Act of 1870. There are a few personal differences in the Cabinet; but, practically, we are the same Government, and we represent the same Party. I am bound to admit that we introduced that Bill and carried it through Parliament, assuring this and the other House that, so far as we were concerned, we intended it to be, and hoped it would be, something like a final settlement of the Irish Land Question. It is only 10 years since that Act was passed. We have been out of Office for five years; and if it were really to be the case that every time the Liberal Party is out of Office and comes back again into power some great reconstruction of the Irish Land Act is to be expected, I should have little hope of the condition of Ireland. But I do not understand why this expectation has been held out or formed in regard to the present Government. I very much doubt whether you will find in the whole of the speeches of Mr. Gladstone during "the Mid Lothian Campaign," as it is popularly called, one single sentence that held out the hope or the expectation that we were going to attempt the reconstruction of the Irish Land Act of 1870. It is perfectly true that a general expectation has been formed in regard to a portion of that Act—namely, the Purchase Clauses, commonly called the "Bright Clauses"—which have notoriously failed from accidental causes, that they would be taken into serious consideration, and, if possible, that a remedy would be found for the failure of those clauses. The noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury), who spoke last night against the measure now under discussion, and who was one of the most strenuous opponents of the Act of 1870, was in favour of those clauses; and many Conservatives have been of opinion that it would have been a wise thing if the number of the proprietors could have been increased and the "garrison of property" strengthened in Ireland. Therefore, whatever decision the Government may come to, no one would say that any measure on that question would be unsettlement of that Act. There is an enormous difference between that part of the Act and other parts. The other parts do undoubtedly interfere with the pre-existing rights of property, and I always hold that there is an enormous difference between an Act which purports to give property to the peasantry of Ireland by purchase and another Act which gives it without purchase. Now, the present Government and the late Government have appointed Commissions to inquire into Agricultural Distress, and into the operations of the Land Laws in Ireland; and I conclude, therefore, that the noble Lords opposite are willing to take into their consideration any evidence that may be produced by the Commission which they issued or the one which we issued; and I was rather surprised to hear from the noble and learned Earl (Earl Cairns) to-night an intimation that he, for one, was willing to take into consideration very large changes indeed in the relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland. I understood him to intimate that he was willing to consider—favourably even—such a measure as the extension to the whole of Ireland of the Ulster Custom, which has been established so long in the North.

EARL CAIRNS: I did not say "consider favourably."

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: He used the expression "any statesmanlike plan such as that"—meaning the Ulster Custom. [Earl Cairns: Hear, hear!] Well, what does that mean? I am not sure that I did not suspect the noble Earl of having taken a leaf out of the book of his distinguished Leader, and of having begun to educate his Party on this question. At all events, he is willing to consider any statesmanlike plan for the extension of the Ulster Custom to the whole of Ireland. If that is the case, I can only say there is no possible difference as to the whole question of the Land Act being open for consideration, if adequate proof can be given that the Land Act has failed of its object. But, for the present, I am not prepared to say that the Land Act of 1870 has failed. I believe that, on the whole, it has worked fairly; and unless the strongest evidence is produced in favour of the conclusion that it has fallen short, I, for one, should be very unwilling to disturb it. There is another declaration I should like to make as regards what this Bill is not. It is not intended by the Government to set up any principle applicable to permanent legislation. I must say that there is a good deal of fallacy used on both sides of the House about what is called "the principle" of this measure. After all, legislation is not one of the exact sciences. I think it most dangerous to say of any measure that because you adopt a little bit of a certain principle which, if carried further, would be bad and unjust, that, therefore, when you carry it a small way it is equally bad and unjust. All our institutions are full of "germs," and it has been truly said that if we followed them out we might convert our limited into an absolute Monarchy, or into a Republic. We must beware of this reasoning. With respect to the freedom of contract, the Act of 1870 does place in the hands of the County Courts in Ireland a certain power of judging of the exorbitancy or non-exorbitancy of rent; but it would be a different thing to give to those Courts the power of valuing rents all over Ireland. It is not a true opinion to say that this Bill involves the same abstract principle, and that, therefore, it must be condemned as dangerous and bad. The danger of this is that it is exactly the argument taken up by Mr. Parnell. He says that the Act of 1870 was useful in this way. He says it was full of what he calls "germs;" but then these germs were placed under such limitations that practically they are useless. The limitations were a part of the principle, and an essential part of the principle; and I am not to be told that because I carry that principle a short way I am bound to carry it a greater way. I repudiate it when I find it in the mouth of Mr. Parnell, and I repudiate it when I find it in the mouths of noble Lords opposite. Now, with regard to this Bill, I contend that this Bill, as a whole, cannot set up any principle whatever. Let me read the Preamble, and see whether we can get out of that any principle which we are bound to carry into permanent legislation:—

“Whereas, having regard to the distress existing in certain parts of Ireland, arising from failure of crops, it is expedient to make temporary provision with respect to compensation of tenants for disturbance by ejectment for non-payment of rent in certain cases.”

Now, there are so many limitations to whatever principle you may think there is in this Bill, that those limitations absolutely preclude this House from being committed to the further application of any principle which may be traced in the operation of the Bill. I, for one, should not be a party to the measure if it had been applied to the whole of Ireland, to tenancies of all sizes, and if applied for all time. The whole structure, the whole character of the Bill, stamps it as a provisional, temporary, exceptional measure. And I must entirely deny the accuracy of the quotations made by the noble and learned Earl (Earl Cairns) in the course of his speech from the speeches of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister never said that this Bill was the legitimate development of the Land Act. He may have said that it was the spirit of the Land Act applied to particular and exceptional circumstances; but he never said what the noble and learned Earl attributed to him—that it was the legitimate extension and development of the Land Act.

EARL CAIRNS: Illegitimate.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: Illegitimate? No, he certainly did not say that. I wish further to say, so far as I am concerned, and the whole of the Government is concerned, that this Bill does not aim at breaking down any principle now established in the law. I refer particularly to the principle which limits the tenant's interest to the condition of the payment of rent. Many observations have been made by noble Lords opposite urging that the interest which was given to the tenant by the Act of 1870 was strictly dependent upon the payment of rent. I entirely admit that principle. I think that is perfectly true, and I am bound to say that I look upon it as having been a fundamental condition. In equity it ought to be so; under all ordinary circumstances the interest of the tenant given him by that Act should be dependent upon the continuance of his performance of his part of the bargain. But are there to be no exceptions to this general principle? Will you hold rigidly to this, and under no exceptional circumstances, which fairly may be thought temporary, depart from it? I think that would be a hard line to take up.

My Lords, having said so much about what the Bill is not, I shall venture to direct attention to what I conceive the Bill to be. It is a Bill to provide for very extraordinary and very exceptional circumstances. The noble and learned Earl began his speech by saying he should direct the attention of the House to the facts which were relevant to the Bill; but then he went on to confine his attention solely to a certain class of facts, and he omitted wholly another class of facts which have a very important bearing on this question. Indeed, during the whole of this discussion I heard no allusion made to the peculiar circumstances and character of Irish holdings. In these circumstances, and in the character of these holdings, I find my own excuse for departing from the general principle in respect to the sacredness of contract. Various passages have been quoted from a pamphlet I published through the agency of the Cobden Club three or four years ago; but what I there said was intended to apply to farmers, being capitalists, who had entered into written or verbal contracts with their landlords; and, as applied to that class of men, I hold to every word which I then wrote. Have your Lordships fully realized the nature of the holdings with which you have to deal? At the passing of the Land Act, the whole holdings of Ireland numbered 600,000. They are now considerably reduced, being not much more than 575,000. Of these, what do you think is the proportion of what may be called the poor and almost cottier tenements? In Ireland there are no less than 300,000 holdings under £8 valuation, which may be taken at £10 or £12 rental. Now those tenants represent at least 1,500,000 people, all of them nearly tenants at will and liable to eviction or ejectment from year to year. What is the value of their holdings? Under £8 valuation. The noble Marquess told us, last night, there were 174,000 holdings, not only under £8, but a great deal more than half of them were under £4 or £5 valuation. Now, just conceive the state of things you have to deal with there. There is no analogy in Scotland or England, or, I believe, in any part of the civilized world. It is nonsense to talk of these tenants as having made contracts in the same sense in which Scotch or English capitalists have made them. Still, it may be said, they hold by contract. What is the condition of these men as regards their agriculture? Here is a description given of it by Professor Baldwin, of Dublin—

“During the last 14 years I have been over thousands of them, and, taking a typical case, there will be a plot of potatoes, a plot of feeding roots, and the rest in indifferent pasture or herbage. The average would be more weeds than grass. There is no rotation of crops, no principle of cropping observed at all. The potatoes and oats are grown almost so long that the land is really tired of these crops, and hence the fearful extent of the disease in the potatoes which prevails in Ireland.”

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: My Lords, I object to the noble Duke reading what I believe to be part of the evidence given before the Royal Commission on Agriculture, over which I have the honour to preside, and which has not yet reported.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I think I have a perfect right to quote the paper by Professor Baldwin. It is not a disputable fact. Everybody knows it describes the general condition of the small tenant farmer in Ireland. [“No, no!”] I speak generally of the poorer class of tenants in the West of Ireland in the Schedules of this Bill. A very interesting pamphlet has been published within the last few days by Mr. Tuke, who assisted Mr. Forster in relieving the distress in 1847-8. He gives an account very much the same of the agriculture of these tenants. First of all, there is the permanent exception which places the West Coast of Ireland in a condition with which nothing in England or Scotland, or any part of the earth I know of, can compare; next, I must say, noble Lords opposite have treated very lightly and superficially the great question of agricultural distress. We have had supervening on this permanent condition of a large part of the Irish tenantry three of the worst years that have been known in this century—1877-8-9. We know what the effect of those disastrous years was on the capitalized farmers of England and Scotland. We know how farms have been going a-begging, and how, in some parts of Scotland, a reduction has been made off the rent of 25, 30—aye, in some instances I have known as much as 50 per cent. If this be so, I must ask the House what must have been the effect of those years on the cottier tenantry of Ireland, with their lazy and ignorant cultivation? In Ireland we have an admirable system of agricultural statistics, which I wish we had in England and Scotland. I hold in my hand from an official source the average value of the potato crop during six years before the disastrous years 1871 to 1876; the average value of the potato crop in Ireland during those six years was £9,251,000. Now, what happened? The value of the potato crop in 1877 was less than the average by £3,989,000; in 1878 by £1,671,000; in 1879 it rose again to the enormous figure of £4,626,000; making a total direct loss in those three years to the tenantry of Ireland of a sum of £10,286,000. In addition to that you had a loss, especially in Connaught, of the wages of labour, on which many of the poor cottier tenantry almost entirely depend. That loss may be calculated at £250,000 in 1879 alone. Then there was a considerable deficiency in the oat crop; and, especially on the coast of Donegal, the fishery for several years had fallen off. During those three years, therefore, there had been a loss of £12,000,000 or £13,000,000, affecting the poor cottier tenantry of Ireland, and involving them in inevitable agricultural distress. The Land Act did establish for these poor cottier tenants an exceptional case. Unquestionably it was the intention of the Act that the tenantry of Ireland should have some compensation for capricious removal from their farms on the condition of the payment of rent. Would it be fair, on account of these exceptional years, to deprive them of their whole interest because they could not pay their rent? I am sure not one of your Lordships, who is an Irish landlord, would take advantage of such a state of things, and eject his tenants on account of such circumstances. But, my Lords, there are some landlords in Ireland who might take advantage of such a state of things and who would evict their tenants without giving a single shilling of compensation. The Government had to consider this population of small tenants numbering 1,500,000, who were actually at the mercy of the landlords of Ireland. Now, it has been asked whether we know of any cases in which the landlords have taken advantage of this state of things. My noble Friend behind me (Earl Granville), in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it was a very delicate thing to mention such cases, because we might be holding up individuals to odium, and possibly to outrage. The House will feel, therefore, that the Members of the Government speak under great reserve of these matters; but I must say frankly that there have been some cases in which individual landlords have shown a disposition to make wholesale evictions for non-payment of rent, where that non-payment was clearly due to the failure of crops. There was one case which became public in the newspapers, and which I have, therefore, the less delicacy in mentioning. I do not know even the name of the landlord, but I rather think he was a purchaser under the Encumbered Estates Court. Before I mention this case in detail I wish to make a single observation with regard to a distinction sometimes drawn between landlords who have bought their estates in the Encumbered Estates Court and the hereditary proprietors of Ireland. My noble Friend the noble Marquess dwelt upon that distinction, and asked—“Are you really going to interfere with the operations of property in cases where the State has held out in a measure a State guarantee, has published a certain rental, and has induced capitalists to invest their capital on the strength of that statement?” Now, my Lords, I, for one, entirely deny that there is any greater sacredness of property due to this class of owners than to your Lordships, who may have held your estates for 300 or 400 years. I do not think the State gave these men any guarantee as to the social relations and condition of Ireland, which were perfectly known to all. These owners have the same rights as your Lordships have, and no more; and I entirely deny that there is any greater sacredness of property in their case than in that of any other persons. Now, all the cases of inconsiderate evictions belong almost exclusively to this class of proprietors. And it is not to be wondered at. Having no old associations, no particular affection for the people, they do not carry on the traditions of the hereditary proprietors of Ireland. They have bought as an investment, and they are naturally disposed to carry the rights of property to the greatest extremity. The case I am about to mention shows the danger of the injudicious exercise of the rights of property. The place is called Curraroe, in the county of Galway. On the whole townland there were 89 tenants, with families numbering in the whole 515 souls. Their rent was £137 7s., or about 30s. each. They were of the smallest class of occupiers. There were 1,334 acres in the townland, of which 110 were arable, under crop. The whole stock of the farms consisted of only four horses, 110 cattle, 62 sheep, and 14 pigs. The total valuation of the stock and crop—everything—was £1,423, or about £2 15s. for every soul in the townland. One-twelfth of the acreage was arable. I think that was a case clearly in which the tenantry were so reduced, as you may see from the valuation of their stock and crop, that it was impossible they could pay their rent after the three years of the worst harvests we have had for a long period. In this case notices of eviction were served, I rather think, in the time of the late Government, but were enforced, or attempted to be enforced, by, I believe, only 20 men. There was a general resistance to the service of those ejectments; and since we came into Office the Irish Government had to reinforce the police in the place to the extent of 200 men. You had in that case at the mercy of the landowner a whole population of upwards of 500 souls, who, under the existing law, would have been evicted without one shilling of compensation, without one shilling to carry them to America, because they were evicted for non-payment of rent. What is the significance of these facts? They show that there is in Ireland, owing to accidental and purely exceptional circumstances, a danger of a very serious kind. You might in that case have great indignation excited which might raise very serious disquiet among the Irish people. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Waterford), one of the best resident landlords in Ireland, who addressed your Lordships for the first time last night in a speech to which we all listened with the highest admiration and respect, told us that he accepted the Land Act very willingly, and gave his testimony to the good effects of it. He said he had always practised on his own estate the principles laid down in the Act, and he looked upon it as an Act which would compel bad landlords to do what good landlords did of their own accord. My noble Friend (the Duke of Somerset) quoted a passage in which I condemned that principle as a guide to legislation. I condemn it still. But now may I not ask the noble Marquess, who spoke with so much candour last night, whether it might not be expedient in the interests of peace in Ireland to prevent such cases as those I have referred to, of persons exercising extreme rights of property under the extremely exceptional circumstances which have been proved to exist in the West of Ireland? That is the whole principle of the measure; there is no other principle in it. It is a temporary measure, to meet circumstances which I have proved out of documents to be exceptional. Now, with regard to another point, I quite agree with the noble Viscount who spoke last (Viscount Cranbrook) that the particular area over which this Bill is to extend is in a great measure a matter of detail. There has been some confusion to-night between the area of agricultural distress and the area of what may be called famine distress; and it has been constantly shown that, as far as regards the relaxation of the Poor Law, the area of famine distress has been now restricted so as to be practically extinct. But as for the agricultural area, it is impossible that the poor cottier who has been reduced to distress can have recovered himself within the last few months. Noble Lords opposite say that if we were to give relief to any particular part of the population of Ireland we ought to do so, not at the exclusive expense of the landowners, but partly also at the public cost. I admit that principle; but I must contend that the public have shown a disposition to help the landlords by very exceptional measures. First of all, you have loans so cheap that a great landowner told me that the money was virtually given away. I feel sure that many noble Lords have taken advantage of those loans solely for the benevolent purpose of giving employment to their people; at the same time, when the money was to be had on ordinary conditions the loans were not so frequently accepted, while, when the terms were lowered by 1 per cent, there was a great rush of landowners to take possession of them. Again, the districts scheduled under the Act were many of them scheduled at the demand of the landlords themselves. I say that these are exceptional measures, and the public have shown an exceptional disposition to meet the wishes of the landlords. Then, look at the relaxation of the Poor Law. Can there be a more objectionable measure than the relaxation of those conditions which are necessary to prevent the Poor Law from becoming the greatest possible abuse? That relaxation was allowed in order that landowners might be able to put upon the rates every one of their small tenants who required relief. But is this no action on the part of Parliament to enable the landlords to meet their difficulties. Then take the third case of the Seed Potatoes Act, and bear in mind that the landlords themselves will, to a great extent, be benefited by it. This being so, as I have shown, why object to exceptional principles only when the extreme rights of property are suspended for a moment for an exceptional purpose? During the course of this debate we have had several suggestions as to the true way of dealing with the difficulties of the Irish people. We have had a suggestion from the noble Earl behind me (the Earl of Dunraven) that the State should undertake and assist the emigration of these poor people to America; and from the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Waterford) that the State should endeavour to establish the manufacturing industries of Ireland. The State has assisted the landowners in three exceptional ways, and the landowners are never tired—and I do not blame them—of suggesting that the State should further assist them by other measures. I do not wish to exclude from the consideration of the Government any possible suggestion that may be made; but I believe in regard to emigration that, though it may possibly be assisted by loans, the burdens of emigrating the poor tenants in Ireland, as in England and Scotland, must fall mainly on the landlords. At one time part of Scotland was in an equally distressed condition, though we never had to deal with political distemper, but always with an amiable, an affectionate, and law-abiding people; but we have always had to assist the emigration of the Highland population to Canada, and it has been done with the best results. The same may, perhaps, be done in Ireland. I do not deny that the small cottier tenancies are in a most unwholesome condition, and I believe there will be no permanent prosperity in Ireland unless they to some extent consolidate their holdings. All will agree with me, however, that the whole penalty for a state of things dating back from many centuries—a condition of things in which the landowners have been to blame, and the tenantry to blame, and the British Parliament to blame—ought not to be visited upon the present generation of the cottier class. But the whole of the penalties would be visited upon them if they were thrown on the poor rates or evicted from their holdings, with no alternative, and had no means of emigration at hand. These are the conditions in which Her Majesty's Government have thought it well to bring in this Bill. They mean it to relieve an exceptional calamity, and to prevent that calamity from being made a source of dangerous political agitation. This brings me to one of the last points with which I shall trouble the House. It is the relation between this Bill and the land agitation in Ireland. Almost every noble Lord who has spoken from the opposite side of the House has tried to enlist the fears, and the prejudices, and the just indignation, felt against that agitation, and to point it against this Bill. No one who has watched the progress of the Bill through the other House—who remembers the declarations of the Government, and the limitations with which the Bill was guarded, can think that that agitation influenced their views. The Bill will affect, in by far the greater number of instances, the smallest cottier class, and it was so carefully framed that there was no danger of its sanctioning a principle to be adopted in permanent legislation.

The Duke of Argyll

Look at the violent attacks made in the other House of Parliament in order to do away with those limitations, and your Lordships will understand the significance they have in this point of view. The limitation of area to particular parts of Ireland, especially including the Western coasts; the limitation of a Bill to certain districts admitted by Parliament to be the centres of agricultural distress, although not of famine; the limitation to a very small class of tenantry, including the far larger proportion of the cottier tenantry—all these limitations are essential parts of the principles of this Bill, and they make it impossible for any man to say that Parliament is sanctioning, or has sanctioned, the extension of those principles as permanent principles of legislation. All the attempts of Mr. Parnell were resisted by the Government and defeated by overwhelming majorities of the House of Commons, and the Bill comes to your Lordships having all these limitations in it, which you may, if you like, carry further in the Committee of this House. I will appeal to the House whether, in view of this agitation, the rejection of this Bill will not add fuel to the flame. It is perfectly true that there is a very small minority of landowners who are dealing harshly or inconsiderately with their tenants; but if only one or two cases occur, such as I have mentioned, they will be quoted by these mischievous agitators as if they were illustrations of the ordinary operation of the existing law. I cannot for a moment doubt that if it were possible to prevent such cases it would be a great blow to agitators in Ireland. There is one practical point on which there has been great misapprehension. The noble and learned Earl who spoke to-night (Earl Cairns) passed over this point so lightly that I could not help suspecting it to be one of the many artifices of his rhetoric. He said he would not dwell on the argument that this Bill was intended to prevent evictions. Of course, it is intended somewhat to limit their number; but it certainly is not intended to prevent them in all cases. There is a great deal of misunderstanding as to the extent to which the Bill can prevent them. This Bill does not prevent a landlord from evicting for non-payment of rent; but it places it in the power of the Court to impose a fine on the operation, and to give to the evicted tenant the statutory scale of compensation. Suppose, as was represented, a tenant who should impose on the Court by falsely representing that he was unable to pay his rent—say £10. The Act requires him to prove that his inability to pay is solely due to the late failure of crops. Even supposing that he succeeds in deceiving the Judge, he would have a chance, in extreme cases, of getting £70 and being turned out of his holding. Was it reasonable to believe that, for the sake of some £60 or £70 compensation, he would run the risk of being evicted from his holding in case he escaped detection for falsehood? You think that a great temptation to such men. [“Hear!”] I am glad to hear it. If a large number of cottier tenants in Ireland are willing to forego their holdings, the landlord will have easy work of it in the consolidation of their farms. [Laughter.] The noble and learned Lord laughs; but with my experience in Scotland, where we have had to emigrate a very considerable number of poor cottier tenants, we were obliged to give larger sums than that for the conveyance of themselves and their families. But the tenantry of Ireland have such a love of their homes that they would submit to anything rather than be detached from the spot where they are brought up. As an illustration of the tenacity with which they cling to their possessions, I have some evidence here which is very curious, and almost incredible. Here is the case of a tenant who paid £5 a-year of rent, paying £125 for the goodwill of his farm; another tenant paying 7s. 6d. of rent who paid £90 for the goodwill of his farm, and a third paying 10s. of rent who paid £80 for the goodwill of his farm. Now, that was a measure of the tenacity with which the Irish tenant holds to the soil—a tenacity which I will venture to call irrational as well as unhealthy, and I am convinced that he will never run the risk of losing his holding on the chance of obtaining a sum of £50 or £60. I wish to say a few words with regard to the future of Ireland. In the family which has been referred to by my noble Friend I find this curious story told. The narrator of it was visiting one of the cottier tenants in Connaught who paid a rent of £6. He had no cow, no calf, no ewe, nor lamb, but he had a loom, and was sitting upon it; but there was no woof and no warp in it, and he was mechanically moving the frame backwards and forwards. When I read that the night before last, I could not help asking myself—Is this a real story or an allegory? Are we in the condition of this poor weaver? Are we moving backward and forward the framework of our laws for Ireland to no purpose and in vain? Are we for ever working at an empty loom and driving an empty shuttle? Has there been no result from all the attempts of Parliament to remedy the grievances of the Irish people? I can well understand that many of us can have a feeling of despair when every few years we have a recurrence of these miserable agitations, when we have the same difficulty and are dealing with the same miseries of the Irish people. But I rejoice to feel a firm confidence that this sense of occasional despair would now be unwise and irrational. Mr. Tuke, in his pamphlet, gives many evidences of a great change for the better in the material condition of the people. Where, 30 years ago, misery and want prevailed, he now finds busy market places and a happy and industrious population. By carefully making the law just and merciful, under all the circumstances of the case, may we not hope that the whole Island will be as happy and as prosperous as a large portion of it now is? I should deeply regret it were this House to deprive the Government of an assistance which I believe will be valuable in resisting agitation, and in enabling us to enforce the law with a better conscience than we can at present. But I will say this also—that, whatever may be the decision of this House, it will be our duty to do the best we can to uphold the existing law, whatever it may be, throughout the whole of Ireland.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: My Lords, the measure we are called upon to consider to-night, and the second reading of which has been moved by the noble Earl, is very brief in its terms. It consists of only three clauses; but they are clauses which, in their consideration, require some recurrence to the past, some deep attention to the urgent present, and scarcely can be touched upon without some speculation upon the consequences to which, if the Bill is adopted, they will lead. My Lords, the origin of the question of landlord and tenant in Ireland in modern days was the famous Devon Commission. In the Report of that Commission, drawn up by men admirably qualified for their office, and one of the most valuable Reports which was ever presented to the consideration of Parliament—in that great source of information on a question the most complicated probably of the public questions that can engage the attention of the Legislature, all the information which, during subsequent years, astonished, alarmed, and engaged the attention of the country, was furnished, and is to be found. From the moment the Report of the Devon Commission was presented to Parliament for its consideration, there was a general feeling among the public men of both the great Parties of the State that the subject was one which would require legislation, and that legislation of a comprehensive and most careful character. To effect the improvements of the condition of the Irish people there laid down as necessary, and, at the same time, to reconcile any changes that might be deemed expedient with that respect for the rights of property which all wise men know is the main basis of liberty and civilization, were questions which engaged the attention of the late and the present generation. Some delay may have occurred in coming to any general conclusions on the matter; but that delay may have been occasioned by the difficulty and vastness of the questions which had to be considered; and no doubt, by that system of Party government in this country among whose many advantages may be accounted certainly not this—that it often leads to delay in the settlement of affairs of an exigent nature. But I may remind your Lordships that so early as the year 1852, after some attempts had been made—but not of a very large character—to legislate for the state of Ireland, founded on the conclusions recommended by the Devon Commission, a Government was formed in this country, of which I had the honour to be a Member, which resolved to deal with this question, and, if possible, to grapple with it. I always read quotations from Hansard with regret; but the quotation to which I am about to refer is not long; it offers no opinion, but, at the same time, it expresses, in so condensed a form, the situation of the question of the state of Ireland with respect to the Devon Commission that I hope your Lordships will permit me to read it. These remarks were made in the discussion of the Land Bill of 1870, introduced into the House of Commons. In 1852, and in the preceding year, legislation had been proposed for the purpose of remedying that state of society on which the noble Duke has dilated with so much force and at such length. [The Duke of ARGYLL: Not three hours.] I said—

The Earl of Beaconsfield

“Now, Sir, let me remind the House of what they have probably forgotten—namely, what was proposed in reference to this subject by the Government of 1852, with which I had the honour to be connected. We laid upon the Table of the House four Bills, forming a complete code as regards the land of Ireland. I can describe those four Bills in a sentence. They adopted every recommendation of the Devon Commission. Sir, if those Bills had passed we should not now have been discussing the measure of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. Circumstances, however, occurred which prevented these Bills from passing. There was a change of Government. Yet, in the interval that elapsed between the end of 1852 and the year 1860, what occurred with regard to legislation in respect of the land of Ireland? Every provision of these four Bills, with one vital exception, passed piecemeal during that interval. The limited owner was invested with power to make improvements, and to charge them upon the inheritance. That was a leading principle in one of the four Bills which I have said were laid upon the Table. Before two years it was passed. The leasing powers of the Irish proprietor generally were proposed to be extended. That was passed. The limited owner was permitted to enter into contracts with the tenant. That was passed. A consolidation and code of all the laws relating to landlord and tenant in Ireland was successfully passed by Sir Joseph Napier, although in Opposition, in 1860; and that code and consolidation includes many valuable amendments of the law. The particular Bill which we brought forward in 1852, which would have regulated the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland, was referred, after the fall of our Government, to a Select Committee. The labours of that Select Committee I will not dwell upon, because it would weary the House, and time will not permit. They experienced various complications and many strange vicissitudes; but this was the result—every provision in the Bill that we brought forward to regulate the relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland was adopted by that Committee, with one vital exception, and a Bill was at last passed in 1860 to regulate those relations, with the omission of what I consider to be a vital clause in the Bill of 1852—namely, that which gave compensation to the tenant for improvements, and retrospective compensation.”—[3 Hansard, cxcix. 1810-11.]

I will not read further; but I do not think, after what I have just read, that the noble Duke was justified in giving us a description of the condition of Ireland which may be found really in the pages of the Report of the Devon Commission, made between 40 and 50 years ago, while he gives no credit whatever for the series of legislative measures previous to 1870 to which I have adverted. There is no doubt that there has been a great improvement in the condition of the people of Ireland since that time. There has been, no doubt, the occasional and unhappy recurrence of famine—but this has resulted from bad harvests and a variable climate. And then the noble Duke, with some inconsistency, after having dilated upon the picture of a miserable condition of Ireland—which is a picture of its condition more than 40 years ago—terminates his speech by a description of its buoyant prosperity which certainly we have a right to suppose has been consequent upon the legislation of the British Parliament. The House is apt to forget these things. We live in an age so rapid that we have got into a habit of forgetting what took place as recently as five years ago; and the Devon Commission, which is a most important Parliamentary event, and which has had the greatest influence upon the relations between landlord and tenant, and the general welfare of the Empire, is probably known to few and forgotten by many. It was in 1870 that the Land Act was introduced in the House of Commons by the present Prime Minister. What was our conduct in Opposition upon that occasion? From the speeches of the noble Duke, and other noble Lords who have addressed the House, you would suppose the Tory Party had never made the slightest effort to improve the condition of the people of Ireland. You would suppose that they had listened in mute silence, or shown active opposition, to every proposal which ever had been made on the subject, and that these proposals had only been made by Her Majesty's present Government. On the contrary, I wish Parliament to remember that we ourselves in 1852 brought forward four Bills that would have formed a complete Code for Ireland, founded upon the recommendations of the Devon Commission—that not one single recommendation of that Commission was omitted—that the course of legislation which afterwards brought about the same result as was then contemplated, though we had not the honour of initiating it, was universally supported by the Tory Party—and, lastly, that every improvement in the relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland that has taken place has been assisted by their Parliamentary support and vote. What was our position when the Land Act of 1870 was brought in? Why, my Lords, we might with a very clear conscience, have said—"Our opinions are upon record upon the subject of the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland; we have agreed to the recommendations of the Devon Commission, the highest authority upon the subject, and those recommendations have by our means, and with our assent, been universally adopted. This Bill of 1870 which you bring in is one which appears to us to be unnecessary, when you have not rested a sufficient time to allow the great changes that have been passed to mature and bear those fruits which the country expect;" and we might, if necessary, have plausibly opposed the Bill. But your Lordships will find that that was not the course which we took in Opposition. On the contrary, though there were many provisions in the Act of 1870 which we disapproved, the general policy of that Act was in harmony with the policy which we had always supported, and we consented to the second reading of the Bill without opposition. It is very true that in Committee we endeavoured to enforce those views which the Government had not adopted—or rather the rejection of those opinions which the Government ought not, according to our view, to have adopted; and it is true that a change was made in your Lordships' House—as I think a very salutary change—but it is upon record that the Bill of 1870 was carried in the House of Commons without any resistance on the occasion of the second reading. Though there were provisions to which we had objection, still we were perfectly prepared—and upon that opinion we have always acted—to accept the Bill as a final and conclusive settlement, believing that its final and conclusive character was one of its excellencies. The great object of all this legislation was to produce in Ireland that degree of tranquillity which would encourage the flow of capital from England and Scotland. Well, I believe that it did have a considerable effect in inducing the introduction of new capital; and I am not prepared to say myself at the present moment that there is any portion of the Act of 1870 which I would wish now to be altered. But it is to be altered. We have this short Bill put on the Table. Now, when I read this Bill, I find in it three proposals. I object to these three proposals. My first objection is because it imposes a burden upon a specific class; it acknowledges that it has to deal with a national misfortune, and then—I think most illogically and most unwisely—it proceeds to say that the means by which it will try to remedy the unexpected evils that have occurred shall be means which shall be furnished by only one class in Ireland, and that class not a numerous class, and, above all, a class that is suffering as well as the rest of the population. The second objection to this Bill is that it introduces insecurity into all transactions; and the third objection which I have is that it appoints a public functionary to whom it delegates the extraordinary power of fixing the rents of the country. Now, these are three objections which appear upon the face of the Bill, and which I think all must acknowledge—even those who may ultimately support the measure—to require considerable explanation and considerable hesitation before such proposals can be adopted. They are violations of those principles of public policy which now have been recognized, practised, and pursued by Parliament for half-a-century. And the reasons which are given—the precedents which are alleged—in order to justify this unusual course—appear to me to be weak and entirely unsatisfactory. One of the great faults of those three proposals of the Government is this—that while they pretend to be of a temporary nature, they are essentially, from their character, regulations that must become permanent. And all the precedents which they allege in order to justify this irregular and unusual measure refer to circumstances which are essentially and necessarily of a temporary character. The Seeds Bill, to which the noble Duke alluded, is shown by its very name to be one of a temporary nature. Seed time comes but once a-year, and you know very well that although you may provide seed for one year, if you make no other provision the law is temporary. Again, the extension of relief outside of the workhouse, to which the noble Duke also referred, is a temporary measure, because it is perfectly clear that the country will not submit to an extension of a law of that description the moment the circumstances which forced you to adopt it have changed. And with regard to the third proposal—as to advances of money for a certain time at a certain rate of interest—that is a system which has long prevailed in this country, and we know very well that the capital thus advanced is duly returned to the Treasury, and every year you see the amounts which have been so returned after payment of the interest to the State. Therefore, the three precedents which have been brought forward are no vindication of the proposals with which we are now dealing. Well, my Lords, this question naturally arises. You having introduced a Bill which contradicts all those principles of political and public economy of which you have hitherto been the avowed champions in the State, what is the reason you allege for doing so? What is the cause of the introduction of this measure? Now, it is a most remarkable circumstance that the cause alleged is certainly, were it a true cause, one which, no doubt, must affect the feelings and opinions, perhaps, of many. We are told, and we are told by an authority that cannot be well exceeded, that this measure—which, though slight in form and brief in matter, is one which avowedly interferes with the rights of property—is brought forward in consequence of the fear which the Government have that if not passed we shall have, perhaps, to encounter civil war in Ireland. My Lords, I must say there is no Member of your Lordships' House who would view the occurrence of any events in Ireland of that character with more profound sorrow than myself. These are not words of form. I was a Member of a Government that had to encounter something like civil war in Ireland, and therefore I have some acquaintance with the feelings of responsibility which, under such circumstances, an individual would be subject to. I am sure, had it not been for the firmness of the noble Duke (the Duke of Abercorn), who was then Viceroy in Ireland, the great resources and courage of the ever-lamented Lord Mayo, and—though he is present, I cannot refrain from saying it, because justice requires it—had it not been for the ceaseless vigilance of my right hon. Friend behind me, the noble Viscount (Viscount Cranbrook) who was then Secretary of State, it is possible very great evils might have occurred. My Lords, that insurrection, supported by a powerful and unprincipled foreign conspiracy, failed. It failed, and it terminated, at the same time, by an exercise of clemency on the part of the Sovereign of this country which, under similar circumstances, has never been exceeded or equalled. But, my Lords, if you ask me whether I could consent, for the sake of preventing disturbance of that kind in Ireland, to sacrifice the eternal principles of justice, I should, under these circumstances, be prepared to say, "I will not make that sacrifice." And I believe that if civil war or any disturbance of that kind can only be prevented by the Ministers of this country devising strange and fantastic schemes—which not only interfere with and invade the rights of property, but which lead, in my mind, to the very evil which they wish to prevent, and excite the multitude to the very catastrophe which they hold up to us as a warning—I should resist such a policy. But, my Lords, it is a very strange thing that when we hear accounts given us that the country—that a part of the United Kingdom—is in such a state that if this Bill is not passed by Parliament, we must be prepared in a time—in a measurable time—for civil war, we have no evidence of this desperate state of things. What evidence has been given to Parliament of the possibility of such a fearful state of affairs? We have not been led to believe that such a state of things was possible by the conduct of Her Majesty's Government. When they advised Her Majesty to address her Parliament at the beginning of the Session, they put remarkable words into Her Majesty's Speech. The passage has been read, and, therefore, I will decline to read it now; but I call your Lordships' attention to this particular expression—"But while determined to fulfil this sacred obligation"—which was to provide for the safety of the lives and property of Her Majesty's subjects—

The Earl of Beaconsfield

"I am persuaded that the loyalty and the good sense of my Irish subjects will justify me in relying on the provisions of the ordinary law, firmly administered, for the maintenance of peace and order."

Now, that is a very peculiar expression—"ordinary law." I do not remember ever having met it before in a Royal Speech—and, therefore, there was nothing in the Royal Speech which, for a moment, would lead the people of this country to suppose that such a catastrophe as civil war in Ireland was possible. Well, what happened afterwards? The opening of Parliament took place on the 12th May. The Government had an opportunity of intimating the fearful state of affairs in that country. They introduced a Bill for Irish relief—but there was no indication whatever of this Bill. They advised Her Majesty to issue a Commission to inquire into the Land Laws so lately as the 11th June. Yet all this time elapsed, and the poor people of Great Britain had not the slightest idea of the danger they were in—not the slightest conception of it—for they were assured by the Sovereign that the provisions of "the ordinary law" were all that Her Majesty required to defend their lives and property. When they heard of so innocent an affair as a Royal Commission to inquire into the Land Laws, not the slightest communication was made to Parliament respecting the imminence of civil war. That is not the way in which Parliament should be treated. In, I think, the year 1871—the year after the famous Land Act passed—the present Secretary of State for India, then Chief Secretary for Ireland, came down to the House of Commons and gave a most fearful account of the state of Ireland, and proposed that there should be a Secret Committee to inquire into its condition. It is very true that the House ultimately resisted the Secret Committee, and insisted that its proceedings should be open; but that did not at all alter the previous declaration of the Government that the revelations made to the Committee were of a nature that ought to be secret. Why have we no Committee if we are within a measurable distance of civil war in Ireland? Why have we not had communications made to Parliament of this threatened civil war in Ireland? I think even the present House of Commons would have acceded to a Secret Committee under such circumstances. But neither the House of Commons nor your Lordships' House has had the slightest intimation of such peril, and it is only when this measure is brought forward—originally introduced as a clause in a Bill of charity—that you are informed by the Prime Minister you are within a measurable distance of civil war. My Lords, I believe it is possible there may be disturbance in Ireland, and for this reason—because you have proposed this Bill; whether it be adopted or whether it is rejected, it is a measure calculated to excite the minds of an imaginative people; and if the distress, which I trust may be declining, proceeds in that country, I think it is not impossible that in consequence of the very measures brought forward to avoid civil conflict you may find yourselves involved in trouble and disaster. There is one feature about the present agitation in Ireland which is most repulsive, and, I think, most dangerous. Agitation in Ireland is not a novel subject. During the last generation and the present it has been extremely active. It has taken many forms. It has been led by men of different characters and idiosyncrasies. It has taken the form of Repeal; it has taken the form of Fenianism; it has taken the form of Home Rule; and you may observe that all these movements had over them a varnish, no doubt a mere varnish, of what may be called generous feeling. Even a Fenian was a patriot, or thought he was. When you had to encounter disaffection founded upon such transitory and superficial feeling the Government had a great advantage. The occurrence of material prosperity generally terminated the most active campaign for Repeal or for Home Rule. But if the present agitation is fostered in Ireland, and I believe “this unhappy measure”—to adopt as classical the description which one of its chief supporters gave of it—will have that effect—if, I say, this agitation is fostered by the Government, it is one which will not easily terminate, because it is an agitation addressed to the most sordid character of the Irish people, not to the romantic or imaginative, but, as the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne), who addressed us with so much power, so well expressed it, “to the sordid instincts” of the people. An agitation conducted by men who have been taught to believe that the property of others ought to belong to them, and that if they exert themselves must belong to them—an agitation conducted in such a spirit, and for such a result, is one which Her Majesty's Government will find more difficult to deal with than the agitation of previous years. The noble Duke who has just addressed us (the Duke of Argyll) takes a different view of these affairs. The noble Duke appears to have studied the condition of the Irish people. He has given an interesting narrative to the House—though I am sure he is aware he made no statement which had not been made before, and adduced no facts with which the public mind was not familiar. If, however, I had entered the House at the time, I should not have guessed what was the object of the debate from the speech of the noble Duke. We are all agreed that the condition of Ireland is in some respects pitiable, and that the policy of England should be to elevate the condition of the Irish people. But we believe, also, that for the last 50 years, with almost a continuous effort, that has been the policy of England, pursued by both the great Parties of the State. But I could gather from the arguments of the noble Duke no inference of that nature. The noble Duke said that there was extraordinary agricultural distress in Ireland. Well, it is possible there is. We will admit it. But I cannot understand that the best way of alleviating agricultural distress is by plundering the landlords. The noble Duke brought before the House a subject with which I think he should have dealt either with more reserve or with more frankness, and that was the argument for the necessity of the measure in consequence of there being bad landlords in Ireland—hard, heartless, tyrannical, and cruel. He should have been prepared either to give a detailed statement on that subject, to allege facts, to describe owners, to give names, or I think he should have left the matter alone. Here we are to-night, and the noble Duke tells us there are 173,000 cottier tenants in Ireland, and then he says—“Will you place these men at the mercy of a person who does so-and-so?” I did not catch the name of the person; I do not think the name was given; but the single instance of a bad landlord—and that an anonymous one—is supposed to affect the condition of 173,000 cottiers. There is no proportion between the case alleged by the noble Duke and the remedy he recommends. I know he would not shrink in his view of public duty from making any statement on the subject. The noble Duke commenced his speech by saying that he was going to charge like the "Six Hundred of Crimean fame." If he had been one of the Six Hundred at Balaclava I have no doubt he would have maintained his reputation for courage. I thought he had got in his mind another Six Hundred connected with a place, which, at least, resembles Balaclava in its initial letter. I have now mentioned some of the reasons which induce me to believe that this is a measure which it was unwise on the part of the Government to bring forward, and why I am anxious that the Bill should be rejected. I have shown that the question of the government of Ireland, and of the relations between the landlords and tenants of Ireland, never were, never ought to have been, and I trust never will be, Party questions. I was, therefore, rejoiced to find that it was not left merely to the regular Opposition, whose motives might be—as they always are—misconstrued, to challenge the opinion of your Lordships on this grave subject. Notice was given to move the rejection of the Bill by one who bears an illustrious name, and we learn, from those means of information open to all, that the noble Earl did not stand alone, but that he had some, perhaps many, political friends who sympathized with him. If the Motion of the noble Earl for the rejection of the Bill had been one of which the tendency was in any degree to arrest that great policy, which now for 40 years has been supported by Parliament, with respect to the relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland, I certainly should not have supported it. But brought forward as it is, I feel it is my duty to do so, and that the views of myself and my friends on this subject ought not to be misunderstood. I confess myself that there is one more reason which makes me anxious that this Bill should be rejected, and that is the mode in which it has been introduced to the notice of the country and of Parliament. There have been rumours, ambiguous voices, circulated about for a considerable time, that some large measure was about to be introduced, or would be in due time, which would affect the Constitutional position of the landed interest in our form of Government. Sometimes it was to be a great measure for Ireland; sometimes we were assured upon authority—though not the highest—that England would not escape the careful consideration of Her Majesty's Ministers. Upon every occasion there have always been some of their many supporters in Parliament who have exulted at the introduction of such a Bill, and who have announced, not only their hope, but their conviction, that the Ministers next year would deal in the same spirit, but in a far larger way, with the question of land in England. A Gentleman, the other day, was summoned to one of the greatest honours of the State—to be a Member of Her Majesty's Privy Council—he, himself, a distinguished Member of Parliament, and once a Member of the Administration; and, after he had taken his seat at the Board accordingly, he went to another Board—to a political dinner, presided over by no less a personage than the Lord President of the Council, and here the new Privy Councillor, in language of the most inflammatory character, denounced the landed interest, denounced the landlords of England, and said that what they call the Liberals had got a majority of the Cabinet in their favour, and next year there would be a complete revolution of the Land Laws of England. The Lord President of the Council on that occasion did not reply to his right hon. Friend; and, so far as we can judge, the views of his right hon. Friend had the moral support certainly of his presence, and, as we fear, of his convictions. I know well there is a Party hostile, and avowedly hostile, to that Constitutional position which in our system of Government had been accorded to the landed interest. They are men who would sooner see a Government established by the application of abstract principles than resting upon the influence of tradition and upon the fitness that results from experience. I do not believe this is a numerous Party, but it is an intellectual Party. It is intelligent and persevering, and it is actuated by that enthusiasm which novelty inspires, and by all that energy which, I believe, is characteristic of minorities. This is the first time in the history of England that the Leaders of such a Party have found a seat in the Councils of the Queen. My Lords, I look upon this Bill as being what military men would call a reconnaissance in force. It is a reconnaissance in force to see what is the feeling of Parliament and of the people of England upon the present tenure of land in England and upon the Constitutional position in our system of government of the landed interest. It has been a most effective reconnaissance, though I cannot say it has been a very successful one. If they wished to know what is the opinion of the colossal majority of 170 in the House of Commons, gained at the last General Election, with regard to this subject, they have learned that two-thirds of that majority on that occasion either kept away or voted against them. They have learned also that the Bill has been sent up to this House by a majority consisting merely of that section of the Members of the House of Commons who treat the Bill itself avowedly with contempt, and who, with gratuitous candour, tell us they only adopt it because they consider it merely as a step to assist them in the transference of the soil from the legal possessor to the casual occupier. I know well that it is difficult to persuade some minds that the opinions which are now circulated with great confidence are opinions that ought to be resisted by all those who love the greatness and the glory of their country. There is, at the present day, too great a tendency to believe that it is impossible to resist the progress of a new idea. There is a fashionable phrase now that everything is inevitable, and that every event is the production of a commanding force of Nature which human will cannot resist. The despotism of public opinion is in everybody's mouth. But I should like to know, when we are called upon to bow to this public opinion, who will define public opinion. My Lords, any human conclusion that is arrived at with adequate knowledge and with sufficient thought is entitled to respect, and the public opinion of a great nation under such conditions is irresistible, and ought to be so. But what we call public opinion is generally public sentiment. We who live in this busy age and in this busy country know very well how few there are who can obtain even the knowledge necessary for the comprehension of high political subjects, and how much fewer there are who, having obtained that knowledge, can supply the thought which would mature it into opinion. No, my Lords, it is public sentiment, not public opinion, and frequently it is public passion. My Lords, you are now called upon to legislate is a heedless spirit, by false representations of what is called the public mind. This Bill is only the first in a series, the result of which will be to change the character of this country and of the Constitution of this country. The argument that you cannot stop upon this ground, urged by my noble and learned Friend (Earl Cairns), has never been answered. If you intend to stop upon it you were not justified in making this proposition. The proposition is one, I think, most dangerous to the country, and I trust your Lordships will this night reject it. If you do that you will do a deed for which your country will be grateful, and of which your posterity will be proud.

The Earl of Beaconsfield

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, if your Lordships will permit me to make a few observations on the debate which is now about to close, I shall not try your Lordships' patience for more than a very few minutes. The noble and learned Earl who began the debate this evening said that he should discard all strong words and exaggerations. It is just possible he may have left the strong words to his late Colleague, the former Secretary of State for War. The noble Earl who has just sat down was, as was natural, cheered repeatedly by his supporters, who owe him so much; but there was one part of his speech which was received with no audible signs of acquiescence, when, in language of a rather rhetorical and exaggerated character, he pointed out that it was absolutely necessary that we should prove that we were actually on the brink of civil war because we asked for an exceptional measure to avoid our being obliged to meet this period of distress, accompanied by a certain amount of disorder, with various irritating measures. The noble Earl stated that the Land Act of 1870 was entirely in unison with Tory principles and supported entirely by Tory votes. All I can say is, that the noble Earl ought to have educated some of his friends a little earlier than he did. His observations have not been those of old Conservatives, and even his own Chief Secretary for Ireland, Mr. J. Lowther, has missed no opportunity, in or out of Parliament, of denouncing in the strongest manner the revolutionary character of the Land Act of 1870. The noble and learned Earl who resumed the debate this evening did not, for-fortunately for the House, confine himself, as he had promised, to facts and figures, but enlivened his three hours' speech with a liberal allowance of arguments and inferences. The noble and learned Earl tried to throw something like ridicule on the figures which I had quoted on the previous evening, by saying that the number of evictions in the scheduled districts was less than in the unscheduled. This was not the case, although from the manner in which the noble and learned Lord manipulated his figures it might have appeared so. His comparison of the scheduled and unscheduled districts induces me to contribute a few facts and figures to the debate. I find by the very latest official Returns, issued a couple of days ago, that in 1877 there were in the unscheduled districts only 58 evictions, while in the scheduled districts there were 203. These figures in the following year had increased to 92 and 516 respectively. In the next year the numbers in the unscheduled counties were 215, while in the scheduled counties they rose to 668. That was in 1879; and we now come to the half-year of 1880, when I find they fell from 215 to 203 in the unscheduled counties; whereas in the scheduled counties they increased to 792, all of them being evictions for non-payment of rent.

The Earl of Beaconsfield

EARL CAIRNS said, those figures did not agree with those he had taken from the latest Returns forwarded by the Government with regard to the Provinces of Munster and Connaught, which might be regarded as constituting the scheduled portion of Ireland.

EARL GRANVILLE: Here, in this Return, I have the counties given one by one, and the Return is the very latest we have been able to procure. I would now observe that I think it would have been idle for me to have stated in my opening speech what the Government would or would not do if your Lordships went into Committee on this Bill; but I think it now only respectful to the House, and due to the Government, to say that if we go into Committee on the Bill we shall do so with the most entire determination not to resist any Amendment which could be shown not to be calculated to have the effect of destroying the practical results which we hope to obtain. As to the remarks which have been made about the County Court Judges, I would remark that, in my opinion, they are perfectly competent to discharge the duties with which they are intrusted under the Bill. I can admit that if your Lordships throw out this Bill a very great responsibility will lie upon the Government as to what course they should take; but I cannot refrain from throwing a very considerable amount of responsibility on your Lordships' House if you conscientiously come to a decision adverse to a Bill which Her Majesty's Government believe would have a very good moral effect upon landlords and tenants alike.

On Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion (leave being given to the Lord Grinstead (the Earl of Enniskillen) to vote in the House)? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 51; Not-Contents 282: Majority 231.

CONTENTS.

Selborne, L. (L. Chancellor.)	Hammond, L. Hatherley, L. Kenmare, L. (E. Kenmare.)
Devonshire, D. Westminster, D.	Lawrence, L. Leigh, L.
Northampton, M.	Lismore, L. (V. Lismore.)
Cowper, E. Derby, E. Granville, E. Kimberley, E. Morley, E. Northbrook, E. Portsmouth, E. Spencer, E. Sydney, E.	Lyttelton, L. Methuen, L. Monck, L. (V. Monck.) Monson, L. [Teller.] Monteagle of Brandon, L. Mostyn, L. Mount Temple, L. O'Hagan, L. Ponsonby, L. (E. Bessborough.) Ramsay, L. (E. Dalhousie.) Robartes, L. Sandhurst, L. Saye and Sele, L. Sefton, L. (E. Sefton.) Skene, L. (E. Fife.) Strafford, L. (V. Enfield.)
Gordon, V. (E. Aberdeen.) Leinster, V. (D. Leinster.) Powerscourt, V.	Sudeley, L. Sundridge, L. (D. Argyll.) Waveney, L. Wolverton, L. Wrottesley, L.
Ely, L. Bp.
Aberdare, L. Boyle, L. (E. Cork and Orrery.) [Teller.] Breadalbane, L. (E. Breadalbane.) Carrington, L. Chesham, L. Crewe, L. Emly, L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Canterbury, L. Archp.	Northumberland, D. Portland, D. Richmond, D. Rutland, D. Somerset, D. Sutherland, D. Wellington, D.
Beaufort, D. Brandon, D. (D. Hamilton.) Grafton, D. Leeds, D. Norfolk, D.

Abercorn, M. (D. Abercorn.)	Onslow, E.	Ashford, L. (V. Bury.)	Gormanston, L. (V. Gormanston.)
Abergavenny, M.	Orford, E.	Aveland, L.	Granard, L. (E. Granard.)
Ailesbury, M.	Pembroke and Montgomery, E.	Bagot, L.	Grey de Radcliffe, L. (V. Grey de Wilton.)
Ailsa, M.	Portarlington, E.	Balfour of Burleigh, L.	Grinstead, L. (E. Enniskillen.)
Bristol, M.	Poulett, E.	Bateman, L.	Haldon, L.
Bute, M.	Powis, E.	Beaumont, L.	Hare, L. (E. Listowel.)
Exeter, M.	Radnor, E.	Blackburn, L.	Harlech, L.
Hertford, M.	Ravensworth, E.	Blantyre, L.	Harris, L.
Lansdowne, M.	Redesdale, E.	Bolton, L.	Hastings, L.
Salisbury, M.	Romney, E.	Borthwick, L.	Hawke, L.
Winchester, M.	Rosse, E.	Botreaux, L. (E. Loudoun.)	Hay, L. (E. Kinnoul.)
	Rosslyn, E.	Brabourne, L.	Heytesbury, L.
Airlie, E.	Saint Germans, E.	Brancepeth, L. (V. Boyne.)	Howard de Walden, L.
Amherst, E.	Sandwich, E.	Braye, L.	Inchiquin, L.
Annealey, E.	Selkirk, E.	Brodrick, L. (V. Middleton.)	Keane, L.
Bathurst, E.	Shaftesbury, E.	Byron, L.	Kenlis, L. (M. Headfort.)
Beaconsfield, E.	Somers, E.	Calthorpe, L.	Kenry, L. (E. Dunsaven and Mount-Earl.)
Beauchamp, E.	Sondes, E.	Carew, L.	Ker, L. (M. Lothian.)
Bradford, E.	Stanhope, E.	Carleton, L. (E. Shannon.)	Kintore, L. (E. Kintore.)
Brooke and Warwick, E.	Stradbroke, E.	Carysfort, L. (E. Carysfort.)	Lanington, L.
Brownlow, E.	Strange, E. (D. Athol.)	Castlemaine, L.	Leconfield, L.
Cadogan, E.	Strathmore and Kinghorn, E.	Charlemont, L. (E. Charlemont.)	Lilford, L.
Cairns, E.	Suffolk and Berkshire, E.	Chaworth, L. (E. Meath.)	Londesborough, L.
Caledon, E.	Tankerville, E.	Chelmsford, L.	Lovat, L.
Camperdown, E.	Vane, E. (M. Londonderry.)	Churston, L.	Lovel and Holland, L. (E. Egmont.)
Cathcart, E.	Verulam, E.	Clanbrassill, L. (E. Roden.)	Lyveden, L.
Cawdor, E.	Westmorland, E.	Clanwilliam, L. (E. Clanwilliam.)	Manners, L.
Clarendon, E.	Wharnccliffe, E.	Clementa, L. (E. Leitrim.)	Massy, L.
Clonmell, E.	Wicklow, E.	Clermont, L.	Mont Eagle, L. (M. Sligo.)
Coventry, E.	Wilton, E.	Clifton, L. (E. Daruley.)	Moore, L. (M. Dreggheda.)
Craven, E.	Zetland, E.	Clinton, L.	Northwick, L.
Dartrey, E.		Cloncurry, L.	Norton, L.
De La Warr, E.	Bangor, V.	Colchester, L.	O'Neill, L.
Denbigh, E.	Bolingbroke and St. John, V.	Colville of Culross, L.	Oranmore and Browne, L.
Devon, E.	Clancarty, V. (E. Clancarty.)	Congleton, L.	Oriel, L. (V. Massereene.)
Doncaster, E. (D. Bueclouch and Queensberry.)	Combermere, V.	Conyers, L.	Ormonde, L. (M. Ormonde.)
Dundonald, E.	Cranbrook, V.	Cottesloe, L.	Oxenford, L. (E. Stair.)
Durham, E.	Doneraile, V.	Crofton, L.	Penrhyn, L.
Eldon, E.	Gough, V.	Dacre, L.	Penzance, L.
Ellesmere, E.	Hardinge, V.	De Freyne, L.	Plunket, L.
Ferrers, E.	Hawarden, V. [Teller.]	Delamere, L.	Poltimore, L.
Feverham, E.	Hereford, V.	De L'Isle and Dudley, L.	Ranfurly, L. (E. Ranfurly.)
Fitzwilliam, E.	Hill, V.	De Manley, L.	Rayleigh, L.
Fortescue, E.	Hood, V.	Denman, L.	Rodney, L.
Gainsborough, E.	Hutchinson, V. (E. Donoughmore.)	de Ros, L.	Romilly, L.
Graham, E. (D. Montrose.)	Lifford, V.	De Saumarez, L.	Rossmore, L.
Grey, E.	Melville, V.	Digby, L.	Rowton, L.
Haddington, E.	Sherbrooke, V.	Dinevor, L.	Salterford, L. (E. Courtown.)
Hardwicke, E.	St. Vincent, V.	Donington, L.	Saltoun, L.
Harewood, E.	Strathallan, V.	Dormer, L.	Sandys, L.
Harrington, E.	Templetown, V.	Dunboyne, L.	Scarsdale, L.
Harrowby, E.		Dunsandle and Clanconal, L.	Shute, L. (V. Barrington.)
Howe, E.	Peterborough, L. Bp.	Dunsany, L.	Silchester, L. (E. Longford.)
Ilchester, E.	St. Albans, L. Bp.	Ellenborough, L.	Somerhill, L. (M. Clanricarde.)
Jersey, E.	St. David's, L. Bp.	Fitzhardinge, L.
Lanesborough, E.		Foley, L.
Lathom, E. [Teller.]	Abinger, L.	Forbes, L.
Lindsey, E.	Airey, L.	Foxford, L. (E. Limerick.)
Lovelace, E.	Alington, L.	Gage, L. (V. Gage.)
Lucan, E.	Amherst, L. (V. Holmesdale.)	Gerard, L.
Macclesfield, E.	Annaly, L.
Mansfield, E.	Ardilaun, L.
Manvers, E.	Arundell of Wardour, L.
Minto, E.	Ashburton, L.
Morton, E.
Mount Cashell, E.
Mount Edgcumbe, E.
Nelson, E.

Somerton, L. (E. Norman.)	Vaux of Harrowden, L.
Stanley of Alderley, L.	Ventry, L.
Stewart of Garlies, L. (E. Galloway.)	Vernon, L.
St. John of Bletso, L.	Vivian, L.
Saint Leonards, L.	Walsingham, L.
Stratheden and Campbell, L.	Wentworth, L.
Strathnairn, L.	Willoughby de Broke, L.
Suffield, L.	Wimborne, L.
Talbot de Malahide, L.	Windsor, L.
Templemore, L.	Winmarleigh, L.
Tollemache, L.	Worlingham, L. (E. Gosford.)
Tredegar, L.	Wynford, L.
Trevor, L.	Zouche of Haryngworth, L.
Tyrone, L. (M. Waterford.)

Resolved in the Negative: and Bill to be read 2^a on this day three months.

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock A.M. to Thursday next, a quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 3rd August, 1880.

The House met at Two of the clock.

MINUTES.] — SELECT COMMITTEE — Report — London Water Supply [No. 329].
 SUPPLY — considered in Committee — Resolutions [August 2] reported.
 PUBLIC BILLS — Ordered — First Reading — Teachers Registration * [296]; Expiring Laws Continuance * [297].
Second Reading — Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 3) * [278]; Game Laws Amendment [291], debate adjourned.
 Committee — Employers' Liability (re-comm.) [209] — R.P.
 Committee — Report — Considered as amended — Third Reading — Epping Forest (re-comm.) * [279], and passed.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House, that he had received from Mr. Justice Lush and Mr. Justice Manisty, two of the Judges selected, in pursuance of The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, for the Trial of Election Petitions, Certificates and Reports relating to the Election for the Borough of Boston.

And the same were severally read, as follow:—

BOROUGH OF BOSTON ELECTION.

The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868.

The Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Act, 1879.

The Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Act, 1880.

To The Right Honourable
 The Speaker of the House of Commons.

We, the Right Honourable Sir Robert Lush, knight, and the Honourable Sir Henry Manisty, knight, Judges of the High Court of Justice, and two of the Judges for the time being for the trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby, in pursuance of the said Acts, certify that upon the 27th and 28th days of July 1880, We duly held a Court at the Sessions House, in the Borough of Boston, in the County of Lincoln, for the trial of, and did try, the Election Petition for the said Borough between Sydney Charles Buxton, Petitioner; and Thomas Garfit, Respondent.

About mid-day of the second day, after some Witnesses had been examined in support of some of the numerous cases of bribery specified in the particulars delivered by the Petitioner, the Respondent declined further to contest the seat; and we being satisfied that the Respondent had, by his Agents, been guilty of bribery, determined that the said Thomas Garfit being the Member whose Election and Return were complained of in the said Petition was not duly elected or returned, and that his Election and Return were and are wholly null and void on the ground of bribery by Agents, and we do hereby certify in writing such our determination to you.

And whereas charges were made of corrupt practices having been committed at the said Election, we, in further pursuance of the said Acts, report as follows:—

- (a.) That no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any Candidate at such Election;
- (b.) The following persons were proved at the trial to have been guilty of the corrupt practice of bribery:—

Persons by whom Voters were bribed.	Persons bribed.
William Gillings.	Charles William Layton.
John Morris.	William Ward.
William Day.	George Bradley.
John Caister.	Reuben Tombes.
John Stoor.	Richard Stubbins.
Thomas Ward alias Thomas Laughton.	William Phillips Brown.
John Whitehouse.	James Rock.
Joseph Blackham.

We have granted Certificates of Indemnity to William Gillings and John Caister, and to each of the persons reported as having been bribed.

- (c.) That corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the Election for the Borough of Boston, to which the said Petition relates, as to which we beg to refer you to our Report in the case of "Tunnard and others v. Ingram."

Dated this 2nd day of August 1880.

ROBT. LUSH.
 H. MANISTY.

The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868.
 The Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Act, 1879.
 The Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Act, 1880.

To The Right Honourable
 The Speaker of the House of Commons.

We, the Right Honourable Sir Robert Lush, knight, and the Honourable Sir Henry Manisty, knight, Judges of the High Court of Justice, and two of the Judges for the time being for the trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby, in pursuance of the said Acts, certify that upon the 28th, 29th, 30th, and 31st days of July 1880, We duly held a Court at the Sessions House, in the Borough of Boston, in the County of Lincoln, for the trial of, and did try, the Election Petition for the said Borough between Charles Thomas Tunnard and others, Petitioners; and William James Ingram, Respondent.

And, in further pursuance of the said Acts, We report that at the conclusion of the said trial we determined that the said William James Ingram, being the Member whose Election and Return were complained of in the said Petition, was not duly elected or returned, and that his Election and Return were and are wholly null and void on the ground of bribery by Agents, and we do hereby certify in writing such our determination to you.

And whereas charges were made of corrupt practices having been committed at the said Election, we, in further pursuance of the said Acts, report as follows:—

- (a.) That no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any Candidate at such Election;
- (b.) The following persons have been proved at the trial to have been guilty of the corrupt practice of bribery:—

Persons by whom Voters were bribed.	Persons bribed.
William Simpson Key. John Jackson. Charles Botterell.	William Woods. Samuel Noble. Thomas Marshal Stocks. Henry Newham. Joseph Hancock.

We have given Certificates of Indemnity to each of the persons reported as having been bribed.

- (c.) That corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the Election for the Borough of Boston to which the said Petition relates. We have arrived at this conclusion partly by an investigation of the Election expenses returned by the Agents of the Candidates, and partly by the facts admitted or proved before us, the result being that out of a constituency of about 3,000, certainly not less than 600 voters (or one-fifth of the whole constituency) were employed on the day of the poll and paid nominally for services as messengers, watchers or the like, but really for their votes;

According to those returns the Conservative Candidates employed as clerks and messengers, &c. on the day of the poll about 368 persons, and the Liberal Candidates employed 506, making in all 874, of whom, as already stated, at the least 600 were voters, all of whom, or by far the greater part, there is good reason to believe voted.
 Dated this 2nd day of August 1880.
 ROBT. LUSH.
 H. MANISTY.

And the said Certificates and Reports were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

QUESTIONS.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION ACT, 1879— CUMULATIVE SENTENCES—CASE OF GEORGE DAVIES.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is a fact that at the police court, Shrewsbury, on the 15th ultimo, George Davies was charged with assault and sentenced to “one month’s imprisonment for each assault, one sentence to follow the other;” and, whether, as the case was heard in an “occasional” court, the magistrate did not exceed his powers of imprisoning, as limited by “The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879;” and, if so, whether he will remit the remainder of the sentence?

MR. ARTHUR PEEL: The facts are generally as stated in the Question. George Davies was charged with assault, and was sentenced by two magistrates sitting in an “occasional” court-house to “one month’s imprisonment for each assault, one sentence to follow the other.” The sentence was in excess of that which, under the 20th section of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, could be passed by the magistrates sitting in an occasional court-house. The Secretary of State, as soon as his attention was called to the facts, which was done by the magistrates themselves, at once remitted the amount in excess. The remission was made on the 21st of July.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked if the sentence would be quashed, as would have been the case if the man had not been too poor to appeal?

MR. ARTHUR PEEL said, the decision of the Home Office only applied to the excess punishment.

ARMY—THE ORDNANCE AND COMMISSARIAT DEPARTMENTS.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Secretary of State for War, having in view the recent reorganization of the Ordnance and Commissariat Departments, and the Royal Warrant issued for the guidance of the same, Upon what principles have the "selection" for the retention and the retirement of certain officers been made?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to my hon. Friend, I have to state that the reduction in the Ordnance Department, effected by my Predecessor, was from 160 to 90 officers, and in the Commissariat from 270 to 160—a reduction in all of 180 officers. My right hon. and gallant Friend, on the recommendation of the late Surveyor General of the Ordnance, carefully selected those whom he found to be the best officers for retention in the Service, and the rest were retired on compensation rates.

OFFENCES AGAINST THE EXCISE LAWS (IRELAND)—TOBACCO (SEIZURES).

MR. W. CORBET asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If his attention has been directed to a Return issued on 30th July relating to Tobacco (Seizures), from which it appears that Ireland, although exceptionally free from offences against the Excise Laws, has yet been much more severely punished than any other part of the United Kingdom; and, whether he can state why it is that, in England, with 2,441 seizures, including London, and 2,352 persons convicted, the fines imposed amount only to £15,246, or £6 10s. per person, and in Scotland, with 205 seizures and 236 persons convicted, to £1,425, or £6 per person, while in Ireland, with only 24 seizures, and 35 persons convicted, the sentences amount to £4,869, or £140 per person, these fines being at the rate, for England, of 10s.; Scotland 17s.; and Ireland £1 4s. 8d. for every pound of tobacco seized?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: The explanation of the apparent inequality of the fines levied is as follows:—The penalties for dealing with tobacco contrary to the Customs laws ranged from single to treble duty paid value, and the same sum is usually imposed on every person concerned in one transaction. Supposing, therefore, more than one person is concerned, and the full penalty is inflicted, each person concerned may be called upon to pay three times the duty-paid value of a pound of tobacco. The large amount of the fines paid in respect of Ireland is chiefly due to heavy seizures at Londonderry, which were gross cases, the full penalties being inflicted by the Irish Courts, and 14 persons being convicted for five seizures. The same explanation applies in the case of Scotland, where the number of persons exceeds the seizures by about one-ninth, while in Ireland the persons exceeded the seizures by nearly a-half, and in England the persons and seizures are about equal in number.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE CAPE COLONY—SIR BARTLE FRERE—DESPATCHES AND CORRESPONDENCE.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked Her Majesty's Government, If all the Despatches and paragraphs omitted from the previously published documents, as well as the more recent documents bearing on South Africa, will be promptly laid upon the Table of the House, together with such extracts from the confidential and private documents, as will show clearly and fully the measures on which the Government have differed from Sir Bartle Frere, as well as those measures on which they have agreed, and generally if Government will supply all those Papers in the Colonial Office which will show the manner in which Sir Bartle Frere has carried on the duties entrusted to him?

MR. GRANT DUFF: I suppose my hon. and gallant Friend's Question is founded upon a phrase in the statement made yesterday by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India—

"The conclusion at which Her Majesty's Government have arrived is that there had never existed between themselves and Sir Bartle Frere that harmony of opinion on many important questions now pending in South Africa which alone could have made it desirable in itself, or fair towards Sir Bartle Frere, that he should remain at the Cape, but for the reason that he had been specially sent out to forward, and it appeared possible that it was in his power materially to forward, the policy of Confederation."

I thought that want of harmony was notorious, and had been made clear to all the world by the debates of March 1879, in both Houses of Parliament, in which so many Members of Her Majesty's present Government took part. There is already on the Table a great mass of documents which may be studied with reference to the policy of Sir Bartle Frere in South Africa before the resignation of the late Government—say, in round numbers, 3,000 pages. To the best of my belief, all the despatches of any interest which have passed between Sir Bartle Frere and the present Secretary of State, except the very most recent, have already been presented, and the most recent—those which relate to Confederation—together with my noble Friend the Secretary of State's telegraphic reply, will be laid on the Table forthwith. I do not know of any documents which would be in any way useful which are not upon the Table, except these quite recent despatches; but if my hon. and gallant Friend will communicate with me, I should hope we may be able to gratify him by presenting any further Papers bearing upon Sir Bartle Frere's policy which he may desire to have. Of course, no private or confidential Papers are, or ever could be, presented without the fullest communication with the persons to whom they relate, or from whom they came; but I understand my hon. and gallant Friend only to ask for such things as can properly be given according to the well-known practice of the House.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman is now in a position to tell us when the South African Vote is likely to come on. If not, will he undertake that due Notice should be given, and that the time shall be convenient for enabling a discussion to be taken on the subject of Sir Bartle Frere's recall?

MR. GRANT DUFF: The time for taking the Vote is rather a matter for the Secretary to the Treasury; but I apprehend there will be no difficulty in giving such Notice as the right hon. Gentleman desires.

ARMENIA, ASIA MINOR, AND SYRIA—
THE DEBATE—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. BOURKE asked the permission of the House to offer a short explanation, which he felt obliged to make in consequence of the lamentable illness of the Prime Minister, which he need not say every Member of the House very deeply deplored. It might be in the recollection of the House that a very few nights ago the Prime Minister mentioned, in the course of a discussion on the subject of Armenia, that the late Government had concealed a despatch. At the time he (Mr. Bourke) mentioned that it would be his duty to recur to the subject, and the only reason he had not so recurred before was the illness of the Prime Minister. It would be, of course, repugnant to his feelings to mention the subject in the absence of the Prime Minister; and he should not do so now but for the fact that from certain statements made in the public Press, it appeared that his reasons for abstaining from returning to the subject had been misapprehended. He hoped the House would believe him when he said that the reason he had stated was the only one which restrained him; and that the House would allow him to say a few words on the subject on some early and convenient occasion.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he wished to speak a few words of comment on the statement of his right hon. Friend. He might point out to the House that his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was in his place down to Friday night last, and that the statement to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for King's Lynn referred was made on the previous Friday, so that there was a whole week in which he might have returned to the subject. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was personally acquainted with the despatches to which the Prime Minister referred, and should be able to deal with the question in the absence of the Prime Minister if the right hon. Gentleman chose to make his statement in explanation either to-day or at any future time before the return of the Prime Minister.

MR. BOURKE said, he should have brought the matter forward before last Friday if he had had access to certain Papers which were necessary for his purpose, in that he would have to quote from them. As soon as he had those Papers by him it would be his pleasure to make a statement, if the Forms of the House would allow him. If it would be satisfactory to the Government that he should make such a statement in the absence of the Prime Minister, he would be glad to do so at the first opportunity that presented itself.

Mr. Grant Duff

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he should be justified in saying that such a course would be satisfactory to the Government, for he had had some conversation with the Prime Minister on the subject since the statement was made, and knew his views. He should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Member for King's Lynn proposed to deal with the confidential despatches not before the House, or simply with the Papers which had been laid on the Table?

MR. BOURKE said, the whole gist of the statement would go to what he took to be the gravamen of the charge of the Prime Minister—namely, that the late Government had concealed a despatch; but if the Prime Minister alluded to a confidential despatch, then the whole question assumed a totally different aspect.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: It is not probable that my right hon. Friend will be in his place for a considerable time; and if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for King's Lynn has a personal explanation to make on a public question there should not be any unnecessary delay. I am sure the House will accord to him the indulgence which is always given to Members desiring to make personal explanations; and as I understand that my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs is prepared to make the statement which would have been made by my right hon. Friend, I think the right hon. Gentleman should take an early opportunity of making the statement to which he refers.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked if it was to be understood that the despatch in question was one that had already been laid on the Table?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, there were Papers in possession of the House which, without going to the confidential despatches, would amply justify the statement made by the Prime Minister to which the right hon. Gentleman took exception.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked whether the Papers to be presented would give the House any information as to the negotiations which the public had reason to believe had been going on between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of foreign countries with respect to a naval demonstration against Turkey for the purpose of endeavouring to compel the Turks to accede to the decisions of the Berlin Conference?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE suggested that the noble Lord should give Notice of the Question.

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION.

MR. ASHTON DILKE asked the Secretary of State for India, If his attention has been called to the Notice on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) with reference to an alteration in the constitution of the Commission recently appointed to inquire into the working of the Irish Land Act of 1820; and, whether the Government will afford any facilities for the discussion of the subject?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Yes, Sir. Our attention has been called to the Notice of the hon. Member for Longford, and as the matter is of considerable importance, and one, I think, desirable to be discussed without any prolonged delay, we shall be disposed to afford such facilities as may be in our power for the purpose. I understand that it is not likely to occupy a great deal of time, and I understand that the question might be disposed of if it came on at a late hour some evening. I should be disposed, if possible, to make arrangements to break off the Government Business on Thursday night at 11 o'clock, or as near as possible to that hour, if the hon. Member thinks that would give sufficient time for disposing of the Motion.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked what would be done in such a case with the other Orders having precedence of his on the Paper?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I ought to have stated that if the arrangement which I suggested is agreed to by the hon. Member for Longford and the hon. Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne (Mr. A. Dilke), I would to-morrow give Notice that I should move on Thursday that the Orders of the Day after the first Order should be suspended until the Notice of the hon. Member was disposed of.

AFGHANISTAN—STATE OF AFFAIRS AT CABUL AND CANDAHAR.

MR. GORST: I wish to ask the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received any intelligence, either yesterday or to-day, as to the progress of events in Candahar; and, whether there is any truth in the report contained in the papers that the communication with Cabul has been cut, and any truth in the further report that the communication with Candahar has been restored? I wish also to ask, generally, whether the noble Marquess can give any information as to the state of affairs both in Cabul and Candahar?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have received no intelligence, either yesterday or to-day, as to the progress of events at Candahar, or on the line between Candahar and the Frontier. I have received a private telegram from the Viceroy this morning, containing some account of the progress of affairs at Cabul, certainly up to the 1st, and, as I understand the telegram, to the morning of the 2nd instant; but there is no mention made in that telegram of any interruption of the communication between Candahar and Cabul. I have no reason, therefore, to suppose that any such interruption has occurred. I have not received any further news from Candahar; but I have not the smallest doubt that as soon as the Viceroy obtains any reliable information he will communicate it to me.

MR. J. G. TALBOT: I wish to ask, Whether there is any truth in the alarming statement in The Daily News as to the temper of Abdurrahman's troops at Cabul?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No; I have received a telegram this morning, but I cannot conveniently communicate it to the House, because it relates to negotiations which are in progress. I may, however, state that it contains no alarming information whatever—certainly not on the 1st August, when the negotiations were proceeding.

NAVY—H.M.S. "IRON DUKE."

MR. B. SAMUELSON asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether he could give any information to the House with reference to the accident which had occurred to the Iron Duke?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: A satisfactory telegram has been received from the Commander-in-Chief on the China Station, to the following effect:—

Mr. Gorst

"The Iron Duke is afloat; has not received any important damage; French and Russian admirals rendered all the assistance possible."

TREATY OF BERLIN—THE CONFERENCE—THE PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS.

MR. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he was able to inform the House when the various sets of Papers relating to Eastern questions would be presented?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in reply, said, there were four sets of Papers. The Conference Papers were ready, but they were waiting for two maps, one of which would be completed in a day or two, and the other by the end of the week; the Papers in reference to the state of the Turkish population in Bulgaria would be ready in a week or 10 days; the Unionist Papers would be completed in the course of the week; and the Paper relating to the representations made to the Russian Government in regard to the supply of arms and non-commissioned officers was ready, and would probably be laid on the Table to-morrow.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY (re-committed) BILL—[BILL 209.]

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Brassey.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Amendment of law).

MR. BARNES begged to move the first Amendment which stood in his name. He would suggest that the commencement of the Act should be fixed for the 1st of January, 1881.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 5, to leave out "passing," and insert "commencement."—(Mr. Barnes.)

MR. DODSON said that the Amendment appeared to be a reasonable one, and one that could not well be objected to. He might say that he thought the date suggested by the hon. Member was a proper one—namely, the 1st of January, 1881.

Amendment agreed to; word inserted accordingly.

MR. BARNES begged to move the next Amendment which was also in his name.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 5, to leave out "personal" and insert "bodily."—(Mr. Barnes.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'personal' stand part of the Clause."

MR. DODSON said, he did not think the Amendment was a material one; but he had a preference for the word "personal." It was a word better known in law than "bodily," and he would suggest to the hon. Member that there was no difference between them. If there were any difference he should be glad to hear it.

MR. BARNES said, that the word "personal" might be better known in law, but it was not so among the general public.

Question put.

MR. WARTON said, he had risen while the Chairman was putting the Amendment. He claimed to be heard.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he had put the Amendment, not being aware of the fact that the hon. and learned Member had risen.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, that the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) rose before the Question had been put.

THE CHAIRMAN: I did not hear the hon. and learned Member; but, perhaps, he will make his remarks, and I will put the Question again.

MR. WARTON said, he thought it would be a good thing if the Chairman were not quite so sharp. He only wished to say that he could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodson) that the word "personal" was better known in law than "bodily." They had for a very long time been accustomed to the term "grievous bodily harm;" whereas the word "personal" was certainly, comparatively, a modern term.

Question put, and agreed to.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN said, he believed that it was desirable to preserve intact the privileges of workmen at present with regard to compensation for injury. It was, however, believed by some workmen that the present step taken on their behalf would have the effect of considerably restricting, and more particularly reducing, compensation, both as regarded the time within which compensation could be obtained and the amount to be received. No doubt, that was contrary to the intention of the Government and the declared object of the Bill. Those rights, which had been in Scotland the subject of legal decisions, were fully recognized at Common Law; and, in consequence of that, he had been requested by the Convention of Royal Burghs to move an Amendment. Unfortunately, the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate was not present; but he trusted the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill would be able to see his way to accept it. He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 6, after "workmen" insert "and where compensation is not now recoverable by law."—(Sir David Wedderburn.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. DODSON said, he could not agree to the insertion. The law of Scotland in this respect was at present the same as the law of England. There were certain cases in which compensation was now recoverable—for instance, under the Coal Mines Regulation Act. The insertion of these words would, he believed, only create confusion, and he thought it would be unwise to introduce words guarding against those cases in which compensation was at present recoverable under the Coal Mines, the Factory, and other similar Acts. He hoped that the hon. Baronet would not press his Amendment.

An hon. MEMBER suggested that a Proviso could be inserted which might give satisfaction.

DR. CAMERON said, he did think that it was unfortunate that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate was not in the House, as he understood the matter which had been submitted by his hon. Friend (Sir David Wedderburn), from the Convention of Royal Burghs, better than right hon. Gentlemen then present. He would, therefore, suggest to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodson) that the matter might be submitted to the Lord Advocate, and brought up again on Report.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN said, that, on that understanding, he would ask leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. DAVEY said, he wished to move the Amendment which stood in the name of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for West Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill). Its object was to confine the right of action. The intention of the Bill was, of course, not to give working men a greater right of action than a third person already possessed.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, after "any," insert "patent."—(Mr. Davey.)

MR. DODSON said, that, by the acceptance of the Amendment, they would defeat the object they had in view. It was perfectly true that the object was to put a workman in the same position with regard to the employer as a stranger was at present. The law was, that the employer was not liable for latent defects in machinery. As the Bill stood, the workmen would be relieved; but, he thought, to insert the word "patent" would only create a difficulty in the case of the existing law. The Amendment clearly ought not to be accepted.

SIR JOHN HOLKER said, that it seemed to him that if the word "patent" were accepted, it would give rise to a good deal of difficulty in regard to the arrangement and limits of the Bill where there were defects in works and machinery that were patented. In fact, it would raise the question of patents generally. What was a patent in the case of one might not be so as regarded another person. Therefore, if the sub-section 1 of the Bill was to stand, it would be better without the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Staveley Hill). He wished to draw attention to the enormous responsibility imposed on employers of labour if that Bill was passed in its present shape. Every employer of labour, no matter how careful he might be, was liable to his workmen for defects in machinery. He might employ the most skilful firm of boiler-makers, and everything might be apparently right, yet, nevertheless, on account of some flaw, an explosion might happen which might cost thousands and thousands of pounds to the employer of labour. Something might also be said with regard to the works themselves in which the business was carried on. It was the same with regard to steam engines and other machinery, and the employers might find themselves saddled with an expense that no one could calculate. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Dodson) said that as regarded the outside public—that was strangers—employers were not liable for latent defects in machinery. He (Sir John Holker) was not aware that employers were responsible for any defects in machinery in such cases. There was no responsibility except in certain peculiar circumstances. If, for instance, a stranger went among workmen, and he was not authorized or sent there, and an explosion occurred, or a break-down happened, by which he suffered injury, the employer would not be liable to him, although the injury might be occasioned by a defect which was not a latent one. On the whole, he thought it would be much better to adopt the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson), and omit from that part of the Bill the 1st sub-section. At the present time, employers were liable to their workpeople for defects in machinery under a variety of circumstances. They were liable if they were under an obligation to correct certain machinery and they omitted to do so. They were liable, he presumed, to the workmen, if, under an obligation to exercise due care in regard to the machinery, they omitted to do so. Every person who made a machine unskilfully was liable, and it was reasonable that he should be so, for any defect existing. He did not desire to alter that or interfere with that liability in any way. If that sub-section were not omitted, the effect would be that employers, who were at present liable to a certain extent, would, in addition, be liable for any defect in the machinery which arose in consequence of the negligence of those in their employ who had superintendence of the machines. That sub-section would impose an alarming amount of responsibility on employers; and, for his part, he believed that it might be omitted without disadvantage.

Dr. Cameron

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. and learned Gentleman wish to move that the sub-section be omitted?

SIR JOHN HOLKER: No; I merely suggest that it should be omitted.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he did not wish to anticipate any discussion on the proposition of the hon. and learned Member for Preston (Sir John Holker). He was afraid, however, that the Government could not with safety consent to the 1st sub-section being struck out. With regard to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Davey), he thought the word "patent" could not be inserted in the sub-section, inasmuch as it destroyed its whole object. He thought a reference to sub-section 1 of Clause 2, would show that the hon. and learned Member for Preston had not so carefully considered the provisions of the Bill as they deserved. It was not the intention of the Government to extend the area of liability of employers. Of course, it was extended by the Bill, in the sense of applying it to certain persons in the service of the employer who could not now recover compensation from him. As the 1st sub-section stood, there would, of course, be liability imposed on the employer of labour for injury caused to a workman by reason of any defect in the works, machinery, plant, or stock connected with the business of the employer. Leaving those words as they stood, they, of course, included latent as well as patent defects. Now, the hon. Member for Christchurch wished to insert the word "patent," which, as the hon. and learned Member for Preston had pointed out, would render the sub-section perfectly useless. If the hon. Member would turn to the 1st sub-section of Clause 2, he would see that a workman would not be entitled under the Act to any right of compensation or remedy against the employer, so far as sub-section 1 of Section 1 was concerned—

"Unless the defect therein mentioned arose from the negligence of the employer, or of some person in the service of the employer, and intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the works, machinery, plant, or stock were in proper condition."

If the defect were latent, as the hon. and learned Member for Preston had pointed out, and of a character which could not be discovered by care, the employer of labour would not be liable. He thought the hon. and learned Member for Preston could hardly have said that "all employers of labour, however careful in the selection of persons employed, would still be liable." Sub-section 1 Clause 2, had been put in the Bill to protect the employers of labour against liability for injuries that were not the result of their own negligence, or of persons intrusted by them with the duty of seeing that the works, machinery, plant, or stock were in proper condition.

MR. BIDDELL said, two months ago, owing to some unascertained cause, the boiler of a steam-engine burst on his farm. Both ends of the boiler were blown out, almost everything was shattered, and there was no means of getting at the cause of the explosion, which, if it had happened a few minutes later, must have resulted in the death of two or three persons. It appeared to him that, under the provisions of the Act, he (Mr. Biddell) might have been involved in damages to the extent of £600 on account of this simple accident.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, as the hon. Member (Mr. Biddell) had stated his case, he would not have been liable, because it was not shown that the accident had arisen from the negligence of the employer. It was necessary, in order to bring the employer within the operation of the Bill, to show distinct negligence on his part or that of some person intrusted by him with the duty of supervision.

MR. ORR EWING said, the majority of boilers burst from getting over-heated through want of water. This was very often the result of carelessness on the part of the man in charge.

SIR JOHN HOLKER said, no doubt the provisions of the 1st sub-section of Clause 2 did, in the main, remove his objections to the 1st sub-section of Clause 1. Still, he thought the latter remained open to some objections. The Bill provided that—

"Where, after the commencement of this Act personal injury is caused to a workman by reason of any defect in the works, machinery, plant, or stock connected with the business of the employer," the workman, if he (Sir John Holker) rightly understood the clause, should have the same right of compensation and remedies against the employer as if the workman had not been a workman of, nor in the service of, the employer, nor engaged in his work. That would, in effect, limit the claim of workpeople, because, if the workmen were only to have the same rights and remedies as a person not in the service of the employer, it must be remembered that a person not in the employ might very possibly have no right of compensation or remedy at all. An employer was not, as a rule, liable for defects in machinery to outside persons.

MR. DODSON said, he apprehended that an employer was liable for an accident caused by his machinery to a stranger, unless it arose from a latent defect for which he was not responsible. Take the analogous case of a stranger passing along a road, and suppose that, in consequence of the negligence of the master of an agricultural steam-engine also passing along the road, or of the negligence of the person to whom it was intrusted, the passing stranger should be injured. The stranger would have his remedy in that case. The Bill extended the liability of the employer in the case of workmen in so far as it put the workman in the same position towards the employer as the stranger already occupied.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, Sub-section 1 of Clause 1 provided that a workman was to have a remedy for injuries caused "by reason of any defects in the works, machinery, plant, or stock;" and Sub-section 1 of Clause 2 provided that the remedy was not to apply unless the defect mentioned in Clause 1, Sub-section 1, arose from—

"The negligence of the employer, or of some person in the service of the employer, and intrusted with the duty of seeing the works, machinery, plant, or stock were in proper condition."

Now, it might happen that the employer bought a machine cheap because it had not been well-constructed. Again, the machine might have in it defects originating in the course of manufacture. This Bill limited the right of the workman against the employer, and there would be no privity between the workman and the constructor. That being so, would not the workman be barred in his remedy?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, there was an obligation on every employer to see that he had proper machinery; and if he had not inquired into the construction of cheap machinery, he would be liable for the consequences of its defects. That was the case as the law stood now, and the Bill extended the liability of employers for such negligence to workmen.

Sir John Holker

MR. GORST said, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board did not seem to have appreciated the difficulty with regard to the clause which had been pointed out by the hon. and learned Member for Preston (Sir John Holker). Take the case of a boiler which burst through the negligence of the person in charge. The Bill said that the workman was to have only the same remedy against the owner of the boiler that he would have had if he had not been a workman, or was not employed at all, or had not been on the premises. He asked, whether a stranger intruding on works where he had no business to be would have any remedy at all for injuries sustained in consequence of the bursting of the boiler? Because, if a stranger had no remedy, neither would the workman have any.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, in the case put by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) there would be no claim. The Bill did not apply to the cases of trespassers. But take the case of a man rightfully on the premises, say for the purpose of delivering a sack of coals, and suppose, by the negligence of the employer, the boiler burst and injured the man, he would have a claim against the employer. The Bill placed the workman in the same position as the other man.

SIR JOHN HOLKER said, the explanation given by his hon. and learned Friend opposite (Sir Henry James) did not appear on the face of the Bill. He thought it would be much more satisfactory if it were embodied in the wording of the clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. INDERWICK said, the Amendment he had to propose would not carry the Bill beyond the limits intended by the Government. If it were accepted the clause would run thus—

"By reason of any defect in the ways, works, machinery, plant, or stock connected with the business of the employer."

He thought it possible, if a liberal construction were put upon the clause, the insertion of the word "ways" might not be necessary; but it had been suggested to him, by persons acquainted with the subject, that the clause as it stood would exclude cases of injury arising from defects in the permanent ways of railways and mines. The clause might include these cases, although it was possible that it might not. In order, therefore, to give effect to what he believed to be the intention of the Government, he begged to move the Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, before "works," insert the word "ways."—(Mr. Inderwick.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'ways' be there inserted."

MR. DODSON said, he was not at all sure that the word "ways" was necessary. He believed the case referred to by the hon. and learned Member for Rye (Mr. Inderwick) was provided for by the Bill; but for the sake of clearness, and as that was the intention of the Government, he would agree to the Amendment.

MR. BARNES said, he would point out to the Committee that the ways of railways and mining companies were not always permanent.

MR. PEASE said, he trusted that the word would not be inserted, inasmuch as it would have the effect of weakening the clause. When once you began to schedule and specify causes of injury, you excluded other causes. If the right hon. Gentleman was going to insert "ways," why not put in stables and engine-houses? The proposed Amendment, he believed, would only make difficulties.

MR. KNOWLES said, the Amendment would give rise to very serious complications, and he trusted it would not be agreed to by the Committee. The ways in mines were provided for by the clause.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he thought the insertion of the word "ways" was absolutely necessary; it could not be said that a "way" was the same thing as a work. The public idea of the latter was a series of erections in which something was carried on. But a way might be a permanent way, or a road to the works, and no one could say that it would come within the meaning of the words "works or plant." He therefore hoped the right hon. Gentleman would stand firm in his intention to agree to the Amendment.

MR. CRAIG said, he could not agree with the hon. and learned Member who had just sat down (Mr. Hopwood). He thought, with the hon. Member for East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes), that the word "ways" would be an unnecessary addition. It would be very difficult to specify what was a defective way. A way might be right to-day, but to-morrow, or any other day, quite the reverse. Ways in mines were always in a state of change; they were liable to fall; and should injury arise from any circumstance of that nature, it might be contended that it was owing to a defect in the way, whereas it might have arisen from some unforeseen circumstances. If the word were inserted, he thought it should be qualified in some sense or other.

MR. DODSON said, he was at a loss to understand the objection taken to the Amendment by the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Craig). The question had been raised as to whether the meaning of the word "work" included "ways." It appeared to him that the Amendment would remove a difficulty on that point; and, in order to make the section quite clear, he agreed to the insertion of the word "ways."

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. WHITWELL said, the object of the Amendment he was about to move was to make the Bill as clear and as useful as possible. He could not understand how the word "stock" was, in any way, cognate with the words "works, machinery, or plant." He understood stock to be material manufactured or in a raw state. If that was the sense in which it was taken, he could not see why it was put in the clause at all; and, therefore, proposed that the word should be omitted. He knew of nothing that could make an employer liable for stock as a cause of damage to others. A man might have a quantity of old rags to be delivered to persons who would convert them into paper or shoddy. They would certainly be in stock, but should not, for that reason, come under the provisions of the Bill. He begged to move the Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, after the word "machinery," to insert "or."—(Mr. Whitwell.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'or' be there inserted."

MR. DODSON said, the word "stock" would include that which was neither machinery nor plant. For instance, a stack of timber or bricks might fall and cause injury. Again, it would include a stock of explosive substances. Under the circumstances, he could not accept the Amendment.

MR. WHITWELL said, he doubted whether the case put by the right hon. Gentleman would be due to defect in stock.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, the word "stock" appeared to him to have no reference whatever to works, machinery, or plant. If the Government had any doubt as to the meaning of the term, perhaps it would be better that some explanation should be given. It could not be desirable to have an unmeaning word retained in the Bill.

MR. HOPWOOD said, the stock in trade of a builder consisted, amongst other things, of scaffold poles. The wording of the section was so dubious, that he thought the word "stock" had better be retained as affecting the class of stock to which he had referred.

MR. GORST said, he should like to know from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General whether the ill-stacking of a number of bricks or scaffold poles would be a defect in stock?

MR. WARTON said, he would suggest, with all respect to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, that the difficulty arose from the poverty of the language employed in the Bill. The vocabulary was insufficient. The word "stock" was made to answer over and over again, and might apply to four or five different things.

MR. RYLANDS said, those engaged in mercantile transactions would have no difficulty with regard to the meaning of the word "stock." The falling of a stack of bricks or timber would not be due to any defect in the materials themselves, but to the mismanagement of some person intrusted with the work of seeing them properly stacked. Now, the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had appealed to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for his opinion as to the use of the word "stock" with regard to this particular point, and also as to how far he supported the view of the President of the Local Government Board. The hon. and learned Gentleman had not replied to that appeal. Unless some understanding was arrived at, he thought the word had better be struck out.

MR. DODSON said, he thought the point was a very small matter; and if it was the opinion that the word should be omitted, he was willing to agree to its being struck out.

MR. GORST said, it was purely a legal question; and he would again appeal to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for an expression of his opinion upon it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, there were cases in which the word would apply to dynamite or gun-cotton, for instance, which, being improperly made or subject to accident, might explode and cause injury. He thought the word should be retained.

An hon. MEMBER said, that accidents frequently arose from horses of a very improper character being used in business. He held that such horses very properly came under the head of "stock."

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he was satisfied that the word ought to be struck out, if it was intended to include bullocks and cart horses.

An hon. MEMBER said, the remarks of the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) were the best reasons for keeping the word "stock" in the Bill. He could not conceive that the word could do any harm; while it, obviously, might do good. The remarks of the President of the Local Government Board showed that the clause might require amendment with regard to the bad stacking of timber and bricks, and that, if not already covered by the section, certainly ought to be.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, he would like to know under what head the rolling-stock of a railway would come? He did not think that was included in the word "plant," and it was, therefore, clear that the word "stock" was necessary.

MR. GORST said, if the word "stock" included agricultural stock, he did not think the Bill was of that dangerous character which the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) seemed to suppose. He would like to remove the word to Section 2, which would limit the liability for any defect to the case in which the defect itself had been caused either by the negligence of the employer, or by the negligence of some person intrusted by him with the care and management of stock. The word so guarded, did not appear to him of the very alarming character which the speeches of hon. Members opposite might lead the Committee to suspect.

MR. J. W. PEASE said, it would seem that most hon. and learned Members liked every form of expression that had a doubt in it. His view of an Act of Parliament was, that everything it contained should be as plain as possible. He believed that what was intended was stock-in-trade, which, owing to its dangerous character, as in the case of carboys of acid, might injure workmen through the negligence of those who ought to have looked after it. The word "stock" was, therefore, better in than out of the Bill.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he would appeal to the President of the Local Government Board not to wrap himself up in gloomy silence, but to give the Committee distinct information as to what was in his mind concerning the meaning of the word "stock," whether it covered animate or inanimate stock. If it applied to the former, he should certainly ask the Committee to divide on the question.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, it was very difficult to say what was in the mind of the person who drew this Bill. His own impression was that the word "stock," as it stood in the sub-section, referred to the rolling stock of railway companies; and he could not see how it could apply to stock-in-trade. If hon. Members looked at the former part of the clause, they would see that no reference was made to defect in material, such as acids, bricks, or timber; the wording was simply "defect in stock," and that stock he believed was passenger carriages and the waggons used in the transit of materials. He would like to hear what was the opinion of the Government on this point. If it was intended to apply the word to stock-in-trade, it would open the way to endless litigation; on the other hand, if it did not include rolling stock, it ought to be made to do so.

MR. DODSON said, the word was intended to apply to stock-in-trade, in which the rolling stock of a railway would be included.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, it was almost impossible to conceive the word to include live stock. He would be glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, whether it was intended that it should apply to live stock.

MR. PRICE said, the Committee were discussing the question as to whether the word "stock" ought to be retained to apply to stock-in-trade and rolling stock; and, again, whether it ought to be retained to apply to live stock. In his view, these two questions should be discussed apart. The discussion which had taken place had shown that very great doubt existed on these questions. He submitted that the word "stock" should be retained to meet cases of injuries resulting from defects in trade stock, such as chemicals, which, by being improperly stored together, might produce dangerous explosions.

SIR JOHN HOLKER said, it was desirable that the Committee should understand from the Government whether they intended live stock or stock-in-trade. He understood this Bill was intended to apply to servants engaged in husbandry. If that were so, would a horse belonging to a farmer which might run over one of the farm labourers be stock-in-trade? He thought it would be somewhat dangerous to keep the word "stock" in the Bill, if it were intended to include both live and dead stock, and he considered it reasonable that the term should be defined in some way, although he was not prepared to say that the words "in trade" would have the desired effect.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, there would be no objection to add the words "in trade," as rolling stock would be covered by the word "plant." He was not prepared to say whether the clause applied to injury done to a workman by live stock; but all these questions were governed by the fact that there must be negligence on the part of the employer, or some person intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the stock was in proper condition.

MR. JAMES HOWARD said, an animal might be defective by reason of viciousness. The stock of a farmer was universally known as his "live and dead stock;" but if it was not intended to include live animals in the definition of "stock," he would suggest that the word "dead" should be placed before the word.

MR. HERMON said, he thought the word "stock" should be defined, rather than it should be left to be disputed by lawyers hereafter. Since the discussion began, the Committee had been told that it was to include stock-in-trade. Now, he recollected some years ago that the rays of the sun ignited some lucifer matches in a grocer's shop, which set fire to some gunpowder and produced a serious explosion. It could not be said that this was owing to defect in stock, because the defect was in the window glass, which concentrated the rays of the sun. It was a most important thing to manufacturers and tradespeople that they should know the meaning of Acts of Parliament under which they were liable. He trusted the Committee would take the little trouble necessary for arriving at a definition of the word "stock" which, if it meant stock-in-trade in the sense he had referred to, would create great disturbance amongst traders.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, a farmer might have a horse which he knew perfectly well had a disease of the foot, and was liable to come down at any moment. This horse, by coming to the ground, might cause injury to a workman riding home from plough or otherwise. He asked whether that would be a case in which the employer would be liable under the Bill, and must press the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for an answer upon that point? The replies of the Government had hitherto been unsatisfactory with regard to the meaning of the word "stock," and he would venture to suggest that the progress of the Bill would be facilitated by answers being given to reasonable questions.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, that in the case put by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Randolph Churchill) the employer would not be liable, as the disease of the foot would not be due to the negligence of the employer.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he would suppose that the employer had thrown down the horse and broken his knees; and that, on a subsequent occasion, in consequence of the horse having been thrown down by his carelessness, his servant was thrown, and broke his arm. Would the employer be liable under this Bill?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, in the case put by the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour), if the employer knowingly sent the man out on a horse that was broken-kneed, he would be liable at Common Law, and not under the Bill. If the defect arose from the neglect of some person intrusted with the duty of seeing that the animal was in proper condition, in that case alone could there be any liability under the Bill.

SIR JOHN HOLKER said, his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General had pointed out that the Bill applied to the negligence not only of the employer, but of persons employed by him. If, in the case just put, the accident resulted from the conduct of a person other than the employer, that would show to the Committee that stock-in-trade might come within the definition of the word "stock," and that evil consequences might arise from its being brought within that definition.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had proposed to avoid the difficulty by inserting the words "in trade" after the word "stock." He asked the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Whitwell) to consider whether that would produce the result he desired. Live animals were stock-in-trade, just as much as cotton or wool were stock-in-trade to persons manufacturing cotton or woollen goods.

MR. WHITWELL said, he proposed the Amendment simply because the words "works, machinery, and plant" were definite; but he had been quite unable to make himself understand what was the meaning of the word "stock" as used in the Bill. The long discussion in Committee had testified to the difficulty with regard to the meaning of the term which existed in the minds of hon. Members. Although the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had signified his willingness to insert the words "in trade," he thought it would be much safer to agree to the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. HERMON said, that the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill (Mr. Dodson) had been good enough to leave the definition of the meaning of the word "stock" to the hon. and learned Gentlemen the Attorney General and the Solicitor General, both of whom, in speaking of it, had connected it with the word "negligence." But they must bear in mind that there was not a word about negligence in the sub-section of the Bill under consideration by the Committee. He was aware that the word occurred in the next sub-section.

MR. PRICE said, he was of opinion that the meaning as at present given to the word "stock," did not sufficiently cover rolling stock. He hoped the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) would press that point to a division. He thought that "rolling stock" ought to be inserted after the words "plant or stock-in-trade." As that would make the whole thing perfectly clear, he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would accept those words. The hon. and learned Gentleman said if his right hon. Friend (Mr. Dodson) were convinced of the necessity of inserting those words, he would, undoubtedly, insert them; but his belief was that rolling stock came under the head of "machinery and plant." He (Mr. Price) trusted the Committee would now come to a conclusion on the subject. In answer to the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hermon), he was aware that the 1st sub-section said nothing about negligence; but it was explained that Clause 2 controlled and governed this clause. With regard to the question of agricultural stock, in the first place, agricultural stock must be stock-in-trade; and they had agreed to the insertion of the words "in trade" after "stock." But he was inclined to the belief that a horse ridden every day to market would not be a part of the farmer's stock-in-trade. There was much less chance of injury arising from the negligence of an employer with respect to agricultural stock, and it was difficult to define where any injury from it could arise. Under the circumstances, he put it to the Committee whether it was worth while to make an exemption for the purpose of one trade?

MR. RITCHIE begged to suggest that the words "rolling stock or stock-in-trade not being live stock," should be inserted in the clause. This would settle the whole question, and make the meaning of the sub-section perfectly clear.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, nothing could be more inadvisable than to insert in an Act of Parliament words which had no fixed, definite meaning. He had looked, in vain, to those from whom he might naturally expect it, a definition of the word "stock." He could not see how "stock," as generally understood, could, by any possibility, be so defective as to cause injury to workpeople. If he could see anything like a meaning that an intelligent, practical man could assign to it, he would be in favour of retaining the word "stock." But, as it appeared to him, it would be nothing but a source of litigation. The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hermon) had said, "Do not leave it to the lawyers to decide what is 'stock,'" and he (Mr. Serjeant Simon) agreed with him. But had any other hon. Member given the meaning of the term? No definition whatever had been given. Again, how could there be defect in "stock-in-trade" within the meaning of the Act? One could understand defect in "machinery or plant." Everyone knew what "machinery" and "plant" meant; but when they talked about defining "stock," no definite idea could be associated with the word as it was proposed to employ it in the Bill. They had heard of bricks and timber being piled up in such a way as to cause injury by their fall; but that would be from no defect in the bricks or timber. It was due to a defect in the conduct of the person who stacked or piled them, which, therefore, constituted liability under this Bill. Then, again, with regard to the explosion of dynamite. That would not constitute a defect in the dynamite. It was the special property of dynamite to explode. He had not heard, during the whole of the long discussion that had taken place, a single illustration which would make the Committee understand the meaning of the word "stock." If the words "in trade" were inserted, it would only make the matter worse; and then, again, if only stock-in-trade was intended, it would carry the difficulty further. He said that there had been no case suggested in which stock-in-trade could be liable to produce injuries. Therefore, it seemed to him that to retain a word of which there could be no fixed, definite meaning would be extremely wrong, and a source of mischief rather than good ; and he would suggest that, instead of extending the confusion by adding the words "in trade," the word "stock" should be omitted from the clause.

SIR JOHN HOLKER said, that the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon) seemed to think that no injury could arise from stock-in-trade being defective. He (Sir John Holker) thought it was perfectly clear that stock-in-trade might be defective in the sense contemplated by the Bill. A man might have a quantity of petroleum amongst his stock-in-trade, and if that were not properly treated injury would result. Injury might also be occasioned from an explosion of dynamite which, through the negligence of the manufacturer, had been made unnecessarily explosive ; and, in both those cases, there might be injury caused by defective stock-in-trade.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY said, that the remark applied to petroleum and other mineral oils. A man's stock-in-trade was what he kept for sale, and not what he had on his premises for use. The House of Commons could not be expected to contemplate all the events that might happen. It was enough for them to say that injury might arise from the defective character of the stock-in-trade. For instance, a man might deal in petroleum of a certain quality, which would be safe at a certain temperature but dangerous at another. If, by the negligence of his foreman or himself, petroleum of an inferior quality were bought which became explosive, and a servant went down with a light and an explosion took place, then that injury would result from the defective stock-in-trade. It had been said that horses on a farm were not stock-in-trade, because they were employed to work the farm, and were not for sale ; but he wished to point out that they were part of the plant of a farmer, just as the horses at a colliery were part of the plant of the colliery. If a colliery owner had vicious horses, and injury happened to his servants through those vicious horses, then that was such negligence of the employer as would make him liable under the provisions of the Bill.

MR. KNOWLES said, that he hoped that the Government would adhere to their original intention by striking out the word "stock" from the Bill.

Mr. Serjeant Simon

MR. COURTNEY said, that, perhaps, he might be allowed to suggest a case of accident happening from defective live stock. According to the principle of the Bill, an owner of live stock ought to be made liable for injury caused by his stock. There might be a case of an agent of a farmer on a large scale buying a horse with a diseased fetlock. In that case, at Common Law, if an accident happened from the servant falling off the horse, the employer would not be liable. What it was desired to do by the Bill was to make the employer liable in such a case. That was exactly a parallel case to that of a man having a steam engine or boiler in use which was defective. He wished to see an employer made liable if his servants, by his direction, bought defective live stock or used defective machinery.

MR. JAMES HOWARD said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General had stated that the owner of a vicious horse was liable for damage done by it at Common Law. If an employer sent his servant into market with a vicious horse, then he ought to be liable for any accident which might happen to that servant. He thought it very desirable that they should have this question perfectly clear in the Bill, and not leave the definition of what was meant by "stock" to be decided by lawyers. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General himself had shown the necessity of having it clear in the Bill, because he evidently did not understand what stock-in-trade meant in the language used by farmers. Anyone acquainted with farming matters must know that when a sale was announced to take place, the "live and dead stock" were advertised. Surely the hon. and learned Gentleman could not be ignorant of that fact. If it were intended by the Government that live stock should be included, as he hoped it would be, then he thought the Government ought to accept the Amendment.

MR. J. W. PEASE said, that he rose to suggest that the debate as to the word "stock" should now come to an end. He thought that if, after careful examination, the Government found that the words of the clause did not comprehend all that they desired, then they should bring up fresh words on Report. He thought that the best plan would be to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Whitwell), and then that liberty should be given to any hon. Member to move a fresh Amendment upon Report.

MR. J. W. BAROLAY said, that he felt convinced that if the servants of employers generally were going to have certain privileges given to them, then the servants of agriculturists ought to have the same. There were sufficient important questions to be settled between farmers and their servants, and he did not think that this one of making agricultural labourers an exception ought to be added to them. With respect to the illustration about horses, he thought that if a gentleman were to make his servant ride a horse which was not sound, he ought to be liable in the same way as the manufacturer who had defective machinery. He did not desire to see any exceptional legislation in favour of the farmers. If it were thought right to give the servants on railways and in manufactories certain rights, then, in his opinion, agricultural labourers ought to have the same. He did not consider that it would be doing the farmers any service; on the contrary, it would only be widening the differences between them and their servants, if exceptional legislation were passed with regard to the farming interest. If employers generally were laid under responsibility for injuries to their workpeople, then, in his opinion, there was no ground for refusing the benefit of that legislation to the agricultural labourer. Should the Government make any change in this matter, he hoped it would not be in the direction of exempting farmers from any responsibility.

MR. GORST said, that he agreed with the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. J. W. Pease) that this discussion ought to come to an end shortly, and that they should reserve further observations until Report. It seemed to him that the Committee was now quite ready to settle the question by a division. He would suggest that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Whitwell) should be withdrawn, and that they should divide upon that of the hon. Member for Bolton. The latter Amendment plainly raised the point at issue. The question that the Committee would have to settle would be whether agricultural stock was, or was not, to be included in the Bill; whether live stock was, or was not, to be included in it. That was the question they had really to decide for the Government. Although they had not received the assistance they might have expected from the Government in the matter, still he thought the question was now ripe for the Committee to express its opinion by a division. He would suggest that they should go to a division upon the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bolton.

An hon. MEMBER said, that he hoped the Committee would decide to leave the word "stock" altogether out of the Bill. He did not believe that it was ever intended either that live stock or stock-in-trade was to be included by the word "stock." The Preamble of the Bill stated that it was to extend and regulate the liability of the employer to make compensation for personal injury suffered by workmen in their service, and he did not think that injury from defective stock came under that head.

MR. DODSON said, that he fully agreed that this discussion had now continued for a long time. Some considerable time before he stated that he did not attach very much importance to the word "stock;" but no sooner had he said that, than a discussion took place upon its meaning. In order to make the meaning of the word perfectly clear, the Government had agreed to put the words "in trade" after "stock." Now the hon. Member for Bolton wished to insert "or rolling stock." He had no objection to those words; but he really thought that they were sufficiently included under the term "machinery and plant."

An hon. MEMBER said, that he ventured to think that the question ought to be settled as to whether "stock-in-trade" included live stock. It had been shown by the hon. and learned Gentleman that dynamite, which might be stock-in-trade, might be so inherently defective that it might explode, and it had been shown by the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) that petroleum might be so defective that it might also explode. It was also true that greasy waste might be kept in such large quantities, and for so long a time that spontaneous combustion might ensue. If there was any liability under the Bill, it ought to attach to the person who kept such defective things. When they came to live stock, it was not easy to see how the principle which was applied to the person who kept bad materials in a negligent manner, could be applied. The horses kept for working a farm were not live stock; they were really part of the plant of the farm. If the horses kept for sale did an injury to a servant, then the employer should be responsible for the damage caused by his stock-in-trade. He did not see any reason for exempting agriculturists from the operation of the Bill.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he could not conceive any reason why a difference should be made between the farming class and other employers. If the word "stock" were taken from the Bill, there was nothing else upon which an action could be founded for injuries sustained by the action of vicious animals.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 82; Noes 158: Majority 76.—(Div. List, No. 90.)

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, that he begged to move, in page 1, Subsection 1, after the word "or," in line 7, to insert the words "storage of." He thought that that Amendment was worth the consideration of the Committee. It seemed to him that the owner of stock ought to be held liable for injury incurred by his servants, by reason of his negligent storage; and that if he stored gunpowder or other dangerous goods in an improper manner, then he ought to be liable. For instance, a man might have a glandered horse, and he thought that, in the event of an accident happening to his servant through that horse, he ought to be held liable.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, after the word "or," to insert the word "storage."—(Sir Herbert Maxwell.)

Question proposed, "that the word 'storage' be there inserted."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had not stated whether the word "stock" was intended to refer to agricultural or live stock. If the right hon. Gentleman did not understand the terms of his own Bill, he hoped that he would accept the Amendment.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that, in his judgment, the word "stock" was infinitely too wide for the purposes of the Bill; he also considered that the word "stock-in-trade" would be open to some objection. The Bill was to protect persons employed, and he thought they ought to use some other words than "stock-in-trade," which were very wholesale words, and went far beyond the purposes of the Bill. He thought it would be better to use words such as "materials used in such employment, or for such employment." He did not absolutely suggest those words; but he ventured to suggest that the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill should insert some such Amendment.

MR. GORST said, that he did not know whether any observations were intended to be made by the Government upon that Amendment. He should like to remind the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board that in the last division a minority was supporting the proposal of the Government itself. He had been amazed himself, in supporting the Amendment, to find that he was voting against Her Majesty's Government. His hon. Friend behind him (Sir Herbert Maxwell) had now brought forward a proposal which exactly carried out what the right hon. Gentleman said was the meaning of the words of the Bill. He was asked the meaning of the words "stock-in-trade," and he described them in terms which were exactly satisfied by the Amendment. If, therefore, they were again to support a Government Bill, he was afraid that they would again find themselves in a minority. He was very anxious to support the Government upon the Bill; and he should like to know, if it went to a division, whether the Government would support the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, or whether they would throw him over and vote against his Bill?

MR. DODSON said, that the Government never proposed the omission of the word "stock;" they said that if it were the wish of the Committee to leave it out, then they would have no objection. That was very different from proposing to omit the word. When it appeared that the Committee was in favour of retaining it, then the Government voted in favour of the retention of their own word. The Amendment now proposed the Government was not prepared to accept. He would only say this with regard to the explanation he gave some time ago, that the word "stock" was not limited in the smallest degree in the manner stated by the hon. Gentleman. The limit proposed by the Amendment would very much narrow the Bill. He would adhere to the proposition he made some time ago for adding, for the sake of clearness, after the word "stock," the further words "in trade."

MR. GREGORY said, that the Government were willing to adopt the words "stock-in-trade." He should suggest that the words "other than live stock" be also added.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, that instances had been given of explosive substances like gunpowder being part of "stock-in-trade." The explosion of gunpowder might result from its defective manufacture; but it might also occur from its defective storage. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodson) whether the case of storage did not entirely meet the intention of the Government?

MR. WARTON said, that, perhaps, the word "storage" would not be quite wide enough; he would rather suggest some such words as "placing, stacking, or storing."

Question put, and negatived.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 8, after the word "stock," to insert the words "in trade."—(Mr. Dodson.)

MR. GREGORY said, that it would be well if the Government added the words "other than live stock."

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) could be made subsequently.

MR. HERMON said, that it was not at all clear what the word "stock" meant. Sometimes, steam-engines were used for threshing corn, and in other cases farmers used horses. A steam-engine, or a horse, then became stock-in-trade. He thought the Committee ought to know whether stock-in-trade included live stock or not.

MR. DODSON said, that he had already stated that stock-in-trade included every kind of stock, whether alive or dead.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that the question had been put to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General as to what was meant by stock-in-trade, and he stated that it was what a farmer had to sell, and that the term did not apply to what a farmer was using for his daily work, and did not intend to sell. The definition now given by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board entirely differed from that previously stated.

MR. HICKS said, that, about an hour and a-half ago, the Government expressed its willingness to strike out the word "stock." It had then been suggested by many hon. Members on either side of the House that they should adhere to their original intentions. In his opinion, the only way out of the difficulty into which they had got was to adhere to the original intention of the Government to strike out the word "stock" altogether. As the Bill at present stood, it was simply a lawyer's Bill, and the result of it would be that it would subject employers to every kind of action. Moreover, the Bill would be entirely one-sided; and if a man brought an action, the employer would have nothing to do but to pay damages and costs.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Hicks) was not discussing the Amendment which was before the Committee. The Amendment proposed was whether the words "in trade" should be added, and general observations upon the Bill were not admissible upon that Amendment.

MR. HICKS said, that he was addressing himself to the word "stock." His contention was that the word was indefinite, and that it rendered every class of employer in this country liable to numberless actions. He, however, said that if employers were liable to these actions, and the word "stock" were left in the clause, then they would be subject to very one-sided actions. If, by any chance, the decisions of the Courts were against them, they would have to pay damages and costs to the plaintiffs; but if, on the other hand, the Court decided that there were no grounds for the action, then they would have to pay their own costs, without the slightest chance of recovering them from the plaintiffs. The consequence would be that every man who received the slightest injury would go to a solicitor, and get a letter written stating that if his employer did not pay him so much money he would bring an action. In many cases the employer would pay the money instead of going into Court. The question was whether the words introduced into the Bill extended the liability under which the employer was placed. In his opinion, the words of this clause were not clear; not a single hon. Member on either side of the House had ventured to say that they were clear; they were open to all sorts of interpretation, and there was nothing clear or intelligible in the Bill. He would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board to do what he said he would an hour and a-half ago, and withdraw the words "stock-in-trade" altogether. If, on further consideration, he found it necessary to bring up an amended clause, or section of a clause, he was sure no one would object to its being done upon Report.

MR. JAMES HOWARD said, that he desired to point out that the words proposed to be added to the clause were mere surplusage, inasmuch as the word "stock" was sufficiently explained by the words following:—"connected with the business of the employer." He did not think that a clearer definition could be given of stock, for it must mean stock-in-trade. He hoped that the Committee would not waste further time upon the matter.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, that the expression "stock" was more comprehensive than stock-in-trade. The Government had expressed its willingness to add the words "in trade" after "stock," so that the effect of the legislation, as regarded the defects in stock, would be a little less opposed to the interests of the employer than before. It was his desire to limit the effect of legislation against the employer; and he therefore hoped that the Committee would add these words, because, in his opinion, they narrowed the liability of the employer by making the clause less comprehensive than it was before.

MR. GORST said, that they had only been anxious to elicit from the Government a statement of what was meant by these words. He wished to do service to the Government, which, perhaps, they did not appreciate; but still he desired to be of service to them. It was most desirable, in a Bill of this kind, that the Government should clearly and explicitly state what they meant by the words they wished to put in the Bill. He could not understand exactly what it was that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board meant by the words "stock-in-trade." Clearly, he meant something very different from what the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General intended. He should like to know whether the words were intended to be used according to the sense fixed upon them by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, or according to the meaning ascribed to them by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board? If the Committee were clearly informed upon that point, progress could be made. His noble Friend the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had asked the question on this point once or twice, but had, as yet, obtained no answer.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had expressed a wish to do the Government service; but he was afraid that it was only lip service, of a very doubtful kind. When his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board proposed to omit the word "stock" from the Bill, he was met by the statement that the Committee did not wish to do so. Then, in deference to the wishes of the Committee, he had moved to insert, after "stock," the words "in trade." The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had alleged that he differed from his right hon. Friend as to the meaning of the word "stock." In his (the Attorney General's) opinion, the horse upon which the farmer rode to market would not be included in the words "stock-in-trade." He did not know whether a farmer's horse upon which he usually rode to market was more stock-in-trade than a licensed victualler's horse. There might be a case of a farmer dealing in horses besides cattle and sheep, and then they would be stock-in-trade; but he was distinctly of opinion that animals used for personal service would not be included under the definition of "stock-in-trade."

Mr. Hicks

SIR JOHN HOLKER said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had somewhat twitted the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) as to having given lip service to the Government; but, however that might be, no one could deny that it was essential that, if the Bill was to be passed, the intentions of the farmers should be clearly and definitely expressed. He agreed that if that were not done, the Bill would be of service to no one except the lawyers; it would result, no doubt, in a very plentiful crop of actions, which would be a very great burden upon employers. With regard to the intentions of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, he certainly did say that he attached no importance to the word "stock," and was perfectly willing that it should be struck out of the Bill. He had, however, since departed from that, and they had now to consider whether the word "stock," which a great many hon. Members thought highly objectionable, was rendered more or less objectionable by the insertion of the words "in trade." He should like to know who could define what was meant by "stock-in-trade?" The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had expressed an opinion that the horse used by a farmer for the purpose of riding to market was not his stock-in-trade; but he (the Attorney General) would like to know whether a horse used for the purpose of ploughing or for taking produce to market was stock-in-trade?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that he had only expressed an opinion that a horse used by a farmer for riding to market was not part of his stock-in-trade.

SIR JOHN HOLKER said, that he should like to have an expression of opinion from his hon. and learned Friend as to whether a horse used for ploughing or for taking goods to market came under that definition. At present, the Committee was left entirely in the dark as to the exact meaning of the words "stock-in-trade;" no one was able to say whether such animals were stock-in-trade or not. Suppose they had a description in a bill-of-sale given by a farmer to a creditor, which mentioned stock-in-trade, furniture, and other things. In that case, would the horse used for the purpose mentioned come under the definition of stock-in-trade? If the matter were left in its present uncertain state, the result would be that litigation would arise extremely prejudicial to the farmer, although profitable to the lawyers.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, it was necessary that the matter should be properly understood. He had himself suggested, some few moments ago, the omission of the word "stock" altogether. Subsequently to that, it had been explained that materials of an explosive character, such, for instance, as dynamite or petroleum, might be included under the word "stock." Now, in order still further to define the word, it was proposed that it should be altered to "stock-in-trade." For his part, he considered that the words "in trade" were mere surplusage, and he should oppose their insertion. The only effect of the addition of the word would be to unduly limit the operation of the Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. GREGORY said, he should propose to add, after the words "stock-in-trade," the words "other than live stock." It had been argued by some hon. Gentlemen on the other side, that the words as they stood would not include live stock; but he thought that they were quite comprehensive enough to do so, and to render employers liable for defects in animals which were very difficult of detection, even by experts. The subject was one not affecting farmers only, but livery stable keepers, cab proprietors, omnibus proprietors, carriers, and others, who would be made responsible for defects in their live stock of which they were not aware.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, after the words "stock-in-trade," to insert the words "other than animal stock."—(Mr. Gregory.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. DODSON said, the Amendment seemed to him to be based on a misapprehension of the intention of the Bill. The measure did not in any way alter the liability for negligence. It merely extended the liability of the employer in cases of proved negligence to injuries consequent thereon to workmen. If accidents arose in any way from the negligence of the employer, he would be liable as before. The Bill merely made him liable also for negligence of his superintendents.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, these words ought to be inserted, for, otherwise, the effect of the Bill would be to enormously extend the liability of owners of all live stock. As he was a Member of the Select Committee to whom this question was referred, he could say that no such extension was ever contemplated by them; and, for his part, he did not believe that it had even been thought of by the Government until within the last 20 minutes. It seemed to him most unjust that a farmer should be made liable for defects in one of his horses, for instance, of whose existence he was not previously aware. A horse which had previously been quiet and manageable might suddenly one day, from some unknown cause, develop temper, and seriously injure a labourer on the farm. It would be a very serious thing if farmers were to be bound to compensate their labourers in every such case.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that in the case suggested by the hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham) a farmer would not be made liable. The Bill did not increase the liability for negligence, and as employers were not now liable for what were called latent defects, they would not be liable in future. The Bill only made them liable for the proved negligence of their bailiffs or delegates.

MR. RYLANDS said, he should oppose the Amendment, although, in order that there might be no misunderstanding, he should prefer for his part to leave out the words "stock-in-trade" altogether. He did not think any exception should be made in the Bill in favour of any particular class; while, on the other hand, they should be very careful in any legislation that they did not give rise to litigation, a result which he feared might ensue from the passage of this Bill.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, the discussion which had taken place showed how necessary it was that every line of the Bill should be carefully scrutinized. If they wanted to prevent the great amount of litigation which he was afraid would result from the passage of this Bill in its present condition, they must be very careful indeed what Amendments they made. The speech first delivered by the President of the Local Government Board showed one of the dangers which they had to meet. He had then told them that "stock" did not include agricultural stock, and now they said that it did or might include agricultural stock. He did not believe that the Government, until a few minutes before, had even considered that question, or had intended to do so. Certainly the right hon. Gentleman had not intended that animal stock should be included in the Bill.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, the question whether "plant and stock-in-trade" included live stock was one which affected many classes. It was not exclusively a farmers' question. There was a great difference between a defect in an animal and a defect in an implement or a piece of machinery. The defect in a piece of machinery could be detected by careful examination; but an animal which had always had a perfectly good character, and never given any trouble, might suddenly develop some defect, and, in consequence, do a man an injury. Again, a machine which contained a defect ought not to be used at all; but a horse which was lame might yet be very useful for certain purposes. He was afraid that the provisions in the Bill would completely prevent its being employed at all, and would make it necessary that it should be killed.

MR. DODSON said, he had no particular desire to retain the words "stock" in the Bill; but he might point out to hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House that horses were included under the word "plant." ["No, no!"]

SIR HENRY JACKSON strongly objected to the addition of these words. He pointed out that the Bill, as drawn, used terms which any lawyer would be able to construe, and terms which bore a particular meaning; but if this addition was made, there would be a danger of confusion, and therefore he would suggest that the Bill should be left as it was originally drafted.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, he had heard with some astonishment the explanation just made by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board. He did not wish to give a definite opinion himself on the meaning of those words; but he thought that the interpretation which the right hon. Gentleman had put upon the word "plant" was scarcely one which could be accepted. He did not see how, by any device, live stock could be regarded as part of a farmer's plant. Besides, the Bill itself showed that such kind of stock was not in the mind of the draftsman when he used the word "defective."

Mr. Dodson

MR. NORWOOD observed, that the interpretation which the President of the Board of Trade had suggested surely could not be accepted. "Stock" was a part of a man's machinery for carrying on his business; or, at any rate, that was the meaning of the word that was there employed in the Bill, and how could that be made in any way to apply to the case of farmers, many of whom kept a large number of horses merely for the purpose of breeding and selling?

MR. NEWDEGATE said, what had already taken place in the course of the debate was amply sufficient to show that the Bill was one which ought to have been referred to a Select Committee. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not insist upon the words "stock-in-trade," but would content himself with the phrase originally in the Bill. They ought not to have anything at all to do with horses or live stock in connection with this clause. As Chairman of the Veterinary College, he knew how extremely difficult it was to ascertain whether a horse was sound or not; and if the Committee went into the question, they would have to discuss the temper of the animals which might change in a very short time, and would find themselves embarked on a very long and difficult inquiry.

MR. BROADHURST said, he must object to any proposal which would have the effect of narrowing the Bill. They certainly ought to extend protection to workmen and labourers who were improperly put in charge of vicious animals. Surely there was no desire on the part of the Committee to exclude the agricultural labourers from the benefit of the measure.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE suggested that the objections which had been raised would be met if farmers were under no larger responsibility as regarded their servants than the rest of the public.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said he would only trespass on the attention of the Committee for a moment, in order to again explain that the Bill did not extend in any way the nature of the liability of the employer. As he had already said, all that it did was to put workmen in exactly the same position as other persons.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he extremely regretted that more rapid progress was not being made with the measure—[Ironical cheers]*—*that was so; but it was impossible to proceed rapidly with the consideration of a Bill which the Government themselves, though they had introduced it, did not understand. ["Oh, oh!"] He, and his hon. Friends were, therefore, determined to do all that lay in their power to make this and other Government measures as perfect specimens of legislation as possible. They need not hurry with the work of improving these Bills, because there was no particular pressure of time. They knew—they had been told often enough—that the House was to sit until November, and, that being so, they were under no pressure of time, and there was no reason why the Government should exhibit symptoms of impatience. He had just said that the Government did not understand their own Bill, and that remark had been questioned. But the proof of the fact was to be found in the reply which had just been given by the President of the Local Government Board, who was in charge of the Bill, and by the way in which he had acted in regard to this particular phrase, "stock." He had, first of all, proposed that the words should stand "machinery, plant, and stock." He had then accepted a suggestion that the word "stock" should be left out; and after that had been almost agreed to, he had changed his mind and declared that the words should be retained, because a Liberal Member had suggested that the word "stock" might include agricultural live stock, a construction which evidently had not been in the mind of the Government when they drew the Bill. But he was not content with that, for he had afterwards given to the Committee one of the most extraordinary definitions of the word "plant" that he had ever heard. The right hon. Gentleman had said that plant would include live animals on farms, which, surely, was a most ridiculous construction. He proposed to support the Motion that those words should be inserted, because it was quite clear that a distinction must be made between live and dead stock; and for this reason chiefly, that it was in a man's power to exercise some control over the latter which it was not in his power to exercise over the former.

MR. JAMES HOWARD also supported the Amendment. It was quite clear that, in some manner, the distinction suggested should be made, and he would remind the Committee that the present was not the time to increase the burdens of farmers. If this Amendment were not accepted, and, by the interpretation of the Bill, it was found that farmers were liable for accidents through the temper or habits of their animals, they would be subjected to an entirely new liability, and one which it would be impossible for them to meet. No man, however well acquainted with horses, could be absolutely sure that they would not develop temper at some future time, although, when he bought them, they might seem to be thoroughly sound and trustworthy.

MR. GORST protested against wasting any time in that discussion. They had done their best to elicit information from the Government, and the only result had been to bring out the extraordinary definition with which the President of the Local Government Board had recently favoured them. That being so, he thought the best thing they could do would be to take a division at once.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, that, even if these words were added, he doubted very much whether live animals would be included under the words "stock-in-trade." Those words were governed by the words which immediately preceded them, and, as the lawyers said, they were ejusdem generis. Stock-in-trade, therefore, would mean something in the nature of machinery and plant, but something which was not directly included under those two words. It seemed to him that stock-in-trade rather meant the goods in which the tradesman dealt.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he rose in order to carry out the view that had been just expressed. He proposed that the words "live stock" should be inserted in the sub-section. The terms of such a clause ought to be very clear; and, as it at present stood, there was considerable doubt about it. They had the authority of the hon. and learned Gentleman the late Solicitor General (Sir Hardinge Giffard), whose opinion was not to be treated lightly, that it was very doubtful, to his mind, whether stock-in-trade included live stock. It was also very doubtful to him (Mr. Serjeant Simon). There ought not to be any such doubt with regard to the terms employed in an Act of Parliament. If it be the intention of the Government that the sub-section should include live stock, there could be no objection to admitting those words, so as to leave no doubt on the matter.

Lord Randolph Churchill

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 8, after "stock," insert "or live stock."
—(Mr. Serjeant Simon.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. THOMPSON said, that the question was whether the present wording of the clause included live stock. He understood that the Judges had different ways of interpreting Acts of Parliament. When penal, they were interpreted strictly, so that the Committee ought to be much more careful in the case of the words in a penal Act than when the Act was not one of that class.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, it was not a penal, but a remedial Act of Parliament. In answer to his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon), he would say that the Government could not accept the proposal he had made. They had objected to the exclusion of live stock, and they now objected to that term being inserted. The object of the Act had been forcibly put by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), that by that Bill they did not intend to alter the nature of the liability in any way. That liability would, no doubt, be greater, with respect to persons such as servants, for whom, in some cases, the master was already liable where they were personally guilty of negligence; but by that Bill the liability of the master was extended to his responsible representatives. That Bill extended the liability in that way, but did not interfere with the existing law otherwise. Whatever was done in the case of live stock before would be also done after the passing of that Bill, and whatever liability resulted before would also result in the same way then. He was unable to accept the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. and learned Member wish to press his Amendment?

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he believed he had only done his duty in bringing the matter forward; but he did not wish to press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GREGORY said, he wished to move the next Amendment on the Paper—namely, to leave out “connected with,” and insert “used in.” The effect of the Amendment would be to make the meaning clearer. The words “connected with” were very wide and indefinite, and in the case of collieries, for instance, might apply to the stock or plant of a rail or tramway by which the cases were conveyed, although not in any way belonging to, or forming part of, the undertaking. The Amendment was quite within the scope of the Bill, and he therefore hoped that it might be accepted.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 8, after “stock,” to leave out “connected with” and insert “used in.”—(Mr. Gregory.)

Question proposed, “That the words ‘connected with’ stand part of the Clause.”

MR. DODSON said, he preferred the words of the Bill as they stood to those proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory). He believed that the words already employed were the right ones; the others were, in fact, not so grammatical.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, he should like to ask the Law Officers of the Crown to tell him what they meant by “machinery, plant, or stock-in-trade connected with the business.” He would say, with all deference, that he really did not understand to what extent those words might go. He quite agreed that there might be some grammatical defect in the words proposed to be substituted. That, perhaps, was rather fine criticism; but he must say that he did not understand the phrase “stock-in-trade connected with the business.” He, therefore, begged the Law Officers to explain it. He would venture to suggest this—that they should see their draftsman with regard to it, and explain that the present words appeared to be too vague. Then, on Report, they might bring up the sub-section in some different form. It might then run somewhat in this way—“by reason of any defect in the works connected with, or the machinery, plant, or stock-in-trade, used in the business of the employer.” He was afraid that they had gone too far in the sub-section to go back and insert other words; but he would ask the Law Officers to furnish a satisfactory explanation, or let the matter stand over for the draftsman.

MR. DODSON said, that the proposal of the hon. and learned Member who had just sat down was one that would save the time of the Committee. He had already stated that he did not wish to accept the words “used in” as a substitute for “connected with.” If his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Gregory) and his hon. and learned Friend behind him (Sir Henry Jackson) would accept his assurance, he would confer with the draftsman and see whether any other words could be inserted which would render the meaning clearer.

MR. GREGORY said, he was quite satisfied with that assurance, and, therefore, begged to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, that he had an Amendment to strike out the whole of the sub-section. It had been put down on the Paper as an Amendment in page 1, line 7. It was possible that that was the right place for it; but what he wished was to have the sub-section discussed, and, then if he still objected to it, to move its rejection. He wished to ask, with reference not so much to that particular sub-section, as to several others which would require discussion, whether it was held to be the right course for a Member objecting to a clause in toto to move its rejection before they discussed it, or whether it was competent to move that afterwards? It was quite possible that some objections which appeared at first sight might disappear when the matter had been discussed, and perhaps satisfactory explanation given.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment of the hon. and learned Baronet appears on the Paper before the last Amendment moved in the sub-section. I called upon the hon. and learned Baronet when the sub-section was first reached, and if he had been here he could have moved its omission. The hon. and learned Baronet was not present then, and he will not be in Order in moving his Amendment now.

MR. NORWOOD said, he wished to move the next Amendment on the Paper. His object in so doing was to limit the responsibility of masters to working hours; and, with the permission of the Committee, he would state an occurrence which came to his knowledge, by way of illustration. A number of workmen were employed in the upper storey of a warehouse, with a lift in it. The bell rung for dinner, and, to save themselves trouble, the men rushed in large numbers to the lift, which was only to be used for goods, and either persuaded or overpowered the man in charge who had "superintendence intrusted to him" to allow them to descend by it. At any rate, he seemed only to have made a feeble protest. An accident happened, and two men were killed and three or four injured. That accident was really due to the negligence of the person in charge of the lift; but it was not in working hours. It might be said that a distinction would be drawn in such a case as that, and that the owners might safely rely upon the jury. Now, he wished distinctly to assert that one of the difficulties which employers of labour would have under that Bill was that juries almost invariably were prejudiced against them. He himself was connected with two or three large concerns, and they scarcely ever dared to go into Court, because they were continually saddled with those claims. The juries nearly always took the side of the poor man, who had sustained, perhaps, a serious injury, whereby he was deprived of the means of earning his livelihood. He did think that, under that Bill, where their responsibility was to be so much increased, means ought to be taken to protect them in those cases which he had referred to. He believed that a reasonable limitation would be that of negligence during working hours. The case he had stated clearly illustrated the position; and that particular accident had, no doubt, occurred from the recklessness of the men themselves. In such cases it was surely not intended to make the employer liable.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 9, after "negligence," insert "in execution of his duty."—(Mr. Norwood.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. DODSON said, that his attention had been drawn to the point referred to by the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood). He thought there was a good deal of force in what he had said; but he did not altogether like the words he had proposed. They appeared to limit it to when any particular works were being carried on. He would suggest to the Committee, and the hon. Member, the adoption of a slight alteration in the Amendment. The object in view was the same as that of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), who had also an Amendment to leave out in line 10, "who has," and insert "in the exercise of." No doubt, some alteration could be come to that would satisfy both the hon. Members and the Committee.

MR. NORWOOD said, he was quite satisfied with the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. He would rely upon the wording suggested by his hon. Friend the Member for East Sussex.

DR. CAMERON said, that, from his point of view, he considered that it was of the utmost importance, as far as possible, to do away with the doctrine of common employment. It appeared to him that that was the only logical way of dealing with it. All the difficulties had arisen from the neglect of that principle, which was laid down by the right hon. Gentleman the former Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe). That Gentleman had again and again laid it down that if they wished to deal logically and satisfactorily with any given question there must be no exceptional legislation. They must not attempt to legislate for a single class. He proposed, therefore, in connection with that clause, after the word "superintendence," to add "of men or plant."

SIR JOHN HOLKER said, he wished to point out to the Committee that unless some such Amendment as that proposed by the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) were introduced, it would make the liability of the employer to his servants greater than that to strangers. It was clear that, by law, an employer was only liable to strangers for injuries occasioned by the negligence of the servants, when those servants were in the course of their employment. He would submit to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill that the employer ought not to be liable beyond that point.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that it seemed to him that the hon. and learned Member for Preston (Sir John Holker) had not quite correctly stated the liability of employers. If they took the words of the section, under all circumstances, a workman could only obtain the same remedy against an employer as if he were not in the employ. Therefore, he could not obtain higher compensation than a stranger. In reference to what fell from the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), who had stated that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) seemed to be unnecessary, because if the employer were not liable to a stranger neither would he be liable to a servant. He would say that inasmuch as the Government had been so much admonished as to the necessity of making the Bill clear, they should be disposed to accede to the principle of the Amendment, although not to the exact wording. With reference to the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), it appeared to him that that went too far. The employer must not be liable for every act of the superintendent; but only for negligence in regard to acts done in the course of business.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BARNES said, that the next Amendment, which he begged to move, would have the effect of making the Bill more definite.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 9, leave out "any," and insert "the."—(Mr. Barnes.)

MR. DODSON said, that that Amendment was the first of a string of Amendments which the hon. Member for East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) had placed upon the Paper. They all had the same object, and that might be taken as the test Amendment. That object was to carry out an alteration throughout the Bill. He would say at once that he could not accept any of them, as the effect would be to remove the responsibility of employers in cases where he believed it ought to rest upon those employers. They would so limit the Bill that it was impossible to accept them.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, if he interpreted the object of the hon. Member for East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) rightly, it was to confine the effect of the clause to that person who had been called the vice-master, and who was intrusted with the whole of the master's authority. If that was his object, then he was bound to say that he did not think his hon. Friend behind him would have very much chance of getting the Committee to agree to the Amendment. For his own part, he thought that would be the right legislation. That was the step recommended by the Report of the Select Committee, for which he was to some extent responsible, and that Amendment was one which that Committee thought would fairly meet the whole case, made on behalf of working men in reference to the existing law. He wished that his hon. Friend had stated a little more fully to the Committee the scope and object he had in view when he moved that Amendment. He would say that, although he believed that his hon. Friend was urging forward a forlorn hope, had he pressed his Amendment to a division, he (Sir Henry Jackson) should have felt bound to divide with him, because the Government had given no satisfactory reasons for going beyond the case of the vice-master. The present situation of employers, with regard to their liability, had come from the position of railway servants. He believed that but for the very extreme length to which the logical arguments upon the phrase "common employment" had been pushed that agitation would never have taken place. The well-known case of Priestly v. Fowler, which hon. Members heard mentioned, no doubt, with dread, was the first case of the liability of employers that was ever dealt with. He would maintain that that was the first case, and that there was no record in the year books of any attempt before that, to make any master liable to a workman for negligence occasioned by the act of a fellow-workman. By that case the law was altered, and out of that decision arose the phrase "common employment." That phrase was, no doubt, a most apt one, and one that described the position before the mind of the Court when they decided that case of Priestly v. Fowler. As far as he remembered, it was a simple case. Two employés belonging to the same employer were together in a cart. One was killed, owing to the negligence of the other. The Court held that there was no just ground for complaint, inasmuch as there was no evidence to show who caused the injury. He did not wish to go more fully into the matter; but let them look deliberately at the important point that had been raised. The hon. Member for East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) represented one of the most important interests in the country; and he had brought forward in a distinct shape what he (Sir Henry Jackson) believed to be one of the most critical points that had been raised at that stage of the Bill. The phrase "common employment" had sprung from that decision, and as to any case other than within the scope and purview of that decision it was a very bad phrase. It expressed the idea that men working together in one employment had far better chance of avoiding danger than when employed in any other way. Therefore, it was thought not reasonable that they should have a right of action for injuries which, upon that hypothesis, they had as good a chance of avoiding as the master himself. The phrase then gradually became extended to cases to which the logical conception involved in it had no relation whatever. The present Bill was the offspring of that phrase, because Railway Companies very soon began to find that the term "common employment" gave them immunity from liability to which they were subject, and applied it to cases where it had no reasonable application. Then came another legal conception; the doctrine of implied contract. It was then said that every workman entering into dangerous employment contracted and subjected himself by implied, if not by actual, contract, to run the risks involved in that employment. He believed that to be a legal conception far safer than the other, but open to certain obvious objections. Between these two doctrines the conviction had grown up in the minds of workmen that they were suffering from grave and serious injustice, and out of that conviction had grown this legislation. Hon. Members, who invariably pleaded the cause of workmen, entirely declined to go into the real merits of the case, and test by argument whether the arguments on the other side were sound or not. He was in the unfortunate position that he could not invite the Committee to re-consider or negative the decision arrived at by the second reading of the Bill. The second reading determined that some change should be made in the law. His hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Barnes) had now raised the question as to how far that change was to go. How far down in the scale of agency was this new liability to be taken and enforced against the employer? He knew the conclusion was forgone, and was, therefore, reluctant to enforce the arguments against it. He would not shrink from dividing with his hon. Friend; but he wanted to call the attention of the Committee to the real scope and purport of the Amendment. The workman said — "You admit that a man superintending his own business is liable; I am serving not a small employer, but a large employer, and, because he never comes near his works, I am in a worse position than the servants of a small employer." If that was a further ground for introducing this Bill, the Amendment proposed would certainly meet the case. For his hon. Friend proposed that, whenever there was delegation of employment to persons who had to discharge towards workmen duties which the employer himself, if he were a small employer, would discharge, in regard to the action of such persons alone should the master be responsible. If his hon. Friend thought fit to divide the Committee he should go with him, as a protest against the length to which the Bill went in imposing liability on the employer for the acts of others. He did not think the Government appreciated the length and the minuteness to which the Act would go; and he thought by this Bill they were running great risk of doing more harm than good, and of defeating the object they had in view by paralyzing the exertions of capitalists and injuring the trade of the country. There could, however, be no objection to the limited extension of the existing law.

Sir Henry Jackson

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, the question at issue was to what extent were employers to be liable for the acts of others. The difference between the words "any" and "the" as relating to this clause was most important. Now, he thought if the word "any" were allowed to remain in the Bill, there would be scarcely any limit to the persons for whom the employer was liable. He was aware of the modification which was introduced in Clause 6; but, at the same time, he thought that a larger number of persons would be included than the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill was at all aware of. By a reference to the Mines Regulation Act, provided for the enactment of special rules in collieries, he found that under the rules in force in his part of the country an employer would be distinctly liable for the acts of 17 different classes of persons, so far as the operation of this sub-section went. He believed that was carrying the law much beyond anything which, perhaps, the Government themselves were prepared for. He thought that large employers of labour might and ought to be liable for the chief agents appointed by them; but it would be going much too far to carry the principle down to the men whom they were bound to appoint under the Mines Regulation Act. He should be in a position to show that the persons to be appointed under that Act were men who had a certain amount of superintendence intrusted to them, although they could not be men much removed beyond the condition of common workmen; and when it was considered how very little control a master could have over such men, he held it was going a long way to make him responsible for any accidental negligence on their part. That had never been suggested by the Select Committee which investigated this matter. They recommended that employers, who did not manage their own business, but delegated their authority to others, should be made responsible for their chief agents. He earnestly hoped the Committee would pause before accepting this sub-section, which contained, perhaps, the most important point in the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Dodson.)

AFGHANISTAN — STATE OF AFFAIRS AT CABUL AND CANDAHAR.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: On the Question, Sir, that you do report Progress it may be convenient that I should read a telegram I have received since the House met this morning:—

"From Viceroy of India, Simla, Aug. 3, 1880.

"Agent Quetta telegraphs under date 2nd inst., that tribesmen reported collecting between Chaman and Candahar, and that Ayoob is said to have marched to Mir Karez and to have detailed force for attack on Chaman. Some cavalry supposed to be moving in direction of Kakran for interception of supplies to Candahar. General Stewart has returned to Cabul from Camp Deh Haji. Chief Political has had several interviews with Ameer, with whom are principal Ghilzai chiefs and representatives of Maidan, Logar, Kohistan, and other districts."

I have received a further telegram from the Viceroy at Simla to the effect that, in consequence of the telegrams received this morning, a powerful force of all arms, under the command of General Sir Frederick Roberts, has received orders to march on Candahar from Cabul. I subsequently received a long telegram from the Viceroy giving the accounts which he has received from Colonel St. John of the losses of the force in General Burrows's action. He gives the names of the officers who are known to be killed, and the names of the wounded and missing are also given, together with the loss of the forces. That telegram has been sent to the newspapers, and will be in the evening papers.

Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again this day.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY (re-committed)
BILL—[BILL 209.]*(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Brassey.)*COMMITTEE. [Progress 3rd August.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Amendment of law).

Amendment again proposed, in page 1, line 9, sub-section 2, to leave out the word "any," in order to insert the word "the" in place thereof.—(Mr. Barnes.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'any' stand part of the Clause."

MR. THOMPSON said, that he did not rise for the purpose of making a speech. Some speeches were amusing, some were provoking, and some were fascinating; but he thought there were very few speeches which were persuading. He rose for the purpose of endeavouring, if possible, to persuade the Committee to adopt the Amendment of his hon. Friend. The object of the Amendment was to limit the liability of employers. He would give an illustration of what he meant. Sir George Elliot, a gentleman very well known and thoroughly conversant with the management of coal mines in the North of England, and to whom their management was largely intrusted, became convinced, after a series of experiments, that the best material for drawing men and coals from the bottom of the pit to the surface was wire rope. Up to that time hempen ropes only had been used. But when Sir George proposed to introduce wire rope the men determined that they would not descend by it. Sir George Elliot thereupon had a wire rope put to one shaft and a hempen rope to another, and gave orders to all in his employment, forbidding them to descend by the shaft with the wire rope, from his knowledge of human nature well knowing what would happen. The colliers, who were going to work in the pit the morning after these orders were given, were accompanied by their viewer, who said—"Let us show master that we are not afraid to descend by the wire rope."

Thereupon, with the consent of the viewer, they all descended by the wire rope, which bore them safely to the bottom. But supposing an accident had happened, and this Bill without the Amendment had been law, the owner of the colliery, notwithstanding the express order of his chief manager to the persons placed in authority, would have been liable to compensate all those men for any injuries sustained by them. He would appeal to the Committee as to whether that was right. The Bill provided that in the case of accidents happening by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer, who had superintendence intrusted to him, the employer should be liable. In the case he had mentioned, notwithstanding the express orders of the manager, a person "having superintendence" gave instructions to the men to descend by the wire rope. If the Amendment of his hon. Friend (Mr. Barnes) were adopted, and the word "the" were put in instead of "any," the owner would not be liable, because the men acted in opposition to the orders of the person "intrusted with superintendence." He would detain the Committee but a few minutes longer; and he would ask hon. Members if they knew at what period this extreme liability was being placed upon coal owners. He would undertake to say that the thousands of pounds invested in the coal trade had not, during the last three months, produced one farthing of profit, and to that depression in trade they were going to add a further liability. The men who were employed in the coal mines could not find employment in any other capacity; and if the liabilities of the employers were to be so much increased no doubt many of the mines would have to be closed. He knew that there were persons who professed to be the friends of the working men of England, who stated that they would be glad when the working classes were relieved from working in such places as coal mines. Those persons said that the miners ought to be encouraged to go to Canada or Australia, and obtain a better kind of employment. A short time ago he was asked to take some part in a meeting which was to be addressed by Mr. Joseph Arch, who, as was well known, was a zealous and earnest friend of the working classes. Mr. Arch addressed the men; and, after directing their attention to the policy of the Government, told them that all their efforts ought to be directed to going out and settling in foreign countries. He (Mr. Thompson) followed him, and said that he thought they ought to look to the Government of England to make England the home of the English; and that it was their duty to legislate, not to drive away the English from England, but to make them happy and contented here. When he said that, cheer after cheer was given by the working men present; and, without egotism, he might say that he remained the hero of the evening, notwithstanding the presence of his friend, Mr. Arch. His belief was that they ought to be proud of the English people living in England, and they ought to do everything they could to encourage the development of their trade, and the development of their resources, in order to keep their people here, and that they should not endeavour to force them to emigrate to foreign lands and leave this country.

MR. RYLANDS said, that the hon. Member (Mr. Thompson) had spoken of various kinds of eloquence, and expressed his intention of using the persuasive kind of argument. He (Mr. Rylands) must say, however, that the arguments of the hon. Gentleman had not persuaded him. While he sympathized with the hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) in his belief that it was desirable that the operation of the Bill should not be too wide, yet he could not support the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes). If it were really the intention of the Committee to limit the operation of the Bill to the case of negligence of a single individual, by saying that the person having superintendence of the works of the employer should be responsible as acting for the employer, he thought the operation of the Bill would, in that way, be very much too limited. In his opinion, it would limit the Bill to an extent which would practically render it almost inoperative. He was not prepared to take that course with regard to the Bill; and, therefore, he could not support the Amendment of his hon. Friend. When they had proceeded further with the Bill, they would have to consider how far its provisions would have to be limited; but, so far as the Amendment now under discussion was concerned, he thought it would narrow the Bill too much.

MR. RITCHIE said, that he wished to direct the attention of the Committee to the case of one class of employés, whose claims, he thought, received the sympathy of nearly everyone—he alluded to railway servants. If that Amendment were to be carried, and the word “the” inserted in the place of “any,” there would only be one person delegated with superintendence by the employer. In the case of railway servants that would be the traffic manager; and it would not be possible, therefore, in the case of railway servants, to bring their claims forward at all. If the Bill was to be at all adequate to meet the case of the railway servants that Amendment must be rejected. In the case of railway servants, the necessity of founding their claim for compensation upon damage inflicted in consequence of the negligence of the person who was the traffic superintendent would, practically, exclude railway servants from the operation of the Bill.

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, that, in his opinion, the speech of the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson), as well as the speech of the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Thompson), would have been more appropriate on the second reading of the Bill than on the Amendment now before the Committee. In the few observations which he wished to address to the Committee, he intended to confine himself to the effects of altering the subsection by making the employer only liable for the negligence of “the” person who had superintendence instead of “any” person who had superintendence. What would be the effect of that alteration? He would like any hon. Member to tell him who was the person to whom the clause would refer. It would be most difficult, in the case of a railway, to determine who was the person; at least, half-a-dozen persons might be alleged to be “the” person having superintendence. The consequence would be that no person would be able to tell, from the four corners of the Bill, who was the person intended by the clause. In the case of railways, it would probably be said that the traffic manager was the only person having superintendence, and that the Company was only liable for his negligence. It seemed to him that if the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) were adopted, so much would the scope of the Bill be narrowed that they would have to re-cast it entirely. It would be necessary to introduce a clause specifying the person intended as the person having superintendence, for whose negligence the employer would be liable. It seemed to him that having got so far with the Bill they ought not to adopt this Amendment, which he was bound to say he thought would unduly narrow the scope of the Bill. He should be prepared to adopt the Amendment to be moved by the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) to abolish the defence of common employment; that would be both a simpler and a more logical thing than what was now proposed. They had now, however, to consider the Bill as it had been brought in by the Government, and they must endeavour to carry out the principle it involved in detail. He certainly hoped that the Amendment would not be accepted.

MR. BARNES said, that he maintained that accidents in mines were a hundred times more frequent and more disastrous than accidents in any other employment. As the clause now stood, the liability of colliery owners for accidents in their mines would be most gigantic. He had mines extending four miles in one line, and it was necessary to appoint a number of persons to superintend those different workings. If they were to make the colliery owners responsible for every person superintending any part of the working, a most monstrous responsibility would be thrown upon the colliery proprietor. He hoped that the clause would not be allowed to pass in its present shape.

SIR JOHN HOLKER said, that the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch (Mr. H. Davey) had stated that this was a proposal which was well considered on the second reading of the Bill; but he (Sir John Holker) thought that was hardly accurate, for in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister introducing the Bill, he left it to be assumed that the only principle carried into effect by the Bill was that some alteration in the law was necessary. He said that something must be done, and he left it to the House to determine afterwards what alteration of the law was necessary. The Amendment of the hon. Member for East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) seemed to him (Sir John Holker) to raise the most important questions that had yet been brought forward. There could be no doubt that the law on this subject did require some alteration. It had been very ably pointed out by the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Coventry that alteration was no doubt required; but when they came to the extent, and scope, and limit of that alteration they found that they were dealing with a question of vast difficulty. No doubt, it would be only just that he who did not conduct his own business himself, but deputed the management of it to another, constituted him his alter ego, should be held liable not only to the outside public, but to his own workmen for injuries caused through the negligence of the person deputed to manage his business. It was quite obvious, therefore, that great corporations, who could not manage their own business, being, as they were in truth, mere abstractions, ought to be liable for those who controlled and managed the different branches of their business. That was the alteration of the law which many hon. Members in that House had advocated, and that was the alteration in the law which the late Government thought ought to be made. In that opinion he fully concurred; but the great question was, should legislation go beyond that point. If it did go further, and they made such alterations as he had described, they would inflict most grievous injuries upon the industries of the country. That, at all events, was the view which was entertained by a considerable number of hon. Members in that House. On the other hand, it was said that they ought to make the laws equal as between, what he might call, the outside public and the workmen. It was said that they ought to place the workmen upon precisely the same footing as that occupied by strangers. That certainly was an intelligible proposition; but, in his opinion, if carried into effect, it would inflict most grievous wrong upon employers. They were not now seeking by that Bill to equalize the position of the workmen with that of the stranger. The truth was that the law that made an employer liable for all the negligent acts of his servants was, in itself, an essentially unjust law. He had not heard anyone raise that point, or attempt to defend the law which made any man liable to anybody for the negligent acts of his servants. Why should that be so? If a man used every effort in his power to select and secure good servants, why, in justice and common sense, should he be held liable to the extent of his whole fortune for injuries inflicted by the negligent acts of his servants? To take a familiar instance, a small shopkeeper, who had done his best to secure a good and careful servant, employed a person to drive his cart about the town; somebody in a good position was injured by the negligent act of that servant. Why, in the names of reason and common sense, was the shopkeeper to be liable to the extent of his fortune for a negligent act over which he had no control? He had done his best to secure a good servant, and no blame could be attached to him in respect of the negligent act of his servant. He was not morally responsible in the least; but he was made responsible, in law, to the extent of the last penny he possessed. Could any hon. Gentleman on either side of the House defend that proposition and say that was good law? And yet what was desired by one section of politicians was that the law should be made worse than it was by extending it and rendering greater the liability of the employer; he was to be made liable not only to the outside public, but to his servants. He believed the view which was entertained by those who adopted the theory that the servants of an employer should be placed in the same position as the outside public was a view founded altogether upon sentimentality, and had no foundation whatever in truth and good sense. But what was the view presented to the Committee by the Government? The Government had not adopted either theory; either theory was intelligible, but the Government introduced a sort of half measure. They proposed to make an exception, and that employers should not be liable for the acts of all their servants. The consequence was that where there was confusion before the Government made that confusion infinitely worse. The Bill was not to apply to domestic servants, nor to seamen, nor to a variety of other persons. But the truth of the matter was that when they came to consider that measure of the Government it was a measure introduced, not because the Government felt convinced that servants ought to be placed upon the same footing as the outside public, but because the Government, or Members of the Government, had made promises to their constituents, and they felt themselves bound to carry out those promises. The effect was that the Government, or the Members of the Government, were afraid of the opposition which they would receive from the working men of the country. They had consented to truckle to the working men of the country. They had brought forward the Bill, not because they thought it was a good Bill, and not because they thought it would do any good to the public, but because they thought it would be a sop to the working men who were clamouring for it. With regard to the Amendment under Notice he did not think that it was framed in the best terms. He thought another Amendment might be introduced which would more definitely lay down the limit beyond which the Bill was not to extend. ["Hear, hear!"] He did not wish to occupy the time of the Committee at any greater length. His hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General seemed to intimate by his cheers that he (Sir John Holker) was in a great minority; but he should support the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Derbyshire, if he would take a division upon the question, because he thought that if the Amendment were carried out, it would show that the sense of the Committee was in the direction of limiting the Bill so as to make it a just Bill. He was thoroughly convinced that if not so limited the Bill would produce nothing but disaster to the industries of the country.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSHELL) said, that he had heard, with great regret, the speech just delivered by his hon. and learned Friend the late Attorney General (Sir John Holker). The Bill which the Government had now introduced related to a subject which the late Administration had, in two successive Parliaments, attempted, although unsuccessfully, to deal with. The Bills which they introduced on this subject were only carried to a certain stage, and then dropped. They had had an opportunity of solving this question, but had failed; they had left it to their successors absolutely unsolved, and the present Government were doing their best to deal with it, and, in doing so, assistance of the most useful description might have been given to them by his hon. and learned Friend. But, instead of getting from him criticism, which would have aided them in solving the question; instead of his having given them criticism, which, coming from one of his ability, would have been of a most useful character, and beneficial to the Government, to the House, and to the country generally, they had got nothing but mere Party abuse. If there ever was a Bill which ought to be met in a different spirit from that which had been adopted by his hon. and learned Friend it was this one. This was a matter in which they had a right to expect, even from their political opponents, assistance in settling this difficult question. Were he in the position of his hon. and learned Friend, he should certainly give him all the aid in his power, in endeavouring to settle a question involving difficulties like these. The hon. and learned Gentleman had stated that the law which rendered a man liable for the negligent acts of his servants was an unjust law. That was a very wide question to discuss upon an Amendment of the sort under notice; but he (Sir Farrer Herschell) could not allow the challenge which had been thrown down to pass unnoticed. His hon. and learned Friend had challenged him, in particular, to say the law was otherwise than unjust. Whether that was so or not, it was the fact that it was the law in every civilized country in the world. Law drawn from such different sources, and having such a different origin, all contained that one doctrine, that a man was liable for the negligent acts of his servants; and he could not think that a law which had been arrived at by all civilized nations by different roads could be treated as obviously unjust. He entirely denied that the law was an unjust one. He was prepared to accept the challenge, and if the question had been raised when they were going into Committee upon the Bill he would have gone into it at length. Two Sessions ago, a Bill was introduced by the late Government, and, in introducing it, his hon. and learned Friend pointed out that it was utterly hopeless to attempt to alter the law with regard to that question. He said that it was so interwoven with the practice of our daily life that it would be hopeless to attempt to alter it at the present day. That was his argument upon his own Bill, and it did not lie in his hon. and learned Friend's mouth to depart from it with regard to a Bill upon the same subject, introduced by the present Government. Then it was alleged by the hon. and learned Gentleman that the Bill could only be made just by limiting it in the mode proposed by the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes). Was that the proposal of the late Government? They did not propose to limit the Bill in any such way; on the contrary, they made the liability far wider. But now the hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to vote for an Amendment, which would limit the Bill far beyond what he proposed in his own Bill to limit it to. He regretted very much to hear his hon. and learned Friend, and it had not hitherto been his habit to suggest that in introducing a Bill of this description the Government had done so, not from a desire to do justice between man and man, not to make the law fair and just, but for the purpose of truckling to somebody. He (Sir Farrer Herschell) was thoroughly convinced that the existing law was unfair and unjust; and so much was even admitted by the hon. and learned Gentleman. The Government now sought to make it fair and just; and they did not think that that could be done by accepting the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Derbyshire, which proposed to limit the operation of the Bill. That Amendment limited the scope of the Bill, by making the employer liable only for the negligence of a single individual who had the superintendence. It was obvious that if they took the case of the small employer of labour, he was subjected to all the liabilities under which a large employer would be under the Bill. If the Amendment were adopted, the result would be this—a small employer, who might employ one superintendent, would be liable only for his act. But let him extend his works, and let him have several miles of mines, and several superintendents, and then his liability would be diminished in the same ratio that his business progressed. The consequence would be that the more profit a man made the less liability would he be subjected to. He did not conceal from himself that it would be extremely difficult to say for what superintendence the employer was to be liable. Any assistance in settling that question in a fair and proper way, in accordance with the principles of the Bill, the Government would be ready to accept from whatever quarter it might come. He could not help thinking that they had better deal at once with the Amendment now before the Committee.

SIR ANDREW FAIRBAIRN said, that he should like to say a few words upon this subject for a five-fold reason; in the first place, he was an employer of labour; in the second, he was a railway director; thirdly, he was interested in a colliery; fourthly, he was a farmer; and, fifthly, he was a barrister. He was sorry that the Government did not see their way to granting the employers of labour this little alteration in the Bill. He would give a good reason why he said that. He had in his employment a foreman, and under that foreman were 14 or 15 overlookers. To take the case of a man who was employed under one of those overlookers; he was quite ready to be responsible for that overlooker; but supposing a workman, on his way to the grindstone to grind his tools, was asked by one of the overlookers in whose department he was not employed to do work for him, that would not be doing his legitimate work. Supposing an accident happened while doing that work, he (Sir Andrew Fairbairn) maintained that as that man was not doing his legitimate work it was not fair to make the employer liable for what happened to him. For if that were the case the workman might say he had 14 or 15 overlookers as masters instead of one. He had the greatest wish to help the Government in carrying this Bill through; he had voted for the second reading of it. He was still in favour of the Bill; but he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of it would consider that there was something in the arguments brought forward in favour of narrowing the Bill, and would put some limitations upon it. He trusted that the Government would allow the very small alteration now proposed to be made—namely, substituting the word “the” for “any.”

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he hoped that the hon. Member for East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) would not press his Amendment to a division. He fully concurred with the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch (Mr. Horace Davey) that, if the Amendment were adopted, it would make the Bill utterly unintelligible. It was perfectly clear that if the Amendment were adopted, it would be altogether impossible to determine the actual individual for whose superintendence the employer was liable. It seemed to him the only way in which the Bill was really intelligible was as it now stood.

MR. J. W. PEASE said, that the great difficulty they had in this clause was with regard to the meaning of the word “superintendence.” He thought that the hon. Member for East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) would act wisely by withdrawing his Amendment, and confining his attention to introducing a definition for the term “superintendence” at the end of the Bill.

MR. WARTON said, he was anxious to avoid the temper and angry feeling which characterized the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General. What they had to do then was calmly to consider the effect of the proposed Amendment. He considered that if they inserted “the” in place of the word “any” in the clause, without any alteration in the subsequent part of the sub-section, there might be some objection to the Amendment. He thought, therefore, that after introducing “the” in place of “any” they should afterwards say “the person in the service of the employer who has superintendence over the work intrusted to him.” The objection taken by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General was that a small employer had one superintendent, and that a large employer had more, and he said that the large employer would have a much less liability than the small one. He did not suggest that the exact words he had mentioned should be inserted; but he thought that some such Amendment should be introduced which should identify the person for whom the employer was to be liable, with an actual superintendence over the workmen. It often happened that different superintendents had precisely ascertained bodies of workmen under them.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, that he would suggest to the hon. Member for East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) that it was undesirable to press his Amendment to a division. The view put forward by the late Government was that the liability of the employer should be confined to the person who represented the master. That view, he believed, had found favour with a great many hon. Members on both sides of the House. If this Amendment were pressed to a division it would place those who took that view in a difficult position. It did not seem to him that the Amendment carried out that view. It would lead only to technicality and obscurity, where all ought to be plain. The object of the Amendment should be to confine the responsibility of the master to those cases where a person employed by him had superintendence. It was very difficult to know what the person alluded to by the Amendment meant. It seemed to him that it would be highly undesirable to leave the question in so uncertain a position, and he would suggest that the Amendment should be reserved to some other period of the Bill. When moved then, it would really raise the question which would place the proposition contended for by the late Government—namely, that the responsibility only attached in the case of persons really representing the master—properly before the Committee.

MR. BARNES said, that he was willing to withdraw the Amendment.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that he rose for the purpose of asking for a reply from the Government to a question which had been put to them. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had never yet told the Committee what class of people it was for whose acts the master was to be responsible. His hon. and learned Friend the late Solicitor General (Sir Hardinge Giffard) had exactly stated the principle for which the late Government contended, and he hoped that they should have a declaration from the Government as to whether they accepted that principle or not. Take one or two of the leading classes of trade, such as builders or railways, would the right hon. Gentleman tell the Committee what class of persons in those trades he desired to make the masters responsible for? It would be very desirable to have a classification under the heads of the different trades—railways, mines, the building trade—showing exactly in those trades for whose acts the master was to be held responsible. He was sure that some classification of that sort would be absolutely essential before the Committee would be in a position to deal with this question.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, that he entirely agreed with what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir R. Assheton Cross). He hoped that before very long they should hear distinctly from the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill who were the persons for whom the employers were to be responsible. He said the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) would confine the liability of the employers to a narrow point. He thought, in all justice, there ought to be a limit to the liability. As it stood now, nothing could be broader than the words; the master was to be liable for the acts of any person whatsoever in his employ. Many men had superintendence intrusted to them by the master who were little removed from the class of labourers; and he should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman meant to make an employer liable for the acts of that class of persons? If so, he thought he was laying a very unjust burden upon employers of labour. He thought that the Government had undertaken to deal with the question that struck at the most vital interests of the trade of the country. It was a question which ought to be dealt with in the most careful manner. He would appeal to the Government to tell the Committee distinctly for whom employers were to be liable, and for whom they were not to be liable. If the Government did not know the extent of the liability, then all he could say was that that Bill would extend it beyond anything they desired or contemplated. It was this attempt at legislation, without going fully and practically into the question, to which he had such an objection. He thought that these questions should have been more carefully considered. He doubted whether any one single Bill could deal with the vast interests of the employers of labour throughout this country. The cardinal defect and original sin of the Bill was that it made no discrimination between the interests of the different classes of employers of labour. He would appeal most earnestly to the Government to tell them now what class of persons were to be made liable.

Sir Hardinge Giffard

COLONEL MAKINS said, he would like to know what would happen in cases where a superintendent was obliged to leave his post, and he put on someone else to perform his duties during his absence? Would the action of that substitution also make the employer liable for negligence? It was a very important point to be decided, because the man substituted might do the employer considerable injury.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he must again appeal to the right hon. Gentleman who was in charge of the Bill to tell the Committee, either now or at some future time, how far he was prepared to go in the scale of service, and for what classes of persons did he desire to make the masters responsible? Could he not state the classes in each case? In regard to mines, for instance, would he be content with superintendents, or would he go down to overlookers and underlookers? Then, again, in the case of railways, would he be satisfied to stop at station-masters, or would he include guards and signalmen? These points must be cleared up if the Bill was to be satisfactory. If they were not, there would certainly be litigation, and the working classes would be disappointed to find that they had not got all that they expected. He did not wish to press the right hon. Gentleman to give an answer immediately; but would be quite satisfied if he would say, at some time in the future, who were to be superintendents in each class of case.

MR. E. J. REED said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman near him (Mr. Dodson) would not suffer himself to be drawn into complying with any such impracticable suggestion. The question at issue was now fully before the Committee; and if any hon. Member was not satisfied with the Bill as it stood, it was quite open to him to propose any Amendment expressing his own opinion. It would, however, be reducing legislation to a perfect absurdity, if an hon. Member was expected to state who were responsible in relation to coal mines, and who were responsible in relation to shipbuilding yards, to ironworks, chemical works, and other industrial operations. Questions of that kind unfairly delayed the withdrawal of an Amendment which had been proposed some time ago; and in his (Mr. E. J. Reed's) opinion, the Bill was not receiving fair treatment from hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House. They were, certainly, needlessly prolonging the discussion. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had now twice, within a few minutes, asked the President of the Local Government Board to give a definition which, for his (Mr. E. J. Reed's) part, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not attempt to do at all.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he must strongly object to the language that had been used by the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken. He had been accused of delaying the progress of the Bill. He had no desire to do anything of the kind. He simply asked the right hon. Gentleman to make a statement on this question, either now or at some future time. If he could not do it now, he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) would be satisfied to receive it on Report, or whenever it was convenient to the right hon. Gentleman; but it could not be the fact that it was impossible to make this statement, because the Bill introduced by the late Government did deal with the matter, and give the very details which he now desired to receive from his right hon. Friend.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he hoped his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board would not give way. Just before the adjournment of the Sitting they were very nearly agreed on this question, and since they had met again they had very nearly settled it, when the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Preston (Sir John Holker) charged the Government with introducing this measure, not to settle the question, but to truckle to the constituencies. That was a charge which came from the Opposition, who had promised to give them assistance in passing this difficult measure, and it came with ill grace from the author of the previous Bill, which, certainly, was far more ambiguous than the present measure, and which had the effect of rendering the employer liable not for one but for several superintendents. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had said that these questions ought to be answered, and by pressing the Government to give an answer he certainly was delaying the progress of the Bill. He had declared that without an answer the meaning of the Bill could not be ascertained. He (the Attorney General) replied that the meaning of the Bill was to be found within the measure itself, and must only be found there. If hon. Members were not satisfied that that could be done, their proper course was to indicate their opinion by giving Notice of an Amendment which should make the meaning of the Bill more clear. If that were done, they might make some progress, instead of having discussions of this kind. That attempt to cross-examine a Minister could be of no benefit; because, even if his right hon. Friend would state what he considered to be the meaning of certain words, that would have no effect at all when the Act came to be construed, because the Courts and the Judges would take the words of the Act and put their own interpretation on them, and would not accept the interpretation of his hon. Friend. That was, in fact, an attempt to put a responsibility on the President of the Local Government Board which was, in reality, no responsibility at all.

MR. GORST said, that discussions after an offer to withdraw an Amendment had been made certainly seemed to him to be of the nature of obstruction; but, according to his experience, when the Members of the two Front Benches began to indulge in mutual recrimination, there was very little chance of any Business being done afterwards. He would suggest that this matter should be dropped, and that the Amendment should be withdrawn.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GREGORY moved, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 10, to leave out the words "who has," in order to insert the words "in the exercise of." His Amendment was only intended to make the meaning of the Bill more clear. Its effect would be to limit the employer's liability to accidents which occurred during the time that the employed were actually engaged in their work of superintendence.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. WHITWELL said, he should propose, in page 1, line 10, to insert the word "specially" after the word "superintendence," in order to give a better definition to the meaning of that word.

The Attorney General

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 10, after the word "superintendence" to insert "specially."—(Mr. Whitwell.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'specially' be there inserted."

MR. DODSON said, that he could not accept the Amendment, because it would tend to limit the operation of the Bill, and would interfere with its construction. The effect of it, as he understood it, would be to reduce the general superintendence of the sub-section to the special superintendence which was provided for in the next sub-section.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

DR. CAMERON said, he should like to insert the words, "over men and plant," in line 10. His object was to widen the scope of the superintendence contemplated in the Government measure.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 10, after the word "superintendence," to insert the words, "over men and plant."—(Dr. Cameron.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he could not agree to accept the Amendment, for it would be, in fact, to introduce almost a new principle into the Bill. The Amendment went a step further than the Government had proposed in the Bill now before the House, and as they could not accept it he hoped it would not be pressed.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, he also wished to join in the appeal to the hon. Member (Dr. Cameron) to withdraw his Amendment. He hoped the Committee would be allowed at once to get to the next sub-section, which was the real battlefield of the Bill.

MR. INDERWICK also supported the appeal for the withdrawal of the Amendment, observing that it seemed to him it could be far better discussed at a later stage of the Bill.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CRAIG, in moving as an Amendment, in page 1, line 10, after "him" to insert—

"Or in mining or other dangerous employments where it may be impossible or difficult to trace the causes of accidents, by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer, except such workmen as may be engaged in the same working place, and working together as partners with the person injured," said: This Amendment is one of a strictly adaptive character. It proposes to bring this Bill into harmony with the facts and circumstances connected with mining operations. I have never, either in this House, or elsewhere, expressed any objection to this Bill on the ground of the compensation which it will give the workmen. I have never entertained an objection to it on that ground. In my opinion there is, however, a very serious objection to it; and it is this—that it applies indiscriminately to all industries a general principle, and, by consequence of that, serious litigation will arise between employers and their workmen, litigation which, in my opinion, will seriously disturb the relations between the two classes to an extent that will bring about a most serious increase of the cost of production, an increase of cost that is not to be measured by the amount of expenses incurred in litigation. The disturbance of the relations may produce an effect which will extend far beyond these costs, large though they may be. Now, this Amendment proposes to grapple with that difficulty, and to overcome it by an extension of the liability for compensation. The first question which naturally arises is—At what cost will that immunity from litigation be purchased? Now, in order to ascertain that, I shall have to trouble the House by directing their attention to a certain range of facts and calculations. I shall be as brief as possible, and I have so summarized and colligated the facts that I hope to be able to present them in a manner which will not render it difficult for the Committee to comprehend my argument. When speaking on the second reading of the Bill, I said that the whole amount of compensation for injuries arising from any cause whatever would not exceed $\frac{3}{4}$ d. per ton of the mineral produced. I also stated that I believed the amount of compensation which would be due under the Bill, as it now stands, would, probably, not exceed $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per ton. That conclusion was based upon the mining statistics of 1877. Within the last few days I have myself repeated that calculation upon the statistics of 1879, and I find that the amount which will be required to compensate for injuries arising from every cause whatever would amount to something like 6-10ths of 1d. per ton. The facts on which I have based that calculation are as follows:—In 1879 we had open in Great Britain 3,956 mines, and in and about these mines there were employed 476,810 persons. The minerals produced (chiefly coal and ironstone) amounted to 145,366,369 tons during the year. There were 782 fatal accidents, and those accidents occasioned deaths to the number of 973. Now, Sir, the non-fatal accidents, which must also be taken into account as well as the fatal accidents, are not determined by these papers, and I believe it is a very partial return of those accidents which is made to the Inspectors. Now, in order to arrive at what the proportion of non-fatal accidents would be, I applied to the Secretary of the Permanent Relief Association of North Staffordshire, an Association which, I believe, has been in existence something over 10 years, and he supplied me with the results as ascertained by himself, and these amount to something like one in eight, excluding deaths. I find that agrees, substantially, with a similar statement which I received in connection with the Northumberland and Durham Insurance Association. It is stated there, I believe, that it would be about one in six, so that when we add fatal to non-fatal accidents, as given by the Secretary of the North Staffordshire Permanent Relief Association, it would amount to something like one in seven. I think this sufficiently near for all practical purposes. Now, the next question which arises is—What is the average time during which those people that are injured are disabled and off work? The statement I have received from the Secretary before mentioned gives 34 $\frac{1}{2}$ days, or, practically, five weeks. He told me that something like the number of days that 8-10ths of the injured were out of work was within a fortnight; but there are certain people disabled permanently, and; of course, as time rolls on, that class of the injured would increase, and, to some extent, swell the average; but, inasmuch as this Bill limits the compensation to three years' earnings, that increase of permanent disablement would not materially affect the average of non-fatal accidents; that would be on the number of people employed in 1879—58,380 injured persons. The next question is, what are the earnings? Now, I have taken £1 a-week as being like the average earnings of the whole of the mining population, because when you come to take out loss of time, and consider that there are a number of boys and unskilled labourers employed, it is probable that, in ordinary circumstances, that will not be far from the mark. This would give £150, as provided by the Bill, for the 973 cases; that amounts to £145,950. Five weeks' earnings of 58,380 injured persons, taken at 3-4ths of their earnings, which would be 15s. per week, would amount to £218,925, making a total of £364,875. That, Sir, would be, according to this calculation upon these facts, the whole amount that would be required to compensate the injured, and the representatives of those who lost their lives during that year. If we take that amount in connection with the tonnage of minerals produced, we find that it gives precisely 6-10ths of 1d. per ton, or a little over $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Well, the next question is, what amount of that would be required to be paid by the employer if this Amendment be adopted? Now, the Amendment provides that he will be liable for the negligence of any person in his employ, except all those who contribute to their own injury or to the injury of anyone working in the same place as the person who has, through negligence, produced the injury. When you come to deduct those from the whole, and those which arise from purely accidental causes, as far as I am able to judge, it would be something about one-half; so that the employer, under this Amendment, would be subject to a payment amounting to something like 3-10ths of 1d. per ton. If we take the amount in connection with the persons employed, it would be 15s. 4d. per person per annum; and half that, which would be 7s. 8d., would be payable by the employer, so that, in round numbers, an employer would be able to insure 1,000 persons at something like £383 per annum. This is the method by which this conclusion has been arrived at, and I must submit the data to hon. Gentlemen present in order that they may ascertain whether it be valid or not. I shall not trouble the Committee with any comments of my own, with regard to the question as to whether it would be a very embarrassing matter for the trade that those who embark their money in these speculations should be saddled with that liability. I will only state in connection with it that it is, in my opinion, a very small amount indeed, when compared with the fluctuations in the price of coal. We find that in 1871 the price of the Wallsend coal in London was 17s. 1d., in 1873 it was 30s. 9d., in 1875 it was 20s. 9d., and in 1877 it was 16s. Within those three periods of two years each, extending from 1870 to 1877, we have a difference of 13s. 8d., 10s., and 4s. 2d. per ton, and the increased liability for compensation under the Amendment would not exceed $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per ton, and this would get rid of the necessity of distinguishing between the negligence of one class of workmen and that of another—in fact, of the certain conflicts which would take place between managers and workmen, and which may cost 1s. per ton, I would simply state my own opinion that I do not regard the compensation which would be had under this Amendment as a very severe thing to fall upon those whose capital is embarked in these enterprises. But I shall now proceed to deal with another series of facts which relate to what I do consider a most serious objection to the Bill, and that is the objection that it will give rise to most expensive and embarrassing litigation.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does that question arise upon the Amendment?

MR. CRAIG: The very object of the Amendment is to prevent litigation. As I stated at the opening of my remarks, the Amendment is intended to grapple with that question of litigation; and I trust I shall be able to satisfy the Committee very shortly, by stating facts, not merely hypothetical propositions, but facts which have occurred from time to time, which will leave no doubt whatever as to the validity of the conclusions at which I have arrived. The litigation that I refer to will arise upon the question of divided responsibility. I do not refer to those Amendments which have been dealt with in the earlier part of this evening. I am quite aware that questions will arise upon those Amendments which would be difficult to settle in Court, but they will be of much less importance than these to which I am now about to refer. The litigation to which I allude will be with a view to the settlement of questions with regard to the negligence of one class of workmen as opposed to another class of workmen—that is, the Bill will require us to distinguish between the negligence of a variety of people employed in mines from the negligence of another larger section of those who are so employed. For example, as I have previously stated, everything in a mine which relates to safety is a divided responsibility between managers and workmen. Take, for instance, ventilation. There was an Amendment down on the Paper which provided for effective ventilation. Those words are inadmissible in this Bill, however desirable it may be to have them, and for this reason, they are too general. They go beyond the principle of the present Bill. Ventilation depends upon two classes of people—the manager and the workmen. Now, effective ventilation means a sufficiency of air to dilute the noxious gases produced in the mine. The absence of that air may arise either from the negligence of those intrusted with supervision, or it may arise from the negligence of the workmen who carry out the instructions of those persons. For example, mines are ventilated by downcast and upcast shafts, and in three cases during my experience I have found that the workman in charge of the furnace of the upcast shaft has fallen asleep and neglected his duty, and that the whole of the mine has, by consequence, become foul. Now, if an accident had occurred then, those injured would not, under this Bill, have been entitled to compensation. The air is distributed throughout the mine by stoppings and doors; the care of these doors is intrusted to people who too frequently neglect to shut those doors, and the ventilation becomes defective in consequence.

Mr. Craig

DR. CAMERON rose to Order. He asked whether the subject of insuring ventilation had anything to do with the Question before the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman has a very extensive practical knowledge of the subject, and I do not think that he is out of Order.

MR. CRAIG: I should be exceedingly sorry to occupy unnecessarily the time of the Committee. I have paid a good deal of attention to the subject, and I will not trouble the Committee with technicalities. I say it is frequently the case that those intrusted with the opening and shutting of doors in mines have neglected their duty. I found in The Staffordshire Sentinel of June 30th, the other day, a report to this effect, and it will fortify my statement—

“The door boys employed at the Clough Hall Colliery were yesterday charged with one of those breaches of colliery regulations which are sometimes the cause of catastrophes in which scores of lives are lost. They had, through sheer carelessness, left open the doors, which would seriously affect the ventilation of the mine. No degree of perfection in applying regulations can prevent explosions where employés are reckless.”

That is just what I have frequently found myself, and I daresay there is not a single hon. Gentleman present, who has had anything to do with mines practically, who will not have known similar cases. Under the present Bill, as it stands, no one who was injured would be entitled to compensation from his employer. Again, the air-ways may be perfectly constructed; but, should the men working in them be neglectful of their duty, or should they blunder, they may bring down such falls of roof as would partially stop the air-ways, and should they neglect their duty to give notice to the overman, an explosion might be the result; and, no doubt, explosions do occur from that cause. I ask the right hon. and learned Gentlemen who are connected with the Legal Profession, when an accident happens under such circumstances, whether it is possible to trace the cause of it so as to say whether it arose from the negligence of a fellow-workman or the negligence of the man intrusted with supervision? It would be utterly impossible, because there is no trace after an explosion by which you can ascertain the cause. Everything is destroyed. Should an accident have happened, when the boys mentioned in the paragraph I have read left open the door, how could you have possibly said whether it arose from defective air-ways, or defective attention on the part of those intrusted with supervision, or from the doors being left open? I might direct the attention of the Committee to timbering, in which there is also divided responsibility. I will not trouble you with details in regard to it; but questions arise before magistrates' courts almost every day, as to whether those intrusted with the bringing up of timber to the places have neglected to do so, or whether the timber has been improperly set, or neglected by the men. The same problem arises in connection with shafts; and throughout mining operations in everything that relates to safety it will be utterly impossible to distinguish between the negligence of those for whom this Bill proposes that the employer shall be liable, and those whom it excludes. I am sure that when my proposal is considered, it will be clearly seen that I, at least, do not object to a man getting compensation. If this timely concession be made I believe the effect will be very beneficial. It is a very small matter, amounting, perhaps, to a little more than $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per ton; on the other hand, the disturbance of the good relations between managers and workmen may result in a loss of 1s. per ton. I have known, on several occasions, when we have had to reduce wages, there has been an increase of 8d. to 1s. per ton, in cost, lasting for months. That is simply because the best men leave the place. The managers get into disrepute with them, and the mine is badly worked. This Bill will produce the same effect, because, as soon as you have managers and workmen confronting each other in Courts of Justice, to decide whether the negligence lies with one party or the other, it will result in this—that either the manager must leave, or the men. There may be no expressed dissatisfaction; but when their mutual relations are disturbed it is not the amount of compensation multiplied by 10 that will measure the evil effect produced. I must say, as an employer, that I have considered the matter very carefully, both with reference to my own interests and those of the workmen, and I think that true economy, in dealing with the workmen, lies between what may be called niggardliness and sentimental profusion. I believe that the small concession which I propose would turn out to be a very rational one, and would lead to a solution of a matter of the greatest difficulty in connection with this measure. When one talks this matter over with employers, they say—“You are aware that you must have something like an insurance fund to cover all accidents, and if you give this concession, will not the men be so satisfied with it that they will be induced to resist insurance?” My opinion is that it would have the opposite effect. The whole question that we are considering is one of relations, and I would ask the Committee to bear in mind that this is always a more difficult question to settle than a question concerned only with one thing. You may easily determine the position of a workman; you may easily determine the position of a manager; but it is a very difficult and nice question to determine the relation between a workman and his master, and any disturbance of that relation is a most serious matter. I will now consider this subject in relation to insurance, and let us see what the effect will be. If an employer goes to his workmen, when this Bill has passed, supposing that it will pass as it is, they would not meet in a kindly spirit to talk over the question of insurance. The workmen would be ready to say—“You have dealt very hardly with us; you have kept back all the compensation you could; we are advised that we are suffering from the negligence of your managers, and we will see whether that is so or not as opportunities arise.” Then the object of the workman in a Court of Justice would be to prove the manager negligent, because upon that would depend his receiving compensation. The object of the employer would be to defend and retain his manager, because his social existence depends upon his doing so. If he is proved guilty of culpable negligence once or twice, he will not only lose position before society, but before his workmen. It would be social and professional annihilation; but if my proposals were adopted the master and his workmen would meet together in a more kindly spirit. The employer could say that he had not been niggardly, and that he had considered the question in a rational and kindly manner; and what he had to propose would, no doubt, receive consideration at the hands of the workmen. But suppose the workman refused to join in an insurance scheme, the employer would be able to point out to him that he would get no more by going to Court than what he (the employer) proposes to give, and that the workman's position and his own in Court would be very materially changed; and workmen would go into

Mr. Craig

Court, not to prove the manager guilty of negligence, but to prove, in nine cases out of ten, that his fellow-workmen had been guilty of negligence. Now, they are not willing to do that. I have had experimental knowledge of all the three classes—workmen, managers, and employers—and I can say that workmen have great reluctance to deal with their fellow-workmen in such a way as that. They would, therefore, be very ready to say to the employer—"We will join you in your proposal;" and if they did not do so at once they would do it very soon afterwards. So the relations of the two would be materially altered for the better. Well, Sir, inasmuch as my proposals would facilitate insurance, inasmuch as the expense involved to attain that and get rid of litigation is so trifling, inasmuch as the disturbance of the relations between the two parties would be so exceedingly embarrassing and so destructive to trade, I propose the Amendment which stands in my name. I trust the Committee will consider the facts that I have laid before them. We have a good deal about law and about logic; but let us consider the facts as they arise, and, without coming to a hard and fast logical conclusion, see what the general tendency would be, because, after all, every economical question must turn upon that. You cannot have an absolute conclusion. You may begin with facts; but your conclusion will be more or less hypothetical. I trust the Committee will consider this Amendment, and, if it be adopted, I believe it will result in great good to the workmen; that it will be satisfaction to the employer; and, more still, that it will be for the general good of the community. It will be for the general good, because every injured man and his family have to be maintained now, and the consumer of coal has to largely help in maintaining them by means of poor rates and charitable contributions; but, by making the provision I propose, no one would be the poorer, at least not appreciably, and the workpeople would be very materially benefited.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 10, after "him" to insert "or in mining or other dangerous employments where it may be impossible or difficult to trace the causes of accidents, by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer, except such workmen as may be engaged in the same working place, and working together as partners with the person injured."—(Mr. Craig.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. DODSON said, he hardly knew whether the Amendment just moved was to stand by itself independently of any other, or whether the hon. Member connected it with the clause relating to insurance of which he had given Notice.

MR. CRAIG: I propose afterwards to move the insurance clause; but I will explain it when the proper time arrives. At present I simply point out that the adoption of the Amendment would facilitate an arrangement between employers and employed. If the employer did not get the workman to insure, he might himself insure against liability for the negligence of his subordinates. He cannot do so now, because he cannot do anything without compromising the matter, and acknowledging his manager's negligence. The two clauses are not necessarily connected with one another. I should like the present Amendment carried as it stands; but I should prefer them both to be adopted.

MR. DODSON said, he could only deal with the Amendment as it stood, apart from the other. If the hon. Member wished the two to be connected, his course would have been to have waited till the clauses of the Bill had been gone through, and then to have proposed the new clause. The hon. Member had not, however, done so; but had proposed the present Amendment by itself, irrespective of that which was to follow after. He (Mr. Dodson) observed, with regard to it, that the hon. Member confined himself to mining or other dangerous employment; and that expression seemed to him to be very vague, and it would be difficult to say concerning it what idea could be attached to it. Then, again—

"By reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer, except such workmen as may be engaged in the same working place and working together as partners with the person injured."

Now, so far as a mine or other dangerous employment were concerned, the Amendment very extensively widened the liability of the employer under the Bill. Was that the intention of the hon. Member?

MR. CRAIG said, he was about to add that he was not sufficiently acquainted with the Orders of the House to determine whether it would be admissible to allow the two Amendments to remain over for consideration in connection with each other. He would prefer that course.

MR. DODSON said, he thought that had been the intention of the hon. Member.

MR. CRAIG said, he wished to explain that one clause was not necessarily to be taken with the other. Supposing the insurance clause was not carried, he desired to carry the first Amendment; but his chief wish was to carry both.

MR. DODSON said, the Amendment would extend the liability of employers in regard to mining and other dangerous employment beyond the intention of the Bill, and was, so far, establishing the principle of the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald). He (Mr. Dodson) had stated to the House, in introducing the measure, that the Government did not accept the principle of the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford; and for that reason if, for no other, he could not accept the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. GORST said, he was obliged to remark that the right hon. Gentleman had scarcely appreciated either the speech or argument of the hon. Member (Mr. Craig) in support of his Amendment. As far as he (Mr. Gorst) could make out, the objection of the right hon. Gentleman to the Amendment was that certain expressions in it were vague, and at that objection he was really astonished. If the Amendment was vague it was only in keeping with the rest of the Bill. But he did not think that the Amendment was vague. He would not say that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General might not be able to devise a neater form of expression which would convey the meaning of the hon. Member; but the meaning of the hon. Member was conveyed in perfectly clear language. The hon. Member meant the Amendment to apply to mines and the kind of employment which so far destroyed traces of the cause of accident in such a way as to make it impossible to fix the responsibility on any particular persons; and he pointed out that, unless some special legislation were enacted, there would be endless disputes, and law suits between the masters and men as to the causes of accidents. He understood the Amendment was intended to put an end, once for all, to the endless disputes which were likely to spring up from the kind of accidents referred to. It seemed to him to be a point extremely worthy of the consideration of the Government in Committee, whether something could not be done in employments of that character to prevent the litigation which was otherwise certain to ensue. No doubt, the Amendment expressed the liability of employers of the kind alluded to. But many hon. Members did not much object to that. Of course, the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) saw in every proposal of that kind something that he would oppose. But it did not extend the liability to the acts of workmen who were, in any sense whatever, fellow-servants of the person injured. He (Mr. Gorst) supposed workmen who were not engaged in the same working place were not, in any proper sense, fellow-workmen of the person injured. Therefore, it appeared to him that, apart from the question of insurance, which the Committee might or might not adopt, the Amendment would deserve consideration, at least on the part of the Government, certainly more consideration than it had received.

MR. BROADHURST said, that he hoped the Government would accept the Amendment. If the Government would be good enough to accept it, he must ask them to do so without in any way pledging themselves—at least, he would not pledge himself—to accept the Amendment of his hon. Friend, which was to be proposed at a later stage. The two Amendments of the hon. Member had no relation whatever to each other; and he did not think that the acceptance of the first would, in the slightest degree, infer the acceptance of the second Amendment. This Amendment embodied the principle that they had been contending for for the last six years, with regard to compensation.

SIR JOHN HOLKER said, that the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Craig) wished to extend the liability of the employer in the case of—“Mining or other dangerous employments, where it might be impossible or difficult to trace the causes of accidents by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer, except such workmen as might be engaged in the same working place and working together as partners with the person injured."

That Amendment was divided into two parts; the first of which made the employer liable, where it was impossible to trace the cause of the accident, by reason of the negligence of some person in the service of the employer. The exception to that liability formed the second part of the Amendment; in case the accident was caused by the negligence of the person engaged in the same working place and working as partners with the person injured, then the Amendment declared that the employer was not to be liable. He would point out that the exception would only come into operation when it was undoubted that the accident arose by reason of the negligence of a person engaged in the same place as the person injured. He could not understand the limit which the hon. Member sought to place on the greatly enlarged liability of the employer.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, that on the Motion for going into Committee on this Bill he was in favour of its being referred to a Select Committee. That was merely an invitation to the Government, which he deeply regretted they had not accepted, to send the Bill to a Select Committee instead of discussing it there. He would take the opportunity of stating that that was an earnest invitation, made in good faith to help the Bill, and if it had been adopted they would have now been discussing a Bill which had been carefully considered by a Select Committee upstairs. He denied that, in making that proposition, they divided against the principle of the Bill; it was simply an alternative proposition for the purpose of working out the details of the measure. He would remind the Government of the position assumed by those who did not like this legislation, but who had not divided against the principle of the Bill upon the second reading; they had done so on the distinct understanding that the Government would not take up the principle of the Bill of the hon. Member for the Borough of Stafford (Mr. Macdonald)—namely, the abolition of the doctrine of common employment. The Amendment now moved proposed to extend the principle of that Bill further, if possible, than the Bill of the hon. Member for the Borough of Stafford, with regard to those special industries most liable to inevitable accident. It was proposed with regard to those industries, whenever it was impossible or difficult to find out how the accident happened, or wherever the accident was so fatal as to destroy all trace of what caused it, that they were not to be satisfied with the limited liability proposed by the Government, but were at once to make the employer liable for the consequences of that accident. The only exception to the rule that the employer was to be liable in such cases was, whenever it could be proved that the accident was caused by some persons engaged in the same working place as partners with the person injured. That was hardly any protection at all to the employer, inasmuch as whenever the cause of the accident was impossible or difficult to trace, it would also be impossible to prove that it had been caused by a fellow workman or partner with the person injured. He regarded the extent of the employer's liability now proposed as perfectly appalling; and he earnestly hoped that the Government would adhere to their determination, and would not accept the Amendment, which was quite inconsistent with the principle of the Bill.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that if he understood the object of the hon. Member (Mr. Craig), who had moved this Amendment, it was to have a twofold effect. First, he wished to prevent the litigation, as far as possible, which was likely to arise in consequence of the provisions of the Bill, as it stood; and he wished, secondly, by extending the liability of the employers, to force them to adopt a general system of insurance. What the hon. Member was endeavouring to point out to the Committee was that, according to the Bill as it now stood, the employer was liable only when it could be shown that an accident which caused injury was due to the personal negligence of some person in authority. It would be difficult when the Bill was passed into law to prove that. The mineowners would naturally consult and combine together how they could protect themselves from serious damage by reason of this Bill. If they adopted the principle that accidents arising from undiscoverable sources entailed liability on the employers, it would be easy for them to make calculations as to the average amount for which they would be liable; but if the employers were only liable for a certain class of accidents, uncertain and irregular in their incidence, and difficult to determine exactly, it would be almost impossible to calculate the insurance which would be necessary to provide against liability from them. It was not only possible, but probable, that the increase of the sum which might have to be provided by the employers, by the extension of the liability of mineowners to provide compensation in cases of accidents, which would be thrown upon them if this Amendment was accepted, would bear no proportion whatever to the loss and injury that the interests of the employers would suffer in consequence of litigation which would certainly arise under the Bill as it stood. It seemed to him to be the object of the Amendment to put the employers into such a position as to force them into a general and combined system of insurance. He thought that the Amendment merited very careful consideration from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, that, whether right or wrong, the Government had decided not to accept the principle of the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald)—namely, the abolition of the doctrine of common employment. They were now asked to accept the principle of that Bill in a very objectionable form. In his (the Attorney General's) opinion, the Amendment embodied, in an exaggerated form, all those difficulties and evils which would arise from the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford, and from the litigation which would be its result. Had they accepted the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford, an employer would have been liable for injury to all workmen resulting from the acts of their fellow-servants. Supposing that negligence was proved, an employer would, at all events, have known what he had to expect. He would point out how this matter would work. All cases of injury would have to be submitted to a jury; and before a man could recover, when injured by the act of a fellow-workman, he would have to show that he was in a mine or other dangerous employment. The first question would be—was it a mine or dangerous employment?

Lord Randolph Churchill

The plaintiff would also have to show, to the satisfaction of the jury, that it was impossible or difficult to trace the cause of the accident. Juries were very apt to say that it was difficult to trace the cause of the accident; and that would probably, in most cases, be assumed against the employer. Theoretically, an employer would be made liable for the negligence of all persons in his employ, and very great litigation would result. He did not wish to detain the Committee at any greater length, and he would only state that the Government could not accept the Amendment.

MR. Inderwick said, that his suggestion was to leave out the words—

“And other dangerous employments where it may be impossible or difficult to trace the causes of accidents.”

The hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Craig), in introducing the Amendment, described certain classes of employment of which mining was the principal. Therefore, if the hon. Member accepted his (Mr. Inderwick's) suggestion, and was content that his Amendment should run as follows:—

“Or, in mining, by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer, except such workmen as may be engaged in the same working place, and working together as partners with the person injured,” he thought that he would get rid of a great deal of the objection that had been raised. He trusted that the hon. Member would divide upon this question. He wished to say a word or two, in answer to the remarks of the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson). He would not repeat the observations he had made on a previous day, in reference to the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald); but he wished to say this—that the Resolution of the hon. Member for Stafford had been withdrawn, because it was found that the general feeling of the Committee was not in favour of it. There was no understanding or any concert of action between the hon. Member for Stafford and any Member of Her Majesty's Government upon this particular subject. The Resolution was simply withdrawn in order that the progress of the Bill might be facilitated, and that was an additional reason why he should desire to support the clause with the proposed Amendment. He believed that the description in the clause "working together as partners" was the definition of the state of things upon which the doctrine of common employment was originally founded.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the proposal had something to commend it, for it was proposed that mineowners should be able to avoid the excessive liability to penalties imposed by the Bill by rendering themselves liable to compensate for casualties occurring in their mines, by making the employers liable, in effect, for all accidents they were enabling them to insure. Every employer could insure the lives of his workmen, or the workmen, by a subsequent clause, could concur in the insurance. He thought that the proposal of the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Craig) had a great deal in it. It would, as he had said, enable mineowners to avoid the excessive liability to penalties which the Bill would impose upon them in certain cases; and the question was, whether it was not preferable for the mineowner to be liable for all the casualties occurring in the mine, rather than to become subject to the penalties provided for by the Bill. He did not think it was at all clear that it was not for the interest of mineowners to be liable for all accidents, whether they rose from the negligence of their employés or not. He believed himself, looking only to the condition of mineowners, that it would be preferable to the penalties of the Bill to become liable at once for compensation in cases of all accidents. His (Mr. Newdegate's) practice in the case of his workmen had been, whenever a man was killed, always to provide for his family. His belief was that the liabilities to which a mineowner would become subject by the Bill were so dangerous that he was not at all sure that the hon. Member for North Staffordshire had not proposed a course less objectionable to that, by proposing that they should rather meet the necessities of all those who suffered by accidents, than that they should become liable to the provisions of the Bill.

MR. RYLANDS said, that it did not appear to him that the Bill contained any penal clauses. What he understood it to meet was this—that in certain cases where death or injury resulted from the negligence of the employer, or of someone in his employ and acting by his authority, the employer was made liable to compensate the person so injured, or, in the event of his death, the representatives of the person so killed. That was a principle of justice, and he entirely agreed with it. In connection with that, it was not only a matter of justice as between employer and workmen; but they wished to go further, and, by imposing greater responsibilities, to afford a greater motive for the protection of the men by the exercise of the greatest possible care in the management of the works. One of the greatest difficulties which they had to contend with as mineowners was this—that they continually found that the workmen employed in the mines disobeyed the instructions given them by the employers or the employers' agent; and, with the greatest possible temerity and recklessness of their own lives and those of their fellow-workmen, they did things which were absolutely fatal. The Bill, he thought, would have the effect, in so far as it threw upon the persons having superintendence intrusted to them a personal responsibility where it was not already exercised, of inducing greater care; and he thought it should also reach those men owing to whose great recklessness life was often sacrificed. The proposal of his hon. Friend (Mr. Craig)—he did not care upon what ground he based it—was this—that any one of those men who, by reckless negligence, he not being a person having authority, should, by such reckless negligence, sacrifice the lives of himself and his fellow-workmen, he might, notwithstanding, create a right in the representatives of the men so killed to call upon the employer for compensation, or, in case they were only injured, to obtain compensation for injuries. He maintained that was the grossest injustice, and one which ought not to be perpetrated for a moment. Workmen engaged in a dangerous occupation must join with their employers in protecting their own lives. He should be quite willing, at the proper time, to join in supporting some system of insurance; but while he thought that employers ought to compensate workmen who were injured in consequence of the neglect of persons having superintendence, he was convinced that the object which he had stated of securing greater care on the part of the men themselves would be most seriously interfered with by the Amendment which was proposed. He trusted that the Government would not listen to the Amendment for one moment. He must express a hope, in connection with the legislation with which they were at present engaged, that they would do nothing to lessen that individual responsibility on the part of the great body of workmen, and prevent them from aiding their employers in taking all measures necessary for the protection of the life and limb of those engaged in those dangerous occupations. Under those circumstances, he should certainly vote against the Amendment of his hon. Friend.

MR. CRAIG, in reply, said: In the first place, the hon. and learned Gentleman the late Attorney General (Sir John Holker) was not quite clear with regard to the meaning of the exception and the men excepted. Now, I do mean that when men are working in the same place, should one be negligent and injure the other, they should not be entitled to compensation. They should all work together as one man, and should exercise that care and supervision which is so essential to the preservation of safety. That was allowed, and was, in fact, suggested by the hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt) in his speech in 1878, when the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) introduced his Bill into this House. He proposed that common employment should be done away with generally; but that it should be retained in those cases where two or three workmen were working in the same place where they could exercise supervision over each other. But in regard to those working in different places who have not the opportunity of supervising one another, and who have no control over the engagements of the men, or over their conduct, then I say that men who so suffer from accidents are entitled to compensation. Now, with regard to what the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James) said—namely, that it would make this Bill much worse for the employer than the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Stafford, and that, in fact, it was the adoption of that principle. Sir, it is not so. This Amendment is limited entirely to mines; and, as I put it, to dangerous employments. The hon. Member for Stafford extended the principle of his Bill to all employments. The Bill does not give compensation for accidents which arise from purely unavoidable causes. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) said that its provisions would be a frightful imposition upon employers, as managers would in consequence become negligent, and the workmen sacrificed accordingly. We have all along contended that the workmen do not ask for this on account of the increased safety it would give them; that was never present in their minds, as it would establish that they are now receiving larger wages in consideration of their dangerous employment, and thus would not be entitled to compensation if the Bill were to come into force. It has been suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Rye (Mr. Inderwick) that I should leave out the words, "and other dangerous employment," and confine it to mining; and as that is an industry which I had specially in view, and know well that the Amendment will take the sting out of the Bill for men engaged in that employment, I propose to do so.

MR. J. W. PEASE said, that if the Committee were to discuss the question of insurance, then they would upset the whole plan and scheme of the Bill. The hon. Member (Mr. Craig) seemed to be then discussing a portion of the Bill which they had not yet reached. He wished to call attention to the fact that the Bill referred to all kinds of employers, and the hon. Gentleman proposed to make an invidious distinction in the case of employers in some particular trades. He (Mr. Pease) believed fully that the clause would lead to some litigation between masters and men; and, in order to avoid that, the hon. Member seemed to suggest a course which would have the effect of always bringing in a verdict of guilty against the employer. Although the accident might happen through the carelessness of one man, and not through the carelessness of a man having superintendence, the employer was to have to pay. He (Mr. Pease) was one of those who believed that insurance would cover all those accidents. It was, he believed, impossible for the Government to accept the suggestion of the hon. Member, inasmuch as it would have the effect of extending the liability beyond the scope of the Bill before them.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, that the Amendment would extend the Bill far beyond the point suggested by the Government, and, coming from the quarter that it did, he regarded it with very great suspicion. If the Amendment were carried certain interests would be attacked, and it would go in direct opposition to what the Government had distinctly asserted—namely, that they could not accept the principle of the abolition of common employment. The mining interest would certainly be placed in a most serious position. If the Amendment referred to mines only, they could not well avoid applying it in the case of iron and similar works; and, therefore, they could not stop short of the abolition of the doctrine of common employment. He believed it would be a breach of faith if that were done. One other matter to which he wished to refer was that of average. Nothing could be more delusive than to say that accidents cost so much per ton. If he had an accident in his colliery which cost £10,000, it would be no consolation to him to calculate that it would be only so much per ton. If it were spread over all other coal owners, if all contributed, it might be so. The idea of averaging upon the entire production of the commodity was absurd. The loss would fall upon the particular owner, and he would, he believed, be called upon to bear it.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, it was his wish that the liability should be restricted by the jury and not by the Judge. He had always supported the principle of the present Bill. He might mention that, in 1873, he had charge of a Bill which had the same object in view, which went nearer to the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) than anything in that Bill did. What he felt with reference to the clause proposed by the hon. Member (Mr. Craig) was, it was worded in such a vague manner as to place employers of labour in a very much worse position than they had ever previously occupied, or would have been subjected to, if the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford had been accepted. He apprehended that it might be construed so as to make all employers liable for purely accidental causes. He did not see what else was the meaning of the Amendment of the hon. Member. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had already pointed out how, in many cases, accidents happened by the negligence of the workman himself, and, moreover, that many cases were purely accidental. For his part, he (Mr. Hinde Palmer) really did not see, if that clause passed, why employers should not be liable in all those cases, and thus a great injustice be done. He was in favour of restricting the liability somewhat by the jury. He had an Amendment further on, in which was embodied the idea of the hon. Member for Stafford in regard to that. At the same time, he must say that, as the clause stood, even he could not support the Amendment before the Committee. He had made those observations, as he did not wish to be misunderstood with regard to his action in reference to the Amendment he had on the Paper.

MR. BROADHURST said, that he had asked the Government to accept the Amendment, and he had stated his intention to vote for it. After the discussion, however, which had taken place he had changed his mind, and he should feel compelled to vote against it.

MR. HOPWOOD said, that he still desired that there should be, if possible, a compromise as regarded that question of liability. As the Bill stood it was only intended to make employers liable for superintendence; and, as he approved of that principle, he should feel bound to vote against the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Craig) in case he proceeded to a division.

MR. INDERWICK said, that as the hon. Member (Mr. Craig) seemed to be under some misapprehension with regard to the effect of his Amendment, perhaps he would withdraw it.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, that before the next Amendment was taken he wished to say that he had an alternative sub-section to that one; and he should like to ask, as a matter of Order, whether he could propose that subsequently to the next Amendment? That Amendment was to leave out the sub-section.

THE CHAIRMAN: The sub-section is proposed to be left out by the next Amendment.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, that supposing that the sub-section were affirmed, should he be in Order in moving its rejection again?

THE CHAIRMAN: No, certainly not.

MR. BOLTON, in rising to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice, said, that when he put it on the Paper he was not actuated by any motive against the Bill, the principle of which had been explained by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Dodson). His object had been to harmonize the clauses, while allowing the purpose and principle of the Bill to remain intact. He had not, however, been able to discover in what respect sub-section 3 was necessary, so long as sub-section 2 remained in the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman explained, at the time of moving the second reading of the Bill, that its purpose was to render an employer liable for the acts of those to whom he delegated his authority. He thought that sub-section 2 covered the whole of that, and rendered the employer liable for the negligence of those persons. Sub-section 3 merely repeated that in other words. He was aware that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had stated to the Committee that the meaning of the sub-section was to be found in some other part of the Bill. He had searched the Bill for that definition, and had been unable to discern it. He believed that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board also indicated that it referred to some other classes of persons than those referred to in sub-section 2; but he (Mr. Bolton) had also been unable to discover that, seeing that the one rendered the employer liable for personal superintendence, and the other for the person to whose orders or direction the workman was bound to conform. That seemed to him to be two persons, rather than two classes of persons, to whom authority was delegated. He thought that, so long as the Bill contained two clauses which could only be interpreted to refer to one class, it would only tend to increase litigation and do harm to the employer, without being of advantage to the employed. He begged, therefore, to move his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 12, to leave out from "By reason" to "or (4)" in line 16, both inclusive.
—(Mr. Bolton.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, that he trusted the Government would not give way to the Amendment, but retain the sub-section. They saw, in sub-section 2, which had been discussed, that it was distinctly expressed in order to refer to superintendence. That sub-section was evidently intended to point to those whose business it was to superintend and be in charge of the works of the persons whose interests were at stake. Moreover, the Government had defined the person alluded to in sub-section 2 as being one whose sole or principal duty was superintendence, and who was not ordinarily engaged in manual labour. There might be circumstances where the person to whom the workmen had to defer was one who was ordinarily engaged in manual labour, but was charged for a time with superintendence. On that account, he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would stand by the present sub-section and not give way to the proposal of the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Bolton).

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, that he did not suppose he should be accused of going in opposition to the Government. Therefore, he felt more confidence in asking his hon. Friend (Mr. Bolton) not to press his Amendment to omit the whole sub-section. He (Sir Henry Jackson) ventured to think that really the division which was taken upon the proposal of the hon. Member for East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes), at an earlier period of the discussion, had concluded that matter. They struggled then, in order that the liability in the statute should be confined to the vice-master or head superintendent. That sub-section 2 was passed, and the liability attached to negligence of any person who was intrusted with superintendence. He ventured to deny the expression of opinion which came from another part of the Committee that there must be some further explanation of the master's liability than that comprised in sub-section 2. There could be no doubt that they were bound to recognize the opinions of the Government in that matter; and, on the other hand, the Government could not help observing that large numbers of hon. Members on that side, and some converts from the other side, were in favour of a considerable restriction. His hon. Friend the Member for Stirling had proposed to leave out the sub-section altogether. He (Sir Henry Jackson) was satisfied that that could not be done; and he would, therefore, venture to suggest that the Amendment be withdrawn, in order that they might at once proceed to the further consideration of the sub-section. While endeavouring to get the hon. Member to withdraw his opposition to the sub-section, it might not, perhaps, be out of place if he drew the attention of the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill to what he understood to be the ground of the objection to it, in order to elicit from him a favourable expression more likely to result beneficially than if the sub-section were struck out. Great apprehensions were entertained in regard to that change by both the mining and building industries. The building industry, it was well known, had regulations, or, rather, there was a custom of the trade, which was, that they had a large amount of superintendence, or necessary obedience to orders, in very much humbler spheres than were included in the word "superintendence." It was well known that a good deal of superintendence was carried on by workmen who did manual labour themselves, while they were supervising. If the Government would intimate that they were in favour of the proposal, he would himself move to exclude from sub-section 3 all those persons who, though exercising superintendence, were themselves engaged in manual labour. He believed that that would tend to the passing of that sub-section, and remove the present opposition to it. That was not merely his own view of the matter. They had the high authority of the Report prepared by Mr. Lowe, and submitted to the Select Committee, to which reference had been made. Mr. Lowe, while refusing legislation such as that Bill contained, always excepted from the category of men in authority those engaged in manual labour. In following that advice, the Government would remove a great deal of the apprehension which was felt with regard to the clause, and they would be merely doing what they had done in many other parts of the Bill—namely, following the advice tendered to them. He believed that the suggestion he had made would go a great deal further to remove the opposition to the clause than the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Bolton).

MR. BARNES said, he did not know whether the Amendment before the Committee would interfere with one he had on the Paper. The hon. and learned Baronet who had just sat down (Sir Henry Jackson) had referred only to workmen, such as bricklayers; but he (Mr. Barnes) should like to refer for a moment to miners. Twenty-five per cent of all the men working in mines were what were called stallmen, and by the "Mines Regulation Act" there were special rules, whereby the men were bound to follow the directions of those men. Those men who were left in charge were only common workmen, consequently the whole of the regulations and the special rules he had mentioned referred only to that class. One of the instructions was that the man should not take the gauze off the lamp. If the man did so, it seemed to be a monstrous thing that the owners should be liable for the accident which might occur. Unfortunately, the Judges did not seem to be agreed upon that point; but it did appear to him (Mr. Barnes) that where a man caused, perhaps, the death or injury of 50 others, because he chose to act contrary to the rules under the "Mines Regulation Act," the owner should be held answerable, who had not the slightest control over the man in the matter, and could not have avoided the accident by any possible means. Only 10 days ago an accident happened in his mine. A piece of roof fell in and pinned a man to the ground, and it was the greatest mercy that he was not killed. The stallman said he had examined the roof. That was clearly not a case that should come under that Bill. There was certainly a great difficulty in regard to the terms of the sub-section, and he hoped it would be removed from the Bill.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he should like an explanation as to the class of persons included in the sub-section, whether or no that 3rd sub-section included those engaged in manual labour. Personally, he thought that that clause applied to those who were engaged in manual labour; and if the Government acceded to the suggestion of the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson)—namely, that they should make some declaration excluding such workmen, that appeared to him to be equivalent to excluding the sub-section altogether. A great deal had been said in favour of the Motion for exclusion by those who desired to place responsibility on owners of mines and other works, for those employés in regard to whose appointment they had exercised some discretion. Under those circumstances, the employer would, in other cases, avoid the responsibility. On that ground, if his hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Bolton) went to a division, he (Sir Edward Colebrooke) was prepared to vote with him. He hoped, however, that the Government would give some explanation with regard to the limitation of liability, and prevent him from voting as he had suggested that he otherwise should do.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, that the meaning of the sub-section applied, apparently, not merely to those employed in manual labour, but to any person intrusted with authority. There was a distinction between the two classes of the two sub-sections. The class referred to in sub-section 2 was defined in Section 6 of the same Bill as being those who were not ordinarily engaged in manual labour. There might be another class, such as those intrusted with temporary authority, which did not appear to be referred to in sub-section 2, nor in the explanations in Section 6 as applied to that sub-section. That class might be dealt with by sub-section 3; but it appeared to him (Mr. Serjeant Simon), if that were omitted, the principle would not be adhered to that the master should be liable for the acts of those persons who were placed in authority.

MR. DODSON said, that if the Committee would look at sub-section 2, they would see that it made the employer responsible for the negligence generally of persons to whom superintendence was intrusted. Then they came to sub-section 3, which was intended to meet the cases of those men who were themselves engaged in manual labour, or partly so, but had authority intrusted to them. There, as the Committee would see, the liability of the employer was strictly limited to the cases where the workmen were, at the time, bound to conform to the directions of another, and did so conform. In order to make the liability of the employer in those cases limited to those individual men, there was a special superintendence referred to as contrasted with the general superintendence of sub-section 2. In order, however, to make the intention of the sub-section clearer, and to give effect more plainly to the purpose the Government had in view, he would say that he was prepared to amend the sub-section by accepting the words suggested by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) to be added to the sub-section—namely, the words “and such injury resulted from his having so conformed.” He thought that that condition might certainly be accepted.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the Committee that the actual Question before the Committee is that the whole sub-section be omitted.

MR. BOLTON said, he should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board how he would interpret the liability of the master in such circumstances as these? He was about to read from a document sent to him by the master-builders of the United Kingdom—

“Generally a foreman exercised authority over others, those others over others, and so on, until you come to workmen in a comparatively humble grade. There was, for instance, a bricklayer, and the labourer was expected to conform to the direction of such bricklayer.”

What would be the effect of sub-section 3 in that case? He had been particular to avoid any reference to the definition clause in connection with sub-section 3.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he was sorry, but he had not caught the words the right hon. Gentleman proposed to accept.

MR. DODSON said, that those words were on the Paper as an Amendment, in the name of the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Coventry—“and such injury resulted from his having so conformed.” In reply to the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Bolton), he would say that he was really not in a position to answer a hypothetical case put to him. He should say that, in that sub-section, it would depend whether the workman, at the time of the injury, was bound to conform to the orders of the person whose orders were to be obeyed according to the terms of the employment and the condition of the trade.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, that he did not see that the matter was altered by the addition of the words proposed. Was he to understand that the liability was strictly confined to accidents arising at a time in consequence of an order given by someone intrusted with the power of giving that order? Supposing that the accident was of a general character, and occurred in consequence of an order so given, would that section apply in that case; and, if so, to what extent? In mines, as pointed out before by him, a large number of persons had more or less authority delegated to them. It was impossible that mine-owners could themselves see whether all those men were competent persons to whose orders others were bound to conform. There were rules under the Act which would clearly show that a certain amount of authority was delegated to those men. As he had before stated, there were 17 classes of men to whom authority of some kind was delegated, and for each of those the employer was apparently to be made liable. In a mine, for instance, there were 50 such men; and, as he understood it, the owner was responsible by that sub-section, and would be held liable for the negligent acts of the whole 50. That was carrying the doctrine of liability certainly too far, and he really thought that it could hardly be justified. It appeared to him that there was a great omission in the words, as they stood, for it had not been shown why an owner who was bound by law to employ a particular man should be liable for his negligence. He had exercised the best judgment in his selection, and the very best men had been selected, with the best wages; and yet, if there were negligence in the case of anyone a little past the sphere of an ordinary workman, then the owner, who had no more to do with it than a perfect stranger, was held liable for the damage under that sub-section.

MR. DODSON said, he would endeavour to make it clear as regarded that sub-section. As they got lower down in the scale, the liability of the employer was limited. He was not liable, as his hon Friend (Mr. Hussey Vivian) had said, for any damage which might be caused by the act of an inferior, for the liability was strictly limited by the words of the sub-section, that the injury done to the workman must be at a time when he was bound to conform to the directions of the particular person in authority, and did so conform. They proposed to clench that, adding the words proposed by the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson).

MR. J. W. PEASE said, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman fully understood yet how very diffused the liability would be, when it lay upon an owner, for the acts of 500 or 600 agents, although only agents, as regarded the workmen injured, to whom he must conform. It would place an enormous amount of liability upon the owner for acts over which he could have no possible control. Those men were not vice-masters in any sense of the term, but were employed as merely part of the system of superintendence, and if the owner was answerable for all of them it would entail an immense amount of liability. It might happen, indeed, that the owner might become liable for an accident which he was doing his best to avoid. It seemed to him that, in that case, the amount for which the owner was to be held responsible ought to be much more limited than it was under that clause.

MR. BARNES said, that if the right hon. Gentleman would only take the trouble to read the special rules of the Coal Mines Regulation Act he would see that the sub-section clashed with the rules laid down by the Inspectors of the Home Office.

MR. THOMPSON said, that it appeared to him that there was an omission in the sub-section. He thought the liability ought to be the same in that as in the former sub-sections. If they were going to extend the liability beyond persons really in authority down to the class of workmen, they would get into that principle of common employment which the promoters of the Bill professed themselves anxious to avoid. He wished the Committee, and the great trading interests, to understand what an entire change of front had taken place in the direction of the principle of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald). Several papers had been sent to him on the subject, and one contained an instance to this effect. A workman was employed on a scaffolding, and his superior explained to him and showed him how to make a particular knot, by which one post was tied to another. The man, in the absence of his superior, neglected to obey the instructions given to him, and made those under him fasten the scaffolding in another way, whereby it fell, and some workmen were injured thereby. Here was a case in which every possible care had been taken, and instructions given; but the orders were disobeyed, and the result was a serious accident. Under such circumstances, it appeared hard to hold the employer liable. He quite agreed that the workman should receive compensation in certain cases; but not in such as the one he had described.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he wished to insert words in line 13, the effect of which would be to confine the liability of the employed to the actions of persons who had superintendence intrusted to them. His object was to prevent the employer being made liable for injuries which had resulted to the workmen from negligent orders or directions given by a person in the service of the employer. The Select Committee on the subject had reported strongly against making an employer liable for injuries which were the result of the acts of fellow-workmen. His Amendment, he thought, would meet the great difficulty.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, to leave out sub-section 3, and insert "by reason of, obedient to the negligent order or direction of any person in the service of the employer to whose orders or directions the workman at the time of the injury was, under any of the rules or bye-laws published by the employer for the observance of the workmen in his service, not being rules or bye-laws made or established by, or in pursuance of, the provisions of any Act of Parliament, bound to conform, and did conform, provided such order or direction was not contrary to such rules or bye-laws."

Question proposed, "That sub-section 3 stand part of the Clause."

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, he doubted whether the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member (Mr. Hussey Vivian) would meet the object which he had in view. He would, therefore, ask him to withdraw the Amendment, and to insert, instead, words which he would himself, if necessary, propose, making the meaning of the Amendment perfectly clear.

Mr. Thompson

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he would now move to insert the words, in sub-section 3, which would prevent the employer from being liable for the negligence of any person who at the time was not engaged, either alone or with others, in manual labour.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 13, to insert "by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer was then engaged, either alone or with others, in manual labour."—(Mr. Hussey Vivian.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. DODSON said, he could not accept such an Amendment. It would really raise greater difficulties than it would settle. If those words were inserted, the question which would be immediately put when any difficulty arose on the clause would be what amounted to manual labour, and at what particular moment a man might, or might not, be said to be engaged in manual labour. He hoped the Amendment would be withdrawn.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he hoped the Government would now consent to report Progress. The Committee had been engaged during the whole of the day in discussing the Bill, and, after so many hours of consecutive work, he thought they were entitled to ask the Government to stop.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Lord Randolph Churchill.)

MR. DODSON said, he was inclined to assent to the request of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock, more especially as he should have to ask the Committee to sit again to-morrow, at 12 o'clock.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he would ask the Government to report Progress at once, without any pledge. If they would not do so, he hoped that they would accept the recommendation of the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney). The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had stated that if that important sub-section were taken on Report it would be taken before an attenuated House of Commons. He (Mr. Balfour) thought that was better than taking it then, before an exhausted Committee of the House of Commons, as the hon. Member had admitted the present Committee was. The hon. Member also said that if the matter were pressed to a division he would support the Government. He sincerely trusted that the Government would not go to a division upon the matter.

MR. BIRLEY said, he could not help remarking that the sub-section appeared to be by no means clear. He had found few persons who understood it. He would feel bound, therefore, to support the Amendment; but he hoped the Government would consent to report Progress.

MR. DODSON said, with very great regret, he would accede to the request to report Progress. They would resume the consideration of the sub-section at 12 to-morrow, and he trusted they might then be able to make some real progress with the Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

GAME LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Knight, Mr. Wilbraham Egerton, Mr. Brand, Mr. Pease.)

[BILL 291.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Knight.)

MR. DILLWYN said, that he thought it was too late to take the second reading of the Bill then. He begged to move that it be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. J. W. PEASE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. J. W. Pease.)

MR. KNIGHT said, he should not object to that, and he would put down the second reading for that day week.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Tuesday next.

TEACHERS' REGISTRATION BILL.

On Motion of Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bill to provide for the Registration and Organisation of Teachers, ordered to be brought in by Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Mr. PLAYFAIR, and Mr. ARTHUR BALFOUR.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 296.]

EXPIRING LAWS CONTINUANCE BILL.

On Motion of Mr. JOHN HOLMS, Bill to continue various Expiring Laws, ordered to be brought in by Mr. JOHN HOLMS and Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 297.]

House adjourned at half after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 4th August, 1880.

MINUTES.] — SELECT COMMITTEE — Report — Sugar Industries [No. 332].

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Free Education (Scotland) * [299]; Married Women (Maintenance, &c. of Children) * [300].

Committee — Employers' Liability (re-comm.) [209]—R.P.

Committee — Report — Exchequer Bonds and Bills * [294]; Metropolitan Board of Works (Money) * [272]; Fraudulent Debtors (Scotland) (re-comm.) * [289-298].

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House, that he had received from Mr. Justice Lush and Mr. Justice Manisty, two of the Judges selected, in pursuance of The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, for the Trial of Election Petitions, a Report relating to the Election for the City of Chester.

And the same was read, as followeth:—

CHESTER CITY ELECTION.

The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868.

The Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Act, 1879.

The Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Act, 1880:

To the Right Honourable

The Speaker of the House of Commons.

In our Report of the result of the Election Petition for the Borough of Chester, dated the 17th day of July last, We stated that we abstained from reporting the names of the persons proved to have been guilty of bribery at the Election of the Right honourable John George Dodson and the Honourable Beilby Lawley on the 1st day of April last for the reason stated in our Judgment; such reason being that inasmuch as our Report might result in a Royal Commission, we thought it better not to report the names of the parties unless the House required us to do so.

The House having requested us to do so, we now further report that the following persons were proved at the trial to have been guilty of corrupt practices:—

Persons bribed.	Persons by whom Voters were bribed or treated.
John Gibson.	Wm. Whittingham.
George Burkhill.	Frederick Jarvis.
Isaac Davies.	William Stonely.
George Sanders.	James Whitton.
William Henry Kay.	John Hickey.
Daniel Jones.	Charles Hibbert.
John Ibbotson.	Thomas Horabin.
Robert Jones.	Jonathan Joinson.
Charles Hughes.	Charles Brown.
Henry Snelson.	J. P. Cartwright.
John Edge.	Thomas Rogers.
Henry Garratt.	George Falladown
Richard Dodd.	Adams.
George Price.	Francis F. Brown.
John Price.	W. C. Deeley.
John Littler.	George Thomas.
William Smith, of	Urias Bromley.
Hop Pole Yard.	Henry Essery.
Edward Meacock.	William Bernhardt.
Joseph Beckett.	Arthur Orrett.
George Cross.	Stephen Thomas Box.
William Walker.	John R. Crawford.
Joseph Clarke.	Thomas Mottershead.

We gave a Certificate of Indemnity to William Bernhardt and to each of the persons bribed.

Dated this 3rd day of August 1880.

ROBT. LUSH.
H. MANISTY.

And the said Report was ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

QUESTION.

MERCHANT SHIPPING (GRAIN CARGOES) BILL—RICE.

MR. GOURLEY asked the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been called to the recent inquiry before Mr. Commissioner Rothery relative to the loss of the missing rice-laden ship "Essex;" if so, what precautionary amendment he intends adding to the Grain Cargoes Bill for the purpose of regulating the stowage and freeboard of wood and iron vessels loading rice in bags from British Burmese ports?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, he had not yet received the official Report from Mr. Rothery with respect to the loss of the Essex, and had seen only the version of the Report which had appeared in the newspapers. The Grain Cargoes Bill before the House only professed to deal with and carry out the recommendations of the Committee recently appointed, which confined its attention, in the first instance, to circumstances attending the carriage of grain from certain ports. He did not think it would be useful, at the present advanced period of the Session, to attempt legislation which was not contemplated by the Report of that Committee, which had no evidence before it respecting the carriage of rice from Indian ports. No doubt it was a matter of considerable importance, and it would come under the cognizance of the Committee should it be re-appointed next year. In the meantime, he might call attention to a clause of the Bill before the House which expressly threw on shipowners the obligation to take such further precautions as circumstances showed to be necessary. If the recent Report showed further precautions to be necessary with rice cargoes, it would be the duty of shipowners to take them, whether they were subjects of specific legislation or not.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY (re-committed) BILL—[BILL 209.]

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Brassey.)

COMMITTEE.

[Progress 3rd August.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Amendment of law).

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 13, after the word "employer," to insert the words "and not then engaged, either alone or with others, in manual labour."—(Mr. Hussey Vivian.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that he thought this Amendment required but little consideration. The effect, if these words were inserted, would be to make the employer only responsible for those persons who had general powers of superintendence, and would make Sub-section 3 substantially the same as Sub-section 2. The case would not be met of any person having particular superintendence intrusted to him. He could not agree to the Amendment.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that he thought that the Government was quite right in objecting to the insertion of this Amendment. He did not see the wisdom of limiting the Bill in the manner proposed. It seemed to him that the Amendment was inconsistent with the object of the Bill.

Amendment negatived.

MR. DODSON said, that in the absence of the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) he would move the Amendment which stood in his name. He believed it would meet with the general consent of the Committee, and he had agreed to accept it. It would come in at the end of Sub-section 3, and would render that more explicit by enacting that the injury must be caused by the negligence of any person in the service of the employer, by whose orders or directions the workman at the time of the injury was bound to conform, and did conform, and such injury resulted from his having so conformed.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 15, after "conform," to insert "and such injury resulted from his having so conformed."—(Mr. Dodson.)

MR. GORST said, that as the clause was originally drawn it made the employer liable for the injury caused by reason of negligence of any person in the service of the employer to whose directions the workman was bound to conform. He presumed that, as now amended, the sub-section would limit it to cases in which injury had been caused solely in consequence of obedience of those orders. He did not see any objection to that being done, and it seemed to him to be in accordance with the principles of the Bill.

MR. DODSON said, he stated, last night, that that was the intention.

MR. RYLANDS said, that this Amendment was of so great importance that it was absolutely necessary to so frame it as to make it quite clear. If it remained as it was it might lead to serious difficulty in the case of some employments. He did not think that the Government had quite recognized the fact that in large iron works certain departments were placed under the management of sub-contractors, who employed the men who did the work under them. These men, called the foremen of the particular departments, were really employers; they were sub-employers, and received from the ironmaster a sum varying according to the amount of work they produced, and out of that they paid wages to the people in their employ. It seemed to him that the effect of this sub-section, as amended, would be that the man who was, practically, an employer, and who might by his action lead to accidents to the men in his employ, either through his own negligence or through the negligence of the men employed by him, was entirely free from responsibility. This sub-employer, who had really been guilty of negligence, would not be liable to an action on the part of people in his employ; but the unfortunate owner of the iron works was liable for the actions which really ought to be brought against the sub-employer. He thought there ought to be some qualifying words, throwing upon the party having the absolute direction of the men a certain amount of responsibility. He must say that he should have been glad to see some qualification introduced to meet those cases where a sub-employer actually paid wages to workmen who were under his control, and that he should be made personally responsible. It was perfectly certain that, as the Bill stood, such a sub-contractor would incur no responsibility.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that the law stood in this way in the case put by the hon. Member. The sub-contractor entered into contracts with the workmen on his own behalf; and, under those circumstances, the master would be exempt from responsibility. He was sure the hon. Gentleman would be satisfied that in such a case there would be no liability on the higher employer, but the middle

the Committee if he referred to another point. An Amendment had been placed upon the Paper, which evidently aimed at relieving employers from responsibility in cases where the defective bye-law was framed under the provisions of an Act of Parliament, or an Order in Council. He proposed, when the proper time arrived, to introduce an Amendment to deal with that particular case. He thought it would come in more properly at Clause 2, where it was provided that the master should not be responsible for injury derived from bye-laws, unless it could be shown that the bye-laws were improper or defective. He proposed to introduce another sub-section to the effect that if a rule or bye-law had been approved of or accepted by the Board of Trade, or any other Department of the Government, it should not be deemed, for the purposes of this Act, to be an improper rule or bye-law. He thought that that provision would meet the circumstances of the case.

MR. WIGGIN said, he should like to know whether the master would be responsible, under certain circumstances, in the iron manufacture? If the iron was not run out from the furnace with sufficient care, perhaps, before the sand was dry, an explosion would ensue. He should like to know whether, under those circumstances, the employer would be responsible to the men engaged in that operation?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that in such a case the employer would not be liable.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BARNES said, that the sub-section which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had intimated his intention to move, would go some way towards meeting their objections. In the case of mines their rules were drawn up, and approved of, under the provisions of an Act of Parliament. He did not intend to move the Amendment which stood in his name.

MR. BRYCE said, that he begged to propose an Amendment that he thought would simplify the Bill, without making any alteration in its substance. He proposed, in page 1, line 19, after "obedience to," to leave out "particular" and insert "improper or defective." As the Bill was at present drawn, it would give rise to a great quantity of litigation. It was extremely difficult to construe, even for a trained lawyer, and it must occasion great difficulty to workmen and employers, and even to the County Court Judges who would have to deal with it. He thought they would be rendering good service by making the Bill as simple as possible. That would be effected, he thought, in a great measure, by abolishing the exceptions in the sub-sections of Clause 2. If Clauses 1 and 2 were read together, the reader's mind was liable to become very confused; it was really difficult to know what was intended to be the rule, and what the exception. Under those circumstances, he had put upon the Paper a series of Amendments, the adoption of which would not produce any substantial alteration in the liability of the employer, but would simplify the Bill, by getting rid of the first three sub-sections of Clause 2. If in the 4th sub-section of Clause 1, they were, after "obedience to," to leave out "the," and insert "any improper or defective," and in line 19, after "obedience to," to leave out "particular" and insert "improper or defective," he thought that the same result would be arrived at as if they retained the 2nd sub-section of Clause 2. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had just then observed that the only case where the liability of the employer would arise under sub-section 4 of Clause 1, would be where the bye-laws were improper or defective. He (Mr. Bryce) thought that the better way to show that would be to adopt the Amendment which he proposed. He would read sub-section 4 of Clause 1, as it would stand in case his Amendments were adopted, and sub-section 4 of Clause 2 were subsequently omitted—

"By reason of the act or omission of any person in the service of the employer done or made in obedience to any improper or defective rules or bye-laws of the employer, or in obedience to any improper or defective instructions given by any person delegated with the authority of the employer in that behalf;"

and would express the hope that the Government would accept an Amendment which, while simple, was calculated to improve and render more intelligible this perplexing Bill.

MR. DODSON said, he could not accept the proposal of the hon. Member.

Mr. Dodson

He was not going to enter into an argument as to whether they might re-cast the Bill in a better shape or not; but they had drafted the Bill for better or for worse. In one clause it stated the liability upon the master, and in another clause it stated the exceptions by which the master was relieved of his responsibility. The proposal now made was to alter the substance of the Bill—to re-cast and re-draft it. He would ask the hon. Member, and he would ask the Committee, how the Government, having already difficulties enough to contend with, could hope to succeed in passing the Bill, if, in addition to the contentious matter already involved, they were to undertake to re-cast and re-draft it? If they did, he should certainly despair of passing the Bill altogether. He was sure that it was unnecessary to adopt that course; and he must distinctly warn the hon. Member that if they were to attempt to re-cast or re-draft the Bill, it would be all but impossible to pass it through.

MR. WARTON said, he was not going to follow the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman, because it seemed impossible to make him see the good sense of this Amendment. He quite agreed with all that had been said by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce). With the object of assisting him he begged to move an Amendment upon his Amendment. The word "defective" had been used too much in the Bill, and he proposed to substitute for it some words which seemed to him to be better. He should suggest that, instead of "defective," they should say "any unreasonable or illegal" rules or bye-laws. Those words, which applied to rules or bye-laws, were well known to every Judge in the Kingdom.

THE CHAIRMAN asked if the hon. and learned Member intended to move those words if the Committee determined to leave out the word "the?"

MR. E. J. REED said, that he rose to protest against the offensive remarks of the hon. and learned Member. It was really distressing to hon. Members to hear remarks levelled against Ministers which were certainly not only rude but were, probably, very much worse than rude.

MR. WARTON said, that with reference to the last remark of the hon.

Member for Cardiff, the expression which he had used was not rude; it was simply the spirit of despair. The right hon. Gentleman did not seem to see the great assistance to the Bill which the adoption of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets would be.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that he must ask the hon. Member for Cardiff not to be too hasty in making accusations against hon. Members. He wished to point out to the hon. and learned Member for Bridport that he was very glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board refuse to accept the Amendment. He thought if the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets wished to simplify the construction of the Bill, he had taken a course which would not do so.

MR. RYLANDS said, that he was very glad the right hon. Gentleman refused to accept the Amendment. Perhaps the Bill was capable of very considerable improvement; but when the Bill was laid upon the Table of the House it was read a second time pro forma, and then re-committed for the purpose of being altered by the Government. They now had the Bill as prepared by the Government; and he thought, notwithstanding the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets, that the Committee would do well to retain the Bill in its present shape. With reference to the remarks upon the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, he believed that every Member of the Committee had been strongly impressed with his extreme courtesy and the great ability displayed by him in dealing with this question.

MR. BRYCE said, that, of course, it would be idle for him to persist in his Amendment, since the Government had refused to accept it. He differed, however, from the right hon. Gentleman in thinking that the Bill was better as it was. Still, he did not wish to put his judgment against that of the right hon. Gentleman, and therefore he should withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BARNES said, that he should not move the Amendment of which he had given Notice, in page 1, line 19, to leave out "any," and insert "the." He begged, however, to move, in line 19, page 1, after "person," to leave out to the end of the sub-section, and to insert instead thereof "in the service of the employer who has superintendence intrusted to him."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that the Committee would see that the liability thrown upon the employer by the second part of this sub-section was in respect of instructions given by any person delegated with the authority of the employer in that behalf. The hon. Member proposed that the instructions should be given by a person who had superintendence intrusted to him. He thought that the words used in the sub-section were much more ample, and would avoid the difficulty which would be raised if instructions were sent, and not given, by a person having superintendence.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that he could not understand why the Government refused to accept this Amendment. As the clause stood, it was left to the jury to decide whether a person was delegated or not with the authority of the employer, and the extent to which he was delegated; whereas the Amendment of the hon. Member made it explicit that the instructions must be given by some person having superintendence.

Amendment negatived.

MR. WHITWELL said, that he had given Notice of an Amendment in page 1, line 20, after "behalf," to insert—

"Unless such person has given instructions contrary to the special orders written or printed and put up by the employer."

He should propose that Amendment at a later stage of the Bill.

MR. S. MORLEY said, that he had to propose an Amendment in page 1, line 20, after the word "behalf," to insert the following sub-section:—

"Or, by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer engaged in a branch or department of such service separate and distinct from that in which the workman was engaged."

His object was to secure an enlargement, or modification, of the doctrine of common employment. The defence of common employment rested upon the presumption that the workmen employed together should watch each other; but where workmen were engaged in distinct departments this was found to be simply impossible. The Scotch Courts had long held that it was most unreasonable to deny a remedy for injury occasioned by the act of a servant not immediately connected with the person injured. Their law was now assimilated to that of this country. But there was a case in which Lord Ardmillan had put the case so clearly that, with the permission of the Committee, he would read a few extracts from his Judgment. The case was that of "Macfarlane v. The Caledonian Railway Company." Lord Ardmillan said—

"The pursuer states that he was in the employment of the Railway Company as a labourer; but he avers that shortly before the accident of which he complains he was employed as a watchman to watch the effect of trains passing over a spot where the railway was merely supported by uprights, the ground under it having been excavated for the formation of a bridge under which another railway was to be carried. The pursuer was engaged in this duty while it was dark early in the morning when the accident happened. He had a watch box at a little distance from the place where the ground was excavated; but he states that he could not see the effect of a train passing that place without coming close beside it with his lantern. This is what he states he did in compliance with the orders he received to watch the effects of that train passing, and he says he was standing at the only place where he could have watched the effect of that train. Just when he was so employed a down train came by and knocked him down and injured him. The pursuer avers that he did not know that a down train was then due, and that he had received no information as to when the trains were to arrive; and he further alleges that the defendants' inspector who employed him to watch had told him that no train would arrive after 12 o'clock at night. In such a case the defenders may have defences founded upon the nature of the pursuer's employment, and the duty in which he was engaged, as exempting them from responsibility; but the Lord Ordinary does not think it can be held in a question of relevancy, and that without any investigation he declares that the pursuer, though employed to perform the special office of watching from a particular spot of the line the effect of a train passing, was not entitled to rely that the defenders' arrangements were such as to make it possible for him to perform that duty without being run down by another train. It does not appear to the Lord Ordinary that the relative responsibility of the parties can be properly judged of until the whole facts shall be ascertained."

He had never been able to understand why, if two passengers were travelling by a railway train together and were killed, the family of the one who was not employed by the Railway Company should be entitled to compensation, whereas if the other passenger happened to be an engine driver, or other servant of the Company, his family could obtain no compensation whatever. There were comparatively few small establishments in the country in which a master himself worked, and where his servant, if injured through his negligence, would have a right of compensation. They had now, all over England, establishments containing a population almost as large as the Government Departments; and it did appear to him that the time had now come when there should be, at all events, some relaxation in the law of common employment.

Mr. Barnes

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 20, after the word "behalf," to insert the words "Or, by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer engaged in a branch or department of such service separate and distinct from that in which the workman was engaged." — (Mr. Morley.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. BARNES said, that if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol were carried, he should move an Amendment exempting mineowners from the provisions of the Bill. They were exposed by the measure to a gigantic responsibility.

MR. J. K. CROSS said, that an Amendment very similar to this was introduced by the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Craig) with the object of applying it to mines only, and it was negatived without a division. In the case of an explosion in a mine, if the same law were applied to mineowners as to other employers a very great liability would be thrown upon them. He did not think that it was possible that such could be the intention of the Government.

MR. CRAIG said, that he was sure that the Government was desirous to make this Bill as complete as possible, and they could only do so by giving careful attention to the suggestions of practical men. If the Bill passed in its present rough state, he feared that the effect upon certain industries would be very detrimental. But if employers, and especially mineowners, would do their best to get rid of this evil doctrine of common employment, or, at all events, to reduce it to its proper limits, they would occupy a much more dignified position two years hence. The late Government had done much to bring about a change of public opinion with regard to the doctrine of common employment; for, two years ago, few, if any, would admit the necessity of any such alteration of the law as this Bill proposed. And if it passed into law, a still greater change in that opinion would speedily be effected by its operation, and the litigation which would arise would ripen opinion for abolishing that doctrine so far as it related to those workmen who had no oversight or control of each other. At present, however, he did not think that public opinion was ripe for so modifying the doctrine. If there was one employment more than another in which a demand for the modification of the doctrine of common employment was strongest it was in the case of miners, for there a man was at the mercy of his fellow-workmen, over whom he could exercise no control whatever. If it were right to make an employer responsible for any man intrusted with supervision, he could not see that it was just and reasonable to exclude from their liability those men over whose engagement and dismissal, and over whose conduct, a fellow-workman had no real control.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, that the proposal of the hon. Member for Bristol raised a question which had been the subject of agitation for some years, and had culminated in the Bill now brought in by the Government. The Scotch case cited by the hon. Member, and in which Lord Ardmillan had given judgment, had actually arisen also in the English Courts. There was a well known case in which a platelayer was run down by a railway train; but it was held that his representatives were not entitled to recover, because he and the engine-driver were engaged in a common work. What was the common work of a man working on the railway and of an engine-driver? The man working on the railway was held to be engaged in a common work with the man running the engine, because the object of both was to secure the passage of the railway train. Anything more monstrous in its injustice than such reasoning it was impossible to conceive. He was sure that that never was, and never could have been, the original intention of the defence of common employment. Take to leave out "any," and insert "the." He begged, however, to move, in line 19, page 1, after "person," to leave out to the end of the sub-section, and to insert instead thereof "in the service of the employer who has superintendence intrusted to him."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that the Committee would see that the liability thrown upon the employer by the second part of this sub-section was in respect of instructions given by any person delegated with the authority of the employer in that behalf. The hon. Member proposed that the instructions should be given by a person who had superintendence intrusted to him. He thought that the words used in the sub-section were much more ample, and would avoid the difficulty which would be raised if instructions were sent, and not given, by a person having superintendence.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that he could not understand why the Government refused to accept this Amendment. As the clause stood, it was left to the jury to decide whether a person was delegated or not with the authority of the employer, and the extent to which he was delegated; whereas the Amendment of the hon. Member made it explicit that the instructions must be given by some person having superintendence.

Amendment negatived.

MR. WHITWELL said, that he had given Notice of an Amendment in page 1, line 20, after "behalf," to insert—

"Unless such person has given instructions contrary to the special orders written or printed and put up by the employer."

He should propose that Amendment at a later stage of the Bill.

MR. S. MORLEY said, that he had to propose an Amendment in page 1, line 20, after the word "behalf," to insert the following sub-section:—

"Or, by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer engaged in a branch or department of such service separate and distinct from that in which the workman was engaged."

His object was to secure an enlargement, or modification, of the doctrine of common employment. The defence of common employment rested upon the presumption that the workmen employed

together should watch each other; but where workmen were engaged in distinct departments this was found to be simply impossible. The Scotch Courts had long held that it was most unreasonable to deny a remedy for injury occasioned by the act of a servant not immediately connected with the person injured. Their law was now assimilated to that of this country. But there was a case in which Lord Ardmillan had put the case so clearly that, with the permission of the Committee, he would read a few extracts from his Judgment. The case was that of "Macfarlane v. The Caledonian Railway Company." Lord Ardmillan said—

"The pursuer states that he was in the employment of the Railway Company as a labourer; but he avers that shortly before the accident of which he complains he was employed as a watchman to watch the effect of trains passing over a spot where the railway was merely supported by uprights, the ground under it having been excavated for the formation of a bridge under which another railway was to be carried. The pursuer was engaged in this duty while it was dark early in the morning when the accident happened. He had a watch box at a little distance from the place where the ground was excavated; but he states that he could not see the effect of a train passing that place without coming close beside it with his lantern. This is what he states he did in compliance with the orders he received to watch the effects of that train passing, and he says he was standing at the only place where he could have watched the effect of that train. Just when he was so employed a down train came by and knocked him down and injured him. The pursuer avers that he did not know that a down train was then due, and that he had received no information as to when the trains were to arrive; and he further alleges that the defendants' inspector who employed him to watch had told him that no train would arrive after 12 o'clock at night. In such a case the defenders may have defences founded upon the nature of the pursuer's employment, and the duty in which he was engaged, as exempting them from responsibility; but the Lord Ordinary does not think it can be held in a question of relevancy, and that without any investigation he declares that the pursuer, though employed to perform the special office of watching from a particular spot of the line the effect of a train passing, was not entitled to rely that the defenders' arrangements were such as to make it possible for him to perform that duty without being run down by another train. It does not appear to the Lord Ordinary that the relative responsibility of the parties can be properly judged of until the whole facts shall be ascertained."

He had never been able to understand why, if two passengers were travelling by a railway train together and were killed, the family of the one who was not employed by the Railway Company should be entitled to compensation, whereas if the other passenger happened to be an engine driver, or other servant of the Company, his family could obtain no compensation whatever. There were comparatively few small establishments in the country in which a master himself worked, and where his servant, if injured through his negligence, would have a right of compensation. They had now, all over England, establishments containing a population almost as large as the Government Departments; and it did appear to him that the time had now come when there should be, at all events, some relaxation in the law of common employment.

Mr. Barnes

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 20, after the word "behalf," to insert the words "Or, by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer engaged in a branch or department of such service separate and distinct from that in which the workman was engaged."—(Mr. Morley.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. BARNES said, that if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol were carried, he should move an Amendment exempting mineowners from the provisions of the Bill. They were exposed by the measure to a gigantic responsibility.

MR. J. K. CROSS said, that an Amendment very similar to this was introduced by the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Craig) with the object of applying it to mines only, and it was negatived without a division. In the case of an explosion in a mine, if the same law were applied to mineowners as to other employers a very great liability would be thrown upon them. He did not think that it was possible that such could be the intention of the Government.

MR. CRAIG said, that he was sure that the Government was desirous to make this Bill as complete as possible, and they could only do so by giving careful attention to the suggestions of practical men. If the Bill passed in its present rough state, he feared that the effect upon certain industries would be very detrimental. But if employers, and especially mineowners, would do their best to get rid of this evil doctrine of common employment, or, at all events, to reduce it to its proper limits, they would occupy a much more dignified position two years hence. The late Government had done much to bring about a change of public opinion with regard to the doctrine of common employment; for, two years ago, few, if any, would admit the necessity of any such alteration of the law as this Bill proposed. And if it passed into law, a still greater change in that opinion would speedily be effected by its operation, and the litigation which would arise would ripen opinion for abolishing that doctrine so far as it related to those workmen who had no oversight or control of each other. At present, however, he did not think that public opinion was ripe for so modifying the doctrine. If there was one employment more than another in which a demand for the modification of the doctrine of common employment was strongest it was in the case of miners, for there a man was at the mercy of his fellow-workmen, over whom he could exercise no control whatever. If it were right to make an employer responsible for any man intrusted with supervision, he could not see that it was just and reasonable to exclude from their liability those men over whose engagement and dismissal, and over whose conduct, a fellow-workman had no real control.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, that the proposal of the hon. Member for Bristol raised a question which had been the subject of agitation for some years, and had culminated in the Bill now brought in by the Government. The Scotch case cited by the hon. Member, and in which Lord Ardmillan had given judgment, had actually arisen also in the English Courts. There was a well known case in which a platelayer was run down by a railway train; but it was held that his representatives were not entitled to recover, because he and the engine-driver were engaged in a common work. What was the common work of a man working on the railway and of an engine-driver? The man working on the railway was held to be engaged in a common work with the man running the engine, because the object of both was to secure the passage of the railway train. Anything more monstrous in its injustice than such reasoning it was impossible to conceive. He was sure that that never was, and never could have been, the original intention of the defence of common employment. Take another case. A man was engaged in painting a shed, and another in removing an engine; in doing so he ran the engine into the shed, and the man painting the shed was knocked down and injured. It had been held that he was not entitled to recover, because he and the engine-driver were engaged in a common employment. What community of employment could there be between the man who was removing an engine from one place to another, and the man who was engaged in painting the shed? Such were the subtleties to which the defence of common employment had given rise. In a Judgment of the Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, in the case of "Morgan v. The Vale of Neath Railway Company," his Lordship said—

"I concur with the rest of the Court in discharging the rule in this case; but I am desirous it should be understood that I do so wholly out of deference to the authority of 'Hutchinson v. the York, Newcastle, and Berwick Railway Company,' and 'Waller v. the South Eastern Railway Company.' But for the decisions in those cases, I should have been disposed to think that a workman employed to do carpenters' work for a Railway Company, and the servants of the Company engaged in the conduct of the traffic of the Railway, though in the service of a common employer, were not fellow labourers engaged in a common work, under a common employment, so as to exempt the master from liability for injury arising to one servant from the negligence of the other. The Court of Exchequer having, however, held, in the first case, that the servant of a Railway Company, travelling on their business in one of their trains, was a fellow servant of those who had charge of the train; and, in the second, that the ganger of platelayers, whose business it was to keep the permanent way in repair, and the guard of the train, were fellow labourers, so as to exempt the Company from liability in respect of the injury sustained by one servant through the negligence of the other, it seems to me that the present case comes within the principle of those decisions; and, consequently, that we have no alternative but to discharge this rule, leaving the plaintiff to have recourse to the Court of Appeal, if it is thought desirable that the principle involved in the decisions should be further considered."

One of the cases referred to by his hon. Friend (Mr. Morley) was that of a clerk sent on board a ship belonging to the firm by which he was employed, and there meeting with an accident through the negligence of some of the crew. It had been held in such a case that the man was not entitled to recover compensation for injuries, because of the community of employment between himself and the crew of the vessel. It was difficult to see the community of employment between a clerk in an office on shore and the crew of a ship; and it was because of the monstrous extremity to which the doctrine of common employment had been pushed that the necessity for bringing forward this Bill had arisen. The question was, whether the Amendment of the hon. Member would meet the cases he had suggested? He entertained considerable doubt that it would. In the 2nd section of the Bill the employer was made liable for injuries sustained by reason of the negligence of any person in his service who had superintendence intrusted to him. Such, for instance, as a man working in a shed who sustained injuries in consequence of the carelessness of those shunting the engine, might be included; but he did not think it would be, because those driving the engine had no superintending power in the sense intended by the sub-section. They were ordinary working men, and they had no superintendence at all. They were simply told to move the engine, and it was by their negligence and want of skill in moving the engine that the accident occurred. That was a case which would not be included in sub-section 2; nor would it be under sub-section 3, nor under sub-section 4, which simply provided for accidents caused in obedience to defective rules and regulations. He thought, that in order to meet the present defective state of the law in the particular case he had instanced, a separate sub-section should be introduced.

MR. S. MORLEY said, that his Amendment was intended as a new sub-section.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, that then the word "or" at the beginning of the Amendment ought to be struck out. He supposed that his hon. Friend meant the new sub-section to apply to any workmen whatever, engaged in a branch or department separate and distinct from that in which the workman injured was engaged, whether or not the person guilty of the negligence had superintendence. If that were not so, the man painting the shed would have no right to compensation, as the engine-driver would be a person not having superintendence. He supported the Amendment, because he believed it would remedy a glaring defect in the law.

Mr. Craig

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, after considerable reflection, and after studying, to the best of his ability, the mass of literature with which the House had been flooded since this question had come before it, he had arrived at the conclusion that the doctrine of common employment was disastrous in its effects alike to employer and employed, and so monstrously unjust from the anomalies which arose under it, that it was productive of unmitigated evil. This Amendment substantially raised the same question as that which was discussed at a late hour on the previous evening, when the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Craig) made a most interesting speech, which hardly received the attention it deserved. He was, therefore, very glad that the hon. Member for Bristol had again raised this point. He wished to ask the Government whether they did not desire, as everybody else desired, to arrive at some final settlement of this question? Whether they had any hope that this Bill, in its present shape, could be a final settlement of the question? Supposing the measure passed in its present form, as soon as its limited character had been ascertained by a few actions having been tried, and a few accidents having taken place, the workmen would find that they had not got what they thought they would have got, and that discovery would be followed by a fresh agitation conducted with all the energy and enterprise which had marked the present one. It must be remembered, also, that the prospect of new legislation, or the apprehension of new legislation, worked a most damaging and disastrous effect on the trade and employments affected. Now, if the Government would eliminate from their measure this doctrine of common employment, they would, in all probability, arrive at a final settlement of the matter. The present state of things was analogous, in some respects, to what the country experienced at the time of the Reform Bill of 1866. The question then was whether they should have a £5, a £6, or a £7 franchise; and as long as there was any doubt or dispute as to which figure should qualify for the franchise, it was perfectly evident that there would be no rest from the Reform agitation. The matter was only finally settled by at once going to the bottom of the scale. In the same way, if the Government would cut out this doctrine of common employment altogether, and make employers liable for all accidents of every kind which might occur, they would arrive at a solid basis on which their legislation might finally rest. They would increase, it was true, the liability of the employer; but they might make it more easy for him to provide against it. That might seem rather paradoxical; but, as a matter of fact, he believed that an unlimited liability would be less damaging to an employer than a limited liability, because he could provide against the former easily; whereas it would be extremely difficult to ascertain the incidence of the latter. What was the use of taking up so much time in considering this Bill, sitting late into the autumn, and detaining everybody from the various occupations which devolved upon them at that season, if they were not to make a settlement in this matter? Would the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodson) get up in his place, knowing, as he did, the views of large bodies of employés, and say that he believed this Bill would be a final settlement? He should be very much surprised to hear that. It was evident there were a very large number of accidents for which the Bill would not provide at all. No person killed in the Risca explosion, for instance, would receive 1*d.* compensation under this Bill by the owners. They had been told by the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Craig), after explaining his very careful calculations, that a rate of not more than 6-10ths of 1*d.* per ton on minerals would provide all compensation for accidents in mines. That rate would hardly be felt by owners, while, at the same time, it would provide them with ample insurance. This Amendment went a long way towards destroying the doctrine of common employment. If this doctrine were wholly abolished, insurance must be general and combined; and when once that was obtained, it would not matter what the extent of the accident was, the liability of the employer would be comparatively trifling. Another great advantage would be that it would discourage litigation. Under this Bill it would always be a question that must be settled by a jury, whether an accident arose from negligence of a workman or not; whereas, if they made the employer liable generally, no litigation could arise if an accident happened, for the workmen would at once receive compensation, the employer, by means of combined insurance, having no temptation to resort to law. Under the present Bill, however, he doubted whether there would be any extension of the present system of insurance, for owners would prefer to take their chance before a County Court Judge, afterwards, perhaps, appealing to a higher Court, rather than of insuring themselves against a liability which might come upon them; and, therefore, the result would be that litigation would be unlimited. If the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board was really anxious to confer a great benefit upon the country, while, at the same time, he ended a long and vexing agitation, he certainly ought to be prepared to take this step, and to do what was now generally acknowledged to be absolutely necessary in order to settle this subject.

MR DODSON said, the noble Lord asked him to say whether he considered the Bill would make a settlement of this question. His reply was that it was a very dangerous thing to admit of any such thing as finality in legislation; therefore, he would not commit himself to any proposition of that kind. This Amendment had been argued by many hon. Members as though it would sweep away altogether the doctrine of common employment, and make an end of it. But it did not do that at all. The complaints against that doctrine, as it was interpreted to the Judges, were that that interpretation was gradually sweeping away the distinctions which the old decisions took into consideration between the different grades of the servants employed, while it also swept away the distinction between servants in large employments engaged in such different branches of the service that, practically, there was no unity between them. It was to this last point that the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman was directed. He cordially and entirely sympathized with his object, and in his speech in introducing the Bill he adverted to that absence of distinction made by the recent decision of the Judges between these very different branches of employment as one of the subjects of complaint that had arisen. The Bill, however, which he had introduced was known to the House before he proposed it, because it was introduced by his hon. Friend the Member for Hastings (Mr. Brassey), and by the hon Member for Bristol himself. That Bill extended the liability of employers, and limited the doctrine of common employment, so far as the absence of distinction between services of different grades was concerned. It did not deal with the second branches of the subject—the absence of distinction between servants of the same masters engaged in different branches of work. That was the Bill he introduced to the House, which was read a second time, which was committed pro forma, and then had Amendments introduced into it to make its intention clear and more definite. None of the clauses of the Bill, either in its original or in its amended shape, went beyond the limitation of the doctrine of common employment so as to make the employer responsible for the neglect of those to whom he committed superintendence. That being so, although he felt great sympathy for the Amendment of his hon. Friend, he could not consent to accept it. He felt bound by what had taken place before, by the fact that the House had consented to read this Bill a second time, and by the declarations which he had made, and other Members of the Government had made, in asking the House to read it a second time. He admitted that there was some difficulty in the law as at present interpreted by the Judges, and he sympathized with the object of the hon. Member; but he could not consent to accept his Amendment. He must admit that the Bill did not embody all that hon. Members desired; but, at the same time, he would ask them to consider whether, if they passed this Amendment, they would facilitate the passage of the Bill?

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he hoped the hesitating answer of the Treasury Bench was not the final answer of the Government on this subject. He did not quite understand how it was that a Member who expressed sympathy with the Amendment, and seemed to admit the reasonable character of the suggestion, should found his opposition to it upon the ground that at the second reading of the Bill it was not accepted, and was not part of the proposition made to the House, or upon the ground that the House was now in Committee, and that this was a very serious change. He admitted that the change was a serious one. But the history of the Bill was peculiar. Although he was not a Member of the House at the time of the second reading, he believed it was a fact that the Bill was read in blank a second time, and that important questions were postponed for consideration in Committee, and the House was told, in explanation of that course, that it was in Committee that the Government would be prepared to make its propositions. Certain propositions were now made, and as the Committee was not pledged to any limitation of the Bill by what took place on the second reading, an opportunity now offered for remedying that which was certainly a grave mischief, and one which the working men of the country were anxious should be corrected. Surely it would be a pity to lose an opportunity of discussing this matter in a Committee which he believed was sincerely anxious to pass this Bill in some useful form during the present Session, and to leave the crying grievance of common employment unremedied. They all of them knew that there really was a great feeling among working men on this matter. It was idle to talk of this as a Bill to remedy grievances connected with employers' liability, if this grievance was to be left unremedied, so that the relatives of the engine-driver, who had been so constantly mentioned, would get no compensation when he had been killed through the negligence of a person with whom he had nothing to do. That man had to work upon a certain part of a railway, over which his engine travelled, going from a place 150 miles off, where the accident happened, and going to a place 150 miles further on. He hoped his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would consider this matter, and endeavour to deal with it. There were clearly two things which it was most important to get into this Bill. The first was that its principles should be so simply stated that they should not lead to divergent judgments in the Courts of Law; and the second was that there should be a substantial concession. In regard to this Bill, he believed that employers in the House were making a great mistake in over-estimating the liability that would be thrown upon them by accepting even the suggestion that the whole doctrine of common employment should be done away with. For his part, he should like to see that whole doctrine swept away, for, in its present form, it was merely a judicial fiction. But, accepting the decision of the Treasury Bench upon that point, it had been rightly pointed out by the President of the Local Government Board himself, that this Amendment was not open to the objection that it was a proposal to abolish common employment. It had been said by the right hon. Gentleman, as accurately and forcibly as it could possibly be done, that the effect of this Amendment was only to limit the doctrine of common employment, so as to prevent its operating in certain cases to which it had been applied in recent years. It was perfectly clear that this Amendment was a point to which the hopes of those who were interested in this Bill were mainly directed; and he, therefore, hoped that they would hear some further and more satisfactory answer from the right hon. Gentleman.

Lord Randolph Churchill

MR. BURT said, if his hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) had been present, he could not but have been gratified to find that the Committee was beginning to take his views as to the doctrine of common employment. He was not at all disposed to question the motives of those who had so suddenly become converted to that view; but he was inclined to suspect that some hon. Members were now anxious to support this alteration, because, if made, it would render that Bill impossible, so far as the present Session was concerned. He had all along been inclined to give a general support to the Bill now before the House; but, at the same time, he did wish that the President of the Local Government Board, in declining to accept this Amendment, had held out some hope that something would be done to remove the present invidious and unjust distinction which prevented workmen from having even a chance of compensation in cases where the common sense of everybody would admit that they ought to have it. So strongly did he feel upon this point that he would vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol, although it seemed to him to go too far, if it was pressed to a division. He thought, also, that that Amendment ought to be pressed to a division if they received no better assurance from the Government as to what they would do than they had at present. He did not wish to trespass on the time of the Committee, because he felt he could better assist the passage of this Bill by sitting silent than by speech; but, at the same time, he wished to say a few words in answer to the hon. Member for East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes). That hon. Member had put a hypothetical case, suggesting that if the late calamity at Risca had resulted from a miner striking a match and lighting his pipe, that it would be unjust to make the owner liable for damages. He was not now going to argue whether that would be just or not, although he felt a good deal could be said for making the employer liable even in that case. It was surely just as fair that the employer should be liable for such lax discipline as that which allowed men to go into dangerous mines with matches as that the workmen, generally, who had committed no fault should suffer injury without the chance of recovering compensation. At the same time, what he wanted to say was that he thought it was not in the best taste at the time when the corpses of these poor men were not yet out of the mine, to put a hypothetical case which, in all his experience of miners and mining—which was a very long one, and in connection with very large bodies of men—he never knew to happen. A man might open his lamp, or strike a match, for the purpose of lighting his pipe; but he never knew the least sign to be found of that in any mine with which he had been connected. He felt sure that the whole body of workmen would stigmatize very severely the conduct of any man who was guilty of such outrageous and reckless conduct.

DR. CAMERON said, he was very sorry to hear the decision of the right hon. Gentleman, which he hoped would not be filed, for all the anomalous decisions quoted and used as an argument for the abolition of common employment were all cases which would be met by the introduction of this Amendment. In fact, if it were put in in place of the four preceding sub-sections, more would be done to arrive at a permanent decision with regard to this matter than would be arrived at by carrying the Bill in its present form. He was entirely in favour of abolishing the doctrine of common employment; but that was not the proposal which they now had to consider. It had been suggested that if this Amendment was carried mines should be exempted from this operation. But an hon. Member had tried to make the Committee infer that if an accident happened an owner would be liable for any person killed or injured. He did not take that to be the meaning of the clause at all, and his hon. Friend the Member for Bristol (Mr. Morley), he was sure, did not intend that to be the meaning of it. Even if it would do anything of the sort it could be so amended as to prevent the possibility of it. The class of cases which it appeared to him to meet was a very different one. There had been no more frequent cause of litigation among the various classes of accidents than that of over-winding in pits. Miners coming up from a pit, through the negligence or carelessness of the engineer, had been over-wound, precipitated to the bottom, and killed; and it must be familiar to every legal Gentleman in the House that a decision in the House of Lords had carried forward the doctrine of common employment to such cases. But those were the very cases which this clause would meet; and if any class of cases showed the necessity for an amendment of the law, he would point to this particular class. Not long ago there was an accident in Paris of exactly that kind by which a lift in an hotel was run too high, and a number of persons were killed. Immediately after that Mr. Lowthian Bell wrote to The Times explaining that no accident of that kind ever should occur, because an apparatus might be designed to prevent it. In all his pits, he said, he had safety-catches, and thereby no accident could possibly occur. It was written, half-a-dozen days after the publication of that letter, that a cage in another pit was over-wound and six men were killed. By such accidents some persons must suffer loss; and in the interests of public policy that loss should surely rather fall on the owner than that the family of the injured workmen should be compelled to bear it. The application of this Amendment was nothing like so wide as an attempt had been made to make it. It was a fair proposal, intended to remedy all the anomalies that occurred in the existing law, and it would do a great deal to make this Bill something like a permanent settlement of the question, which it would not otherwise be.

Mr. Burt

MR. HASTINGS hoped the Government would not accept this proposal. He ventured to say that no one was more disinterested that he was in his support of the Bill. He was chairman, and therefore, of course, a substantial shareholder, in one of the largest coal and iron companies in South Staffordshire. A noble relative of his, who was by far his most influential constituent, was one of the largest owners of mine property in the Kingdom, and many other of his constituents were also large mineowners. He had had considerable pressure brought to bear upon him; but he had endeavoured to look at this Bill independently of private interest or personal propositions; and, as it stood at present, it was a moderate and reasonable settlement of a very difficult question—one that if not got rid of now would be sure to come back to them. For that reason he had given a loyal and hearty support to the measure. At the same time, he was bound to say, if this Amendment was carried, not only he himself, but some other Members would be compelled to consider their position. In many accidents in mines it would be impossible to say who were at fault—masters or workmen—for often those accidents were merely the result of the great natural forces with which in mines they had to deal. But the result of such accidents would be that employers would be sued for damages, and, even if successful, would have to pay their own costs. The Amendment contained a principle which, if it was inserted in the Bill at all, ought not to be extended to mining operations; and, therefore, he hoped that it would not be carried.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, unless the real difficulty and hardships at present imposed on the workmen were met, the Bill would fail in its main purpose. The cases cited by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon) pointed very clearly to the grievance which the workmen were suffering from, owing to the extent to which the doctrine of common employment had been carried. Unless, therefore, the Government could give them an assurance that some words would be introduced which would practically meet those grievances, he should be compelled to go into the Lobby in support of the Amendment. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Hastings) had just said that in many mining operations it was difficult to say how the accident was caused, and that in such cases it would be hard to make the employer liable. The simple answer to that was, that in such cases no action would lie. Before any damages could be recovered the plaintiff would have to prove negligence of the kind mentioned in this Bill, or he could not recover; while if he did prove it, the employer certainly ought to be liable.

MR. BRYCE said, he also wished to join in the appeal which had been made to the Government. They were not now dealing with the whole doctrine of common employment; if they were he should not support the Amendment, because, though he objected to allowing common employment to be a defence, he conceived that question to have been already decided. They were dealing, on the contrary, with one particular part of the doctrine which was, more than anything else, the cause of the agitation which the Bill was intended to allay. The doctrine that common employment should constitute a defence, was originally laid down in cases where a small number of workmen were employed together in one place at the same kind of work, and the idea was that they were, more or less, mutually helping one another, and therefore there was some reason for making the common employment a defence in such cases. The case before them at the present moment was not, however, at all a case of that nature. Nor was it contemplated, when the first steps were taken in the direction of establishing this doctrine, to make the law what it had now become. That law was admitted to be opposed to the law of Scotland; and it was a very great surprise to Scotch employers, and indeed to many English employers, when the decisions were given which put the law on its present footing. If this Amendment were not accepted cases of very gross injustice would be left unremedied, and they might be sure that the agitation would not subside. The Government must surely wish that this question should not be raised again next year, and the year after, and so on; for what was the use of passing a Bill at all if, as the result of it, they were to have a fresh agitation in full force immediately afterwards? He must warn the right hon. Gentleman that, if some subsection such as this were not accepted, the agitation would merely gain fresh fuel instead of subsiding. He did not at all mean to say that the Amendment was a complete and final settlement of the question, for it might be that some distinction ought to be introduced with regard to mines, and some other alterations might be necessary; but he did submit that it was monstrous that cases like those cited by the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon) should be left unremedied. While such a case as that of a railway clerk or manager, injured while travelling on his own line of railway, and therefore not able to obtain compensation, remained undealt with by the Bill, its proposals could not be accepted. He should, therefore, suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that his proper course, if he felt a doubt about the Amendment, would be to give some assurance that this question should be considered on the Report, and further dealt with by some clause which should commend itself to the Legal Advisers of the Government, who had to deal with this question. If that assurance were not given, not only would the hon. Member for Bristol divide the Committee, but he would certainly have considerable support from both sides of the House. Speaking on behalf of a large constituency, he might say that he knew there was no question which excited more interest than this did among workmen, and he was sure his experience would be borne out by many of those who had experience of the last Election. This was not a got-up agitation at all. It was a question on which the working men felt very seriously, and on which they would not cease to agitate until substantial justice was done them. When the hon. Member below him said that if this Amendment were accepted he and his Friends would have to re-consider their decision to support the Bill, he might also say that some other hon. Members would also feel it necessary to re-consider their course towards the Bill, if it were not accepted. As the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) had said, the employers were making a great mistake in the way in which they were dealing with this Bill. They would make an even greater mistake, if they prevented the Bill from being carried in a fairly satisfactory form in which it might satisfy the sentiment of justice in the minds of the working classes. If that were not done, they would have an excitement and discontent which would continue until the whole doctrine of common employment was got rid of. It had been said that lawyers could not give a useful opinion on this question, because they were not engaged in trade; but, as a matter of fact, they had to deal constantly with cases, sometimes on behalf of a plaintiff, and sometimes on behalf of a defendant, so that they were able to see both sides. They were not interested, either as employers or as workmen, and they were, therefore, in a good position to form an impartial judgment. The fact that a large majority of lawyers, both inside the House and out of it, were in favour of the Amendment which had been moved, was a strong evidence of its value; and he ventured, therefore, to appeal to the Government to give them, before the Bill left the House, something which would substantially attain the object which the Amendment sought.

MR. DALY said, he felt that the Amendment was a vital part of the Bill, and it was for that reason that he rose to support it. He wished the Committee to remember that the right hon. Gentleman opposite had sympathized with the Amendment, and had recognized its fairness. Now, the object of all legislation should be to still agitation; and he did not think the Government could do a more imprudent thing than to pass a half measure in this way, and to leave untouched the other half, which they themselves admitted was fairly asked for. An hon. Member opposite, who described himself as having a large interest in mines, said this Bill was a moderate and reasonable settlement of the question. He denied that it was. The hon. Member also said that it would be accepted as a moderate and reasonable settlement by the country, and he denied that statement also. The hon. Member then used a term which was a very unfair argument, as he thought, to be applied to the Committee, by saying that he and some of his Friends would not support the Government if the Amendment was persevered in. The fact was, that this was an objection against legislation for the poor man coming from capitalists and men of property. Yet the ground was cut from under their feet by the fact that it had been established, beyond doubt, that the employers had a power of protecting themselves from a liability to accidents at a cost which only amounted to six-tenths of a penny per ton. While the extension of this liability would work in favour of the poor man, when it was made capitalists would observe a very rigid discipline in their mines, and would make a more searching examination of the men, the materials, and the appliances which they employed in those large undertakings. It would impose no hardships upon those great mine-owners, because they had a practical monopoly of the business, and the extra charge to which they were put would have finally to come out of the pocket of the consumer. He, therefore, hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would accept this Amendment. His sole objection to it was that it was not mentioned on the second reading; but he would appeal to the Committee whether the Amendment was not a fair extension of the principle of the Bill, and not by any means a large extension of it? It was very desirable that the Government, with so many large measures in view, should dispose of this agitation—for some years to come, at any rate—and he must warn them that if they passed the Bill in its present form, it would only be the precursor of an agitation ten times more powerful.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY said, that he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed to a division. He could not say that he was opposed to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. Morley); on the contrary, he thought that what he proposed would be a proper state of the law. But he opposed it for this reason—that he considered it fatal, or destructive to the Bill. In the first place, it was perfectly obvious that if the Amendment were carried it would so much widen the scope of the Bill—and there was such a number of Amendments upon that Amendment, from the point of view of employers and capitalists—that it would have the effect of postponing the Bill to another year. Secondly, he thought that question was such a wide one that it was really a second reading question, and not one for the Committee. They had heard a speech from the noble Lord opposite (Lord Randolph Churchill) which ought to have been given on the second reading. If the noble Lord had been the Leader of a Party above the Gangway, instead of below it, it might have had some weight in the discussion; but, coming from whence it did, it was not likely to promote legislation. It was not correct in the noble Lord to describe the Bill as a blank Bill; for though the Bill was not in its present form on the second reading, yet they had had a second reading debate on the Bill in its present form on the Motion for going into Committee. There were two grievances which had been felt. One was, that where a person in a superior position had given orders to another and an injury resulted the employer was not liable for the employé who stood in his place; and, secondly, where there was an immense extension of employments, such as was the case with the large Limited Companies and Railway Companies, there were, practically, different employers coalesced into one, yet the workmen employed in separate branches were treated as in one common employment. The Government, in this Bill, had dealt only with the grievance of suffering an injury from some person in a superior position to the person injured, to whose directions that person was bound to conform. But they had not dealt with the grievance arising from a multitude of separate employments gathered into one one under a Board of Directors. The Amendment was one that went very near the abolition of the doctrine of common employment; and he would urge it upon the hon. Member not to press it to a division, considering that there were 12 pages of Amendments down, especially, also, considering the fact that, if successful, it would be absolutely fatal to the Bill. On that account he thought that, to a certain extent, they were in honour bound not to impede the measure; and he hoped the Government would stand firm when they came to the later Amendments on the question of insurance, which had been put on the Paper by hon. Gentlemen on the other side. If the Government did stand firm to their Bill, and resisted the pressure from the other side, they were bound not to put pressure on that side, which would only add fuel to the opposition to the measure. He was aware that it was a popular thing to vote on the popular side; and as he represented a populous constituency, he ought, perhaps, to vote for the Amendment. But, at the same time, he thought that it was his duty to the Government to assist them in passing the Bill as it at present stood. Therefore, he did hope that his hon. Friend the Member for Bristol (Mr. Morley) would not press his Amendment to a division.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that it appeared to him that the hon. Member who had just spoken had accused his noble Friend (Lord Randolph Churchill) with having made a speech that should more properly have come from the Front Opposition Bench. He should say that the speech of the hon. Member was more like that of a Member of the Government than of an independent Member; because, what was his argument? His sole argument, as he understood it, was that the Bill ought to be passed, whether it was a good or bad one; and if that Amendment were carried, the Bill would fall through for the Session; and that it was so much more important that some Bill should be passed than a good, one that it was their duty to support the Government. An hon. Member had spoken of the Bill proposed by the Government as being a moderate and reasonable one, and in settlement of the question. That the Bill was a moderate one he would not deny; but that it was reasonable, or a settlement of the question, he did most emphatically deny. It was by no means a settlement of the question. The Government, in bringing it in, were influenced by two motives, two principles of action, that could not be reconciled. They wished, at the same time, to bring in a Bill that would satisfy both the employers of labour and the workmen of this country. They had, no doubt, failed with regard to employers; and nobody, he believed, who understood the position of the workmen in regard to the matter, could say but that they had failed also with them. When the Bill was discussed on the Motion that Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair, he had ventured to point out that no Bill could be final or satisfactory that would leave the workman in a different position from the public. So long as that difference existed there would always be a grievance. He had ventured to suggest a method by which that inequality between the workmen and the public might be done away with. That suggestion did not meet with favour from any part of the House. He was described as a visionary philosopher, and it was said that the suggestion—theoretically excellent though it might be—could not be carried out in practice. He thought the discussion they had just had must have convinced the Government that the line they had adopted was not likely to prove successful. The logical solution of the question had been proposed, not by them, but by the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald), whom he did not see then in his place. He thought they must have seen by the discussion that had arisen on that Amendment, and by the opinions that had been expressed in every part of the House by Gentlemen of all shades of political opinion, that if they insisted in carrying the Bill in its present shape they would not do that which they intended to do—namely, allay the agitation that now existed in the country with regard to the matter. He had not sufficient practical experience of the manufacturing industries, such as mining, to know how they could be affected by that Bill, or how much damage would be done by the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol. But this he did say—that the Bill could not possibly be good for the manufacturing interests of this country to allow such an alteration in the relative position of employer and workman to take place. If they altered the law at all, and changed it from the condition in which it had stood for the last 30 or 40 years, let them, at all events, alter it in such a manner that no further alteration might be demanded of the influential classes of the community. He could not help thinking that, from the course the Government had pursued, they had the greatest objection to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol; but, believing, as he did, that it was a step towards the settlement of the question, if he proceeded to a division he should support him.

Mr. Lyulph Stanley

MR. J. W. PEASE said, that, unfortunately, his duties upstairs had prevented his being present at the early part of the discussion. The speech of the hon. Member who had just sat down was one of those speeches which they were so apt to have from the Conservative side—namely, that the House was in a difficulty as to the logical solution of the matter. That that which had been suggested by the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald), who had proposed to do away with the doctrine of common employment, was one logical solution, and that the other logical solution was to leave things as they were.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said, that the other logical solution he had referred to was of an entirely different character from that.

Mr. J. W. PEASE said, that what had been suggested by the hon. Member was, practically, of no service. The suggestions on the subject in that House had been practical, and irrespective of any logical solution. The Government had endeavoured, in that Bill, to deal practically with the question; and he had never hesitated to say that it would do more harm than good to the working classes, as it would lead them to believe in a compensation which, were common employment done away with, they would not receive as the decisions on contributive negligence came into effect. That Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Bristol would make that clause run as follows:—

"Where, after the passing of this Act, personal injury is caused to a workman, by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer, engaged in a branch or department of such service, separate and distinct from that in which the workman is engaged, he shall have the same right of compensation, &c."

No one could read that Amendment without seeing that it took up, as nearly as possible, the whole ground occupied by the proposal of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald). He agreed, therefore, with what fell from the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Lyulph Stanley), that the Government could not go on with the Bill if they accepted that Amendment, as it involved the repeal of the law of common employment. Therefore, the question was not before them then, whether that Bill was satisfactory to the working classes of the country or not. The Government ran the risk of satisfying them; and, if they did not, they would, perhaps, give further consideration, at another time, to the matter. But the question was then, were they going to pass a measure during the period of the present Session that remained or not? It seemed to him that the Amendment was somewhat vague as regarded the departments to which it referred. If they took the case of a coal mine, which often consisted of three or four seams, were the men to be considered working in separate departments in each seam or not? Then, if they took the coal at the different stages of the works, passing through crushing machines to the coke ovens, how were those different stages to be treated? That clause was, in fact, replete with difficulties, and would entail the greatest difficulties in being carried out. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) had stated that the working classes were in favour of that Bill. On the contrary, many were absolutely opposed to it. The President of the Northumberland Miners' Institute said—

"They did not want their big brother in London to look after them. If anything was wrong in the pit they called the attention of the overman to it. If he did not put it right they called the attention of the master to it; and, if he did not put it right, they walked out of the blessed pit and left it. They looked upon that Bill as likely to do more harm than good."

For his own part, as an employer, he did not care twopence for the Bill. It would cost him little or nothing. The only difference would be that, if he chose to do so, he could deduct what he was obliged to pay from that which was paid voluntarily. In that case the amount due on the legal responsibility laid down by the Government was less than that paid voluntarily. He was bound to say that the Amendment reproduced the whole of the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford, and went into the whole doctrine of common employment. If he understood the views of the hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House to be represented by what had fallen from one of their Leaders, it was that, however unsuccessfully they might attempt to hamper the Bill there, if it passed that House they knew where it would be stopped. He hoped the hon. Member for Bristol would not press his Amendment to a division, because he felt certain that if it were carried it would have the effect of annihilating the Bill.

Mr. RYLANDS said, that he regretted very much that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) was not in his place at that time. He regretted, also, that other Members of the late Government were not present. It was all very well for them to abdicate their functions, and leave them in the hands of the Fourth Party on ordinary occasions; but, in a matter of such extreme importance and delicacy as that one, he would venture to say that the Committee was entitled to have the presence of the right hon. Gentleman the late Home Secretary in those difficult deliberations. He did not know, of course, what steps would be taken by the Members of the late Government. He could not believe that they would allow a matter of that serious importance to be turned into a Party question. He had great respect for hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway; but he thought they were not to be congratulated on the course they were then taking. They seemed to be desirous of putting the Government to some little embarrassment by supporting the Amendment. He wished to say that he did not look upon that as a Party question, or as a question for employers or workmen only. He had a strong impression that both employers and workmen had common interests with respect to it. He entirely repudiated the statement made by one hon. Member, that the Bill was brought in in consequence of the agitation that had taken place. It had been introduced because employers saw that the present state of the law was of an unsatisfactory character. There could be no doubt whatever that employers were alive to a sense of injustice, in consequence of the doctrine of common employment, as maintained by the Courts of Law. He would venture to say that, so far as he knew—and he had spoken to those connected with business, and who, therefore, were competent to form an opinion—it was desired to alter the law, and that where, in consequence of any negligence on the part of the employer, or of persons intrusted with superintendence of works, any injury arose to the persons employed, employers were, as a rule, quite willing to be responsible. That was a perfectly clear principle, and a principle of justice; and one that, he believed, no employer would refuse to accept. The only real difficulty had arisen out of the application of the doctrine of common employment. There had been hard cases of men who had suffered injury, and had had reasonable claims upon Railway Companies for compensation. But the difficulty they were then placed in was this—they had to deal with a variety of employments carried on under entirely different conditions of labour. The railway system was now a great branch of employment. Of course, a generation or two ago it was not in existence at all. They knew that very great injustice had been done in the case of employés who had been killed or injured; and, in order to meet such cases, a special Bill might be brought in having relation to railway employés. He was not disposed to have the legislation under that Bill contracted in any manner; but, in connection with railways, he thought it would be better to have a special Act dealing with that particular matter. It would be much better than having a general Act, such as that with which they were then dealing. He was quite sure that with regard to mines they were entirely in a different category; but he was very much disposed to think that the wisest course would be to deal with those great employments which existed under exceptional circumstances by exceptional legislation. As regarded the general mass of employments, there would not be the slightest difficulty, and such cases might be easily dealt with. But when they came to mines the circumstances were quite different. His hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt) had said that it should be the duty of employers, or their agents, to take care that the men going down in the mine did not violate the regulations by taking lucifer matches or tobacco with them. Would his hon. Friend have every man stripped before he went down? An accident might, no doubt, take place in a mine owing to the recklessness or carelessness of a man who went down and took lights with him entirely in opposition to the express regulations of the employers. He had heard a great deal said about litigation. That Bill, if it adopted the more general view of the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. Morley), would, no doubt, avoid litigation. Supposing, for instance, that a great explosion took place in any particular district, he took it, as a matter of course, that under the Amendment of the hon. Member the employer would have to pay compensation for the injury caused, whatever might have been the reason of it, or however much individual persons might be liable for it. Therefore, it would prevent litigation, because the employer would have no defence. He would put it to the Committee, was it reasonable that owners of mines, who had taken every step in their power to prevent that recklessness on the part of the persons employed, should still be held liable? Was it reasonable, if a man went down into the mine, struck a match at a moment when there was a flow of gas and an explosion occurred, which cost the lives of a great number of workmen, was it reasonable or just that the owner, who had done everything in his power to prevent such a catastrophe, should be held responsible? Let him remind hon. Gentlemen that when an explosion took place, and a great destruction of property occurred, the owner of the mine was already exposed to enormous loss. His hon. Friend and partner, the Member for Wigan (Mr. Knowles), whom, he was sorry to see, was not in his place then—because if he had been he would not have thought it necessary to speak as he had done—commenced life as a worker in mines. He had risen gradually, step by step, and had always regarded every point in the interest of the working man, with whom he deeply sympathized. He was at that time a man of property, and sat upon those Benches, and was an excellent Representative of labourers in mines. He knew that he wished to promote the interests of those he employed; and he had said that he believed it would not be to their welfare that the extraordinary views of the hon. Member for Bristol should be acted upon. Before he (Mr. Rylands) was connected with his hon. Friend in business he had an accident in his mine. There was an explosion; the result of it was a loss to him of some £100,000. It was one of those accidents which were unavoidable, and was probably occasioned by some carelessness, or recklessness, on the part of some person employed, and yet it was proposed then, in such a case, to make the owner liable for an immense amount beyond the enormous loss which already fell upon him. They all knew that it was to the interests of colliery owners that accidents should be as infrequent as possible; and if they could do anything by legislation to make owners or managers more careful in every way, so as to save the lives of those employed, that would be, undoubtedly, a good work. But it must be obvious that if a mineowner or manager did not take those steps to save life, and any accident occurred, he would be guilty really of a crime. It was said, with reference to the proposal of his hon. Friend, that it would tend to preserve life. He doubted that; they saw that, by the Bill as it stood, owners of mines would be liable for all persons in authority, and would have to bear the loss if anything occurred to cause injury. He thought that some limit ought to be put to the liability, so that the owner should not be answerable for the recklessness of all in his employ. The hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease) had quoted from a speech of Mr. Brison, the President of the Northumberland Miners' Association. Hon. Members must have observed that he alluded to the gratifying circumstances that in the Northumberland district there were very few accidents. He believed that that district was freer from accidents than any other in the Kingdom. He had often remarked that freedom from accidents in that district, and he had only wished that the other mining districts were in the same condition. But what did they find in the statement of the President of that Association? He had given, he believed, a correct reason for that freedom from accident. He had pointed out that the miners of Northumberland took active part in insisting upon any matters being rectified which appeared in any degree to render the mine dangerous. Mr. Brison said he was sure that went a long way to protect them from danger. They wanted that kind of thing all over the country. They wanted employers, agents, and employés to work together, with a view of preventing accidents, as far as possible. He believed that that Bill, so far as it went, was a move in the right direction, and that it would do justice in cases in which justice up to the present had not been done. It was, no doubt, important to alter the law, so as to prevent injustice being done; and, therefore, he was prepared to support it. But when hon. Gentlemen talked about final legislation, he must say that he did not think the Bill would attain that object; whilst to carry it further in the direction suggested by the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Bristol (Mr. S. Morley) would do a great injustice to employers of labour, and would not promote the interests of the workmen themselves.

Mr. Rylands

MR. HERMON said, that it had been stated by the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Daly) that the object of all legislation was to still agitation. In his (Mr. Hermon's) opinion, the object of all legislation should be to do what was right and just. He was quite sure that it only required a little moral courage to deal with this matter in a way which should be right and just. They had spent a considerable time in discussing the Bill, and he should be sorry that anything should happen that would necessitate its abandonment. He could not help thinking that the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. Morley) had introduced a subject which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, on the second reading of the Bill, distinctly said he was not prepared to introduce into the measure. As regarded the doctrine of common employment, if made the subject of a separate clause he should be prepared to discuss it, and perhaps give it a favourable vote. But he thought that the introduction of the subject by the present Amendment was unwise, and that if the Amendment were persisted in there would be great risks of the Bill not being carried through at all. He did not wish that the Amendment now under discussion should not be considered. But he would recommend to the hon. Member for Bristol that he should now withdraw it, and bring it up as a new clause upon the Report. He was quite sure that the Government would then give every facility for the question being fully and fairly discussed. The Bill would have to go through various changes in Committee; and the Government, when they had the Bill in its amended shape, would be enabled to come to a deliberate decision as to whether or not they should adopt the principle of the Amendment. He was not prepared to say that he should vote against the principle of the Amendment; but he thought they had now made such progress in the Bill that it would be advisable not to imperil it by pressing the Amendment. Hon. Members must consider that while they were willing to give every facility to the consideration of the protection which was needed by the workman, that the position of the employer also required very careful consideration. He was in a position to speak upon this subject, for he had had the management of large works in which he had become acquainted with all the risks to which employers would become liable. So far as his information went, he believed that whenever accidents now happened in works the first question that the employer asked was whether anybody was hurt? It had never been the custom of the employer to ask, in the first instance, what was the damage? There had been a sympathy between employers and employed which, to a certain extent, had done more good than many Acts of Parliament. He thought that this Amendment required very careful consideration on the part of the Committee. As the right hon. Gentleman declined to adopt it at that time, he would ask the hon. Member for Bristol to bring it up upon Report, in the shape of a new clause. They would then have time to see how it would affect the general scope of the measure before the House.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, that he thought the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board would now excuse those who, six weeks ago, were of opinion that this Bill ought to be referred to a Select Committee. His conviction that it would be the best course to adopt at that time was now fully confirmed by the discussion they had had in Committee. If that course had been adopted the Bill would before this have assumed a much improved shape, and might have become a substantial, and perhaps a final, piece of beneficial legislation. There could be no question that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol opened up an entirely new phase of the question. There was no denying that, and he did not think the hon. Member himself would deny that his Amendment broadly went in for the abolition of the doctrine of common employment, or at least to so great an extent as to amount to that. If the Amendment were adopted, how much of the doctrine of common employment would remain? No one could have listened to the speeches that had been made by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce), and other lawyers, without feeling that great injustice and hardship occurred in a great many cases, especially in relation to the case of railway servants. He himself had entertained that feeling upon the second reading of the Bill. The difficulty was that they were attempting, in a short and perfunctory manner, to deal with every class of employers in one Bill. The question of railway servants was of a wholly different character from that of mining employés. There was no special legislation with respect to railways; but there was very special legislation with regard to mines. The Mines Regulation Act consisted of 76 separate clauses, and it imposed upon mineowners very special and exceptional obligations. Those having mines were under a liability to be committed to prison with hard labour for three months for a breach of the regulations of the Act. Nor did it stop there, for there were special rules framed under the Act which defined, in the most minute manner, the duties of everyone in the mine, and laid down the most detailed regulations for the conduct of every man in his separate capacity. There was no legislation of that kind with respect to railways; nor was there any legislation of a similar character with regard to building operations. There was legislation, to a certain extent, with respect to the protection of children in factories; but there were many industries in this country where the lives of the workmen were not protected by any special legislation. At the same time, the Bill endeavoured, in a short and perfunctory manner, to deal with the question of employers' liability throughout the country, no matter in what occupation the workmen might be engaged. It would be quite possible, although he was not prepared to say it was right, to legislate for the needs of railway servants. He thought a case of very extreme hardship might be made out in their favour. But to attempt by this Bill to deal with their case, and with that of other industries, including the mines, which were under very special regulations, and the owners of which were under very special liabilities, was not, in his opinion, the right course. They were running a risk of inflicting grave injustice, and were likely to do very great injury to one of the most important industries of this country. The noble Lord had spoken of $\frac{1}{4}d.$ and $\frac{1}{2}d.$ a-ton being a matter of small importance; but he could assure the noble Lord that although it was a small figure per ton, yet, when multiplied by 140,000,000, that charge became a very serious one indeed. It must also be borne in mind that, with regard to mines, the effect of this legislation would be to throw the whole responsibility for accidents in many cases entirely upon one man. In imposing liability of that character, it was really neither more nor less than imposing a risk of absolute ruin upon some persons. He did not desire to exaggerate this matter; but when it was proposed to throw so enormous a responsibility upon mineowners, it should be clearly understood what would be the effect of it. With regard to railways, it was quite possible to introduce a special Bill to deal with them. They were all carried on for the general good of the community, and might fairly be dealt with. But when they were imposing this liability on mineowners, it should be remembered that the whole of the prosperity of the country depended upon the mining interest. Where would the industries of the country be without the motive power of speed? The whole of the great manufactories of the country would fall to the ground; and, therefore, it seemed to him that the most important industry of the country was that of mining. If the Bill were to throw this enormous responsibility on the owners of mines, no one would be able to work a mine without running very grievous risks. When only 1-13th part of gas became mixed with ordinary air in a mine, that air was as explosive as gunpowder. He took very great interest in this matter; and he knew that, to a certain extent, gas was continually exuding from all the pores of the coal, and was becoming mixed with the common air. There was thus a very great danger of explosion always at hand; and to throw the entire responsibility for that upon the mineowners would be a most serious matter. A man would be exposed to absolute ruin from the occurrence of one such explosion. He knew nothing with regard to the Risca Colliery; but everything appeared to have been done that was possible to insure safety in that mine. But, notwithstanding all precautions, a most dreadful accident happened. No expense whatever seemed to have been spared in rendering the arrangements as perfect as possible. But, notwithstanding, a grievous accident had happened there, and an enormous loss, consequent upon it, had been thrown upon the coal owners. If this Bill were passed as proposed, the liability thrown upon the mineowners would be enormously increased, as they would not only have to bear the whole loss from destruction in the mine, but would be liable to pay compensation were they made liable in the way proposed. He could hardly suppose that their property could be carried on in such a way as to enable them to stand up against the grievous risks which they would incur. In dealing with the case of mines, he thought, therefore, it was clear that the House was dealing with a different question to that involved in other industries. He hoped that the Committee would not be led away by a consideration of the injustice which the present law inflicted upon railway servants, and upon servants engaged in special undertakings, to adopt a principle which would entail most grievous injustice upon other industries. He had only heard one allegation with regard to mines in support of this Amendment; and, therefore, he trusted it would not be accepted, but that the right hon. Gentleman would resist it. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board might as well have at once accepted the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) as to accept this Amendment.

Mr. GORST said, that he did not know whether the hon. Member who had just sat down was endeavouring to perform the process of talking out the Bill; but he had certainly wasted time by giving them a little lecture on the effects of mixed gas and air, which he thought were well known to every hon. Member of that House. Hon. Members sitting on this side of the House, who took part in the discussion of the Bill, did so under difficult circumstances when accused by the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease) of trying to run the Government into a difficulty. Nor did the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) seem to understand the action they were taking upon this Amendment, because he said they were animated by a desire to make political capital out of the matter. Hon. Gentlemen upon the other side of the House were so extremely charitable, and so extremely liberal, in their views of the motives of hon. Members upon this side. But, notwithstanding what had been said by hon. Members on the other side, they should certainly continue to render their assistance to Her Majesty's Government in the passing of this Bill. Her Majesty's Government was not likely to be run into difficulties by Members on that side of the House, but rather by wealthy capitalists on their own side, whose liberality, so conspicuous in their election addresses and speeches, did not seem to influence their conduct when a question affecting the interests of capital was under consideration. They had an instance of that in the case of the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian), who was perfectly ready to throw railways overboard. He said, in effect—"You may make what regulations you like about the railways, but spare, oh spare, the mines." That was the burden of his speech; and if the Government allowed itself to be misled in this matter by their own political supporters, they were much more likely to be run into difficulty than they would be by any speeches that came from that side of the House. He should not be surprised if the Government regarded anything he said on this clause with some amount of suspicion, not because he was a Conservative, but because he had before in that House expressed his opinion that nothing would solve the difficulties of this question but the abolition of the doctrine of common employment. Because he had expressed an opinion of that kind, he had no doubt that his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would receive any suggestions of his with extreme caution and mistrust. But he had endeavoured, in assisting the Government in passing the clauses of the Bill, to put himself into the position of a person who was not willing to abolish the doctrine of common employment, and to make the Bill as equitable as it could be made. So long as that doctrine continued, the Bill now under their consideration, if not a final settlement of this question, might, at all events, allay agitation for some time to come. It was because he thought that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. S. Morley) would greatly improve the Bill, without abolishing the doctrine of common employment, that he most earnestly commended it to the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government. He would commend it to their consideration, because those who had introduced the Amendment had cited instances of accidents

Mr. Hussey Vivian

happening which had given rise to much public agitation. Without going the length of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Daly), and saying that the chief object of legislation was to pacify agitation—a mistaken view which, considering the history of the present Session, he did not think extraordinary—without going that length, he thought it fair that consideration should be given to the effect that this legislation would have upon the just demands of those interested. The effect of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol, if adopted, would be to put an end to those unhappy cases in which a man was killed, or injured, by the negligence of his fellow-servants, with whom he had no more to do than the man in the moon, but in which he was precluded from obtaining compensation, because the man was, technically, his fellow-servant. He remembered a case in which a gatekeeper upon a railway exerted himself to save a horse and cart crossing the line from being run over by a train. The cart contained some women and children, and through the heroism of the gatekeeper the women and children escaped; but he himself was killed. The unhappy wife and children of that gatekeeper were unable to obtain compensation on account of his death, because it was said to have been caused by the negligence of his fellow-servant—namely, the engine driver. This Amendment was one which would meet such a case as that; and he would, if the capitalists of the House would allow him, put the matter before them for their consideration. Would it not be better for them to join the Government in making this Bill one which would secure a substantial settlement of this question, which would allay agitation, and settle the question for some years, and give the Government the credit, which he did not grudge them, of having passed a substantial measure?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, no one could doubt that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol had raised a very serious and important question for the determination of the Committee. He would ask the Committee to allow him to point out the position in which the Government were placed in relation to it. They had to consider whether the law required any amendment at all; and, if it did, whether the defence of common employment should be abolished, and the employer be made liable for the negligence of one servant towards another. It was the view of the Government that a middle course should be taken. They were of opinion that an important change in the relations of capital and labour would be more safely carried out if it were gradual in its nature. When that view was presented to the House he understood that the advocates of the abolition of the defence of common employment were satisfied with the course that the Government had taken. The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald), who had charge of the Bill which entirely abolished that defence, expressed himself satisfied with the measure of the Government. Now they were met by an Amendment which went far in advance of the Government Bill, in the direction of that of the hon. Member for Stafford. When they looked to the words of the Amendment, it would be found that there were dangers attaching to them which would require the greatest consideration. Last night they were told that this Bill was almost revolutionary in its effects. The hon. and learned Member for Preston (Sir John Holker) charged the Government with having truckled to their constituents; and that morning the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) had expressed the view that they had not gone far enough. The Government had listened to views from other quarters of the House, and more especially to those put forward by the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. S. Morley) in favour of some further limitation of the doctrine of common employment. He would ask the Committee to consider whether the Government could safely take the course suggested by the hon. Member for Bristol? The Amendment would affect not only railway servants, in whom the hon. Member was specially interested, but also the other industries, great and small, of the country. He looked upon the Amendment as likely to be very fruitful in litigation. If it would be right to accept the Amendment, it would be right to accept the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford. The Amendment proposed to make employers liable for the negligence of all servants engaged in a distinct branch of employment. It was very usual for a man to employ, say, a plumber, to do one portion of the work, and a carpenter another. Many instances might occur in which separate and distinct classes of workmen were engaged on the same work. It was really the community of work which constituted the doctrine of common employment, although the branches of trade might be separate and distinct. But the Amendment proposed to abolish the defence of common employment with respect to all distinct branches of trade. If this proposal were right, then the proposal of the hon. Member for Stafford ought to have been adopted. This Bill had been introduced to settle, at least for a time, this question; and if the Committee should decide upon adopting this Amendment, the Government would do its best to carry the pleasure of the Committee into effect. At the same time, it would be necessary for the Committee to consider what safeguards were necessary in the matter. He was aware that a very special case was made out with respect to injuries resulting to railway servants, and the Government considered that theirs was a case which demanded careful consideration. He would suggest to his hon. Friend not to press his Amendment at that time, but to bring it up in a form which would better carry out his object upon Report. If he introduced a special clause dealing with the case of railway servants, the Government would feel disposed to give it every consideration.

MR. S. MORLEY said, that he was anxious to stand right with the Committee; and he would, therefore, state the motives which had induced him to propose his Amendment. His object was not to set aside the doctrine of common employment altogether, but only to prevent its being made a bar to the recovery of compensation in all cases. It was at least reasonable that those who knew something of the needs and difficulties of the working man should be allowed to say a word on his behalf. He would go further, and express the opinion that if the Amendment, or anything tantamount to it, were not inserted in the Bill it would be regarded by the working man as a protest upon any Bill in his favour. His object was not to set aside the doctrine of common employment, but to meet the case well put by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), and to prevent the effect of the doctrine of common employment being made a bar to claims for compensation in all cases. He did not mean that employers should be liable for injury received by one servant at the hands of another servant in all cases. He believed that the Bill was an exceedingly valuable one; and he should be sorry if, by carrying this Amendment, he should at all interfere with the passing of the Bill. Of course, he was in the hands of the Committee with regard to the Amendment; but he thought it would be worthy of consideration whether they could not secure a clause which would give them some substantial part of what they asked without pressing this Amendment. He would, therefore, be willing to accept the suggestion of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, and should leave the question to be considered on Report. If they could not get their whole demand, they would, at all events, make great progress in getting rid, to a considerable extent, of the evils of the principle of common employment. He was extremely anxious to be guided by the opinion of the Committee, and he would accept the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend in good faith, and would leave the matter to be dealt with upon Report.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, that, before the Amendment was withdrawn, he should like to make a few observations with reference to it. He hoped that the hon. Member for Bristol would not allow his kindly good nature and confidence to blind him to the great danger there was in leaving his Amendment to be dealt with in the way suggested. He had come down, at very serious inconvenience that day, for the purpose of supporting his hon. Friend's Amendment. It was an Amendment which went into the distinction between various branches of what was usually called common employment. It seemed to him that there was a very wide distinction between the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) and this Amendment, inasmuch as this Amendment simply drew distinctions between various branches of employment which were, in reality, distinct. He believed, however, that if the Government would, in good faith, afford his hon. Friend an opportunity, between this and the Report, of bringing in a clause, and would support him in doing so, great good would be accomplished, and a provision would be made acceptable to the workpeople of the United Kingdom. Some charges had been made against hon. Members of truckling to their constituents. To his knowledge, he had not more than 10 railway servants amongst his constituents. Therefore, he had no motive in this matter, except his own sense of right and duty.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, that he had heard hon. Members represent, over and over again, that the acceptance of the principle of making employers liable for the negligence of one servant to another would entail absolute ruin to mineowners. He thought that when so much was said about the rights of property, that something should be said on the other hand with regard to human life. There was absolute ruin to the wives and families of the 250 miners instantaneously destroyed by the horrible explosion the other day. There was often life-lasting ruin to the miner, and misery to his family, when an accident permanently disabled him. Those who pleaded so strongly for the rights of property should remember that something ought also to be said for the rights of life.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, that as he had taken great interest in this subject, he was very anxious, before the hon. Member for Bristol withdrew his Amendment, that there should be a distinct understanding come to that this question should be raised at a later stage of the Bill. It was not the object of his own Amendment to abolish the doctrine of common employment, but to modify the application of that doctrine to the justice of individual cases. As he understood it, the doctrine of common employment, up to this time, had been made the subject of technical legal ruling, to the great injury of the working classes. What was required was that there should be some modification of that doctrine, that the working classes might obtain justice whenever injuries occurred. From the interesting speech of the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian) he thought that the mining interest was in a different position from any other with which the Bill would deal. It was obvious that they ran a risk of physical circumstances, which did not apply to the cases of other employments, where mere acts of negligence might produce those injuries. He thought, therefore, that the mining interest had a special case of its own, and that it might be better to have future legislation with regard to that interest in some separate measure. It struck him that, having regard to the special circumstances of the mining interest, it might be well not to take them out of this Bill, but to put some qualification in the clause which might exempt, or in some degree mitigate, its effect upon the mining interest of the country. He thought that that was quite capable of being accomplished; but before his hon. Friend withdrew his Amendment—for which, if he went to a division, he should certainly vote—he thought they ought to have some guarantee that when the Report was brought up the Government would assist his hon. Friend in framing such a clause as would meet the exigencies of the working classes with reference to the doctrine of common employment, if it could be done without injuriously affecting the mining interest of the country.

MR. S. MORLEY said, that he would rely upon the assurance of the Government that this matter should be dealt with upon Report. He trusted that the Government would then make some proposal which would be reasonably satisfactory. He should, therefore, withdraw his Amendment.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, that the Government had laid down, as a distinct principle, that they would not interfere with the law of common employment. If that were so, the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol went a very long way in that direction. The great question for the Committee to consider was this—if this question was to be raised upon Report, he would call the attention of the hon. Member for Bristol to the fact that this question was one that ought to have been raised upon the second reading of the Bill, in order that the House might have had the whole question before it? If it were again raised upon Report, they would have the whole matter discussed over again. The question for the Government to decide now was, would they, or would they not, accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol? That was a point upon which they ought to speak out boldly, if they wished to pass the Bill. They ought to do what they believed to be right, if they wished to carry the Bill through; and if they did not wish to pass the Bill they should not have introduced it. He mentioned this in the interests of the Bill, for he thought that such serious interests were at stake with reference to this measure that it ought to be passed. But if they went in the direction pointed out by the hon. Member for Bristol, they were going to take a course dangerously near that suggested by the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald). According to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Stafford, the railway interest was one thing, and the mining interest was another. But that was no reason why they should alter this Bill so as to deal differently with one of those interests. He thought it was a question for the consideration of the Government whether it was wise to pass a law out of which so many persons would be certain to contract themselves. He would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board to state distinctly whether he meant to go in the direction proposed by the hon. Member for Bristol.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, that he desired to thank his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for the manly and straightforward way in which he had dealt with this proposition. He recognized, as everybody must recognize, the great pressure which had been brought to bear upon the Government in favour of this special legislation with regard to railways. He alluded to the pressure which had been brought to bear from that side of the House, and not from the small Party opposite, whom he might call the Tory Radical Party. What he understood was that his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General intended to stand by the Bill; but if the hon. Member for Bristol, by-and-bye, brought up a clause dealing with the case of railway servants, then the Government would favourably consider it. That, of course, left the Government open to refuse it; but to say that the Government would consider it was going a very long way on behalf of the Government towards saying that they would favourably consider it. Unless the Government had promised to consider it, as he understood, the hon.

Member for Bristol would not have withdrawn his Amendment. But, on the other hand, it was not quite clear that the clause proposed by the hon. Member for Bristol did not comprehend the mining interest of the country. The mining interest certainly had most need to be alarmed. He understood that the Government did not intend to go any further in the direction of imposing this new statutory liability upon the mineowners, in respect of accidents resulting from the negligence of their workmen. Whatever might be said in the case of railways, the mineowners based their case upon this—that the operations of mining were subject to much greater risks and accidents than that of any other industry, and that already they were dealt with by special legislation. A mineowner could not sink a shaft, or do numerous other works, except under Government control. Why was that? Because the operations in which he was engaged were so very dangerous that the law interfered to see how it was to be carried out. That was the difference between the dangerous and non-dangerous trades. Mines were, therefore, an industry carried on under the direct supervision of the law. It was a question whether additional compensation should be given for mining accidents, or whether more stringent regulations should be made. His hon. and learned Friend said that their object was to provide for the maintenance of the wives and children of the injured. But that was by no means the object of the miners themselves. A Memorial to the Prime Minister on the subject stated—

“That money compensation was not the motive of the workmen in seeking to press forward the measure, but increased safety in following their many hazardous enterprises.”

They had now arrived at a point when the Government must really make up their minds. These discussions were necessarily thrust upon them by a measure of this kind, which was a compromise Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board was called upon to steer between the advocates of two different views, and it was almost inevitable that they should constantly have these discussions advancing respective views, discussions which might fairly be called second reading discussions. But it was important to refer to those reasons, because he wished to ask whether it would not be well to consider them, in view of the future progress of this measure? And he confessed that for the Bill to fail at last would be a national calamity, considering the loss of time and the excitement which it had occasioned to everybody, and the great demand there was for some legislation. Would not the Government be more likely to produce a satisfactory Bill if, at this stage, they would say that they were willing to entertain this proposal? To do that would allay a great deal of uneasiness, while it would enable them to deal with these questions in a separate manner, as had been suggested.

Sir Walter B. Barttelot

MR. LABOUCHERE said, although he had been listening carefully for some time he had not gathered whether the Government agreed to the proposition of the hon. Member for Bristol or not. That proposal was a specific one, and he understood the hon. Member was prepared to withdraw it, upon the understanding that facilities would be given to him to bring forward a similar Amendment, applicable alone to railway servants, on the Report. He did hope that they would immediately have some statement from the Government as to what course they would take.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he hoped the hon. Member for Bristol would not be hasty in withdrawing the Amendment, for the reason that there would be no advantage in doing so, as the question would certainly be discussed again upon the Report. They had had a considerable discussion, the whole matter had been talked over, and to postpone it would only mean the recurrence of a very considerable debate on the same matter. They had gained something, no doubt, by the debate, because they had registered the acceptance by the Government of the principle of the Amendment, so far as railway servants were concerned. He wished to follow up that point, as it seemed to be suggested that there was one special industry—the mining industry—which, from particular reasons, deserved to be specially considered. But if that were so, why not leave out mines from this proposition? Although, for his part, he did not understand why, if the principle of the Amendment was right in regard to railway servants, it was not right in regard to other servants. He was sure none of them would like, simply because there were a great many railway servants in the country, to pass a law in regard to them which they would not be prepared to extend to other persons in the same condition of employment. He would really ask the Attorney General whether he was not prepared to go further, and to accept the general principle of this Amendment, giving opportunities hereafter to those who might be interested in the matter to endeavour to graft upon the clause an exception with regard to mines?

MR. DODSON said, he was not going to prolong the debate, and he only rose to answer the appeals made to him, and to repeat once more what was the position of the Government with regard to this Amendment. He had said that he could not accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol; but, at the same time, he fully sympathized with it. The Attorney General, speaking for the Government, had after that said that he could not accept the Amendment; but that if the hon. Member would prepare, and bring up on Report, a clause adapting his Amendment to the case of railway servants, the Government would favourably consider it.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he did hope the hon. Member would not withdraw his Amendment. It was perfectly clear that it must be either right or wrong. If it was right, it should apply to all trades; and, therefore, the suggestion of the Government, that they should apply it to railway servants only, was not reasonable.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 65; Noes 175: Majority 110.—(Div. List, No. 91.)

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, the object of his Amendment was merely to promote that which a noble Lord opposite, a short time ago, had said would be inevitable if common employment were abolished—namely, the provision of a general system of insurance. He, therefore, wished to propose that the employer should only be responsible where no insurance fund existed, by inserting, in page 1, line 21, after the word “workman,” the words—

"In any workshop or place as to which no mutual insurance fund as authorized by this Act, or by any special Act, is established."

The Committee must have observed that many of the speeches in support of this Bill had not been delivered by employers but by lawyers, who, no doubt, saw with satisfaction the prospect arising under it of a very great deal of business. They had heard several Communistic doctrines broached during this debate, and his experience had always shown him that ideas of that kind generally came from younger sons of Peers. They had heard a good deal of discussion of what ought fairly to have been described as the hobgoblin argument. There was a talk about a joiner's shop invaded by an engine; but he challenged hon. Gentlemen to show 10 cases in the 10 past years. The Committee seemed to have forgotten altogether the consideration of the justice of certain positions. Did they say it was just that "A" should be liable to "B" because "C" had done something which "A" did not wish him to do? It might be that the law was bad; but were they, by altering it, going to make it worse or better? It seemed to him that the Bill only increased the injustice, instead of diminishing and correcting it. It was an instance of exceptional legislation which ought never to take place, involving every kind of injustice. He humbly submitted that the lines of the Bill were not good. They had had many speeches from distinguished lawyers, who had given very decided opinions; but, if he was permitted, he should like to read a line or two from a lawyer, whose standing and reputation were equal to that of the hon. and learned Members who had spoken (Mr. Serjeant Simon and Mr. E. Clarke)—he meant Sir Samuel Martin. He wrote to Lord Bramwell, after reading his argument—which, in his opinion, had never been answered in that House—

"I quite agree with you. I could never agree with Baron Platt that if a man was hurt somebody should pay him, and somebody must be liable. If I were to alter the law I would make the master liable to the servant in no case where the master is not to blame."

And he added that the litigation under the present Bill would be frightful. Then they were told that there was a great popular outcry for this legislation. He denied that. He was himself in a position to show that the bulk of the sensible working classes were already connected with insurance funds; and they did not wish to substitute a harassing system of litigation for the quiet, regular, and fair compensations between master and man which at present had done so much for them. No doubt, a large number of Members had got into Parliament who had given pledges to support this legislation. At the same time, their speeches all merely repeated a similar argument. But what was it they wanted to do? After many years, and a large experience of the results of insurance, they had brought the great bulk of the large employers of labour to consent to that system; but this Bill would entirely overthrow all that, and bring up a new source of liability. It would also affect others besides manufacturing industries; because it was well known that more people were killed in attending to agricultural industries than all the railways in the United Kingdom. His proposition, therefore, was that they should only allow this Bill to come into operation where the employer and the men had not made some provision for meeting the case of accidents. He did hope the Government would be ready to consider some reasonable scheme of insurance, and that would show whether the front Bench had really anything like a serious intention to deal with the whole case of accidents arising from the carelessness of one person or another, or from inevitable causes. They were told that this Bill would promote insurance. But he wanted to know how the throwing a penal measure at the heads of employers would do that, or induce them to take more pains? How, also, was it possible, if, under this Bill, they established an indefinite risk, which might be £5 in one case and £5,000 in another, for them to insure the employers against that risk? As a consequence, the employer would be forced to bear the risk himself, because it was absolutely uninsurable. It might be said that his clause was clumsy and indefinite; but it would, at any rate, have the object of testing the opinion of the Government on this question, and ascertain whether they were inclined to deal with it in a fair and straightforward manner, not in a piecemeal fashion, but with the whole.

MR. DODSON said, he would not follow the hon. Member into his general statement, but would merely point out that on his proposition they could not discuss the question of insurance, because the insurance clauses were not yet reached. It would only be unnecessarily occupying the time of the Committee now to raise a question which must come up later on.

Sir Edward Watkin

Amendment negatived.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND (in the absence of Mr. STAVELEY HILL) said, he had been requested to move an Amendment limiting the persons for whose benefit actions could be maintained to those named in 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93. That statute provided that the legal personal representatives should not maintain an action except for the benefit of a husband, wife, father, mother, grandfather, grandmother, stepfather or stepmother, son or daughter, grandson or granddaughter, stepson or stepdaughter. He was not sure, however, whether the attention of the hon. and learned Member for West Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill) had been drawn to the wording of the clause in the Bill, as it was provided that the legal personal representative of the workman should only have the same right as if the workman was not in the service of the employer. He (Sir Henry Holland) was disposed to think, therefore, that the words of the clause already covered the provision which it was desired to insert; and if this was the view of the Legal Officers of the Government he would not move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add, "Provided always that the legal personal representative shall not maintain proceedings under this Act except to benefit the persons named in the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93."—(Sir Henry Holland.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he had no doubt that the clause, as it at present stood, covered the proposal which his hon. Friend desired to make; but, still, he should have no possible objection to the words being inserted, so far as the Act affected England. His objection, however, was that the Bill also affected Scotland; and if this Proviso were introduced, it might have the result of, in some way, changing the Scotch law.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, after that expression of opinion, he would not press the Amendment.

MR. GORST wished to ask a question. A difficulty had been raised as to whether the words "when engaged in his work" were not necessary in this clause. It was suggested by the late Attorney General (Sir John Holker) that if they were not inserted the workman might be in the position of a trespasser who had no right to be there, and, therefore, might not be entitled to any compensation at all.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, they were not intended to have that interpretation; but he would consider the matter before the Report. At present, they seemed to him quite unnecessary; and if they were objectionable he would propose on the Report that they should be struck out.

SIR HENRY JACKSON begged the Solicitor General to consider the words "personal representative" in that clause. He knew that at present the opinion of the Solicitor General was the other way; but, still, he would ask him again to consider what the effect of these words would be. He maintained that if the personal representative brought an action and recovered compensation, that the compensation would be part of the deceased's personal estate, and would be liable to his debts; whereas that should not be so, because the damages recovered were intended as a solatium to individuals. He knew that the intention was to make these personal representatives occupy the same position as they did under Lord Campbell's Act; but the clause, in his opinion, was scarcely clear at present, and the damages might be said to be assets.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he would consider the matter; but he did not think the words would have that effect, for the reason that Lord Campbell's Act only enabled the administrator, or executor, to sue for the express benefit of certain named persons.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD thought this reading of the clause would rather complicate proceedings. If they referred to that Act at all they would have a difficulty as to how far it was to extend. At present, they had simply this provision—that, so far as regarded persons interested in these cases, common employment should make no difference, and that would leave them in just the same position as they were now.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND rose to Order. His Amendment had never been put. He had announced that he would withdraw it, and, therefore, this was absolutely unnecessary argument.

THE CHAIRMAN: I understood the hon. and learned Member to be speaking on the words of the clause itself.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD thought that the Solicitor General was preparing to give way unnecessarily. The more he considered it the more he was certain the present words were the best.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2 (Exceptions to Amendment of law).

MR. BRYCE said, the Amendment he had to move was to leave out sub-section 1. If the Committee would look at Clause 1, they would see that in it there were four specified cases in which workmen were put, in regard to their employers, in precisely the same position as a third party. That Clause 1 did not give any separate and independent rights to workmen; it only gave them the rights that a third party, a stranger, now had. Now, in this 2nd clause, they had certain exceptions to these four cases, and those exceptions deprived workmen in four sets of cases of the compensation which Clause 1 had entitled them to. The first of those four sets of cases was contained in the sub-section to which he now desired to draw the attention of Her Majesty's Government. Did they conceive that this 1st sub-section of Clause 2 would place a workman in any different position towards his employer from that which a third party or a stranger would stand in? It might be that he had imperfectly understood the clause, and he therefore desired to ask the Government how they understood it. It either put the workman in a different position towards his employer from that of a stranger or it did not. If it put him in a different position from a stranger or third party, he should be glad to have some reason given him for its doing so. He did not see why a workman should be in a worse position than a stranger as regarded defects in the machinery, plant, and stock-in-trade. If, on the other hand, this sub-section did not alter the law, as laid down in sub-section 1 of Clause 1, and left the workman in the same position as a stranger, then what was the use of it? It was said that it was put in in order to explain the clause, and to make the thing more plain to the reader; but he would remind the Government, and especially the Law Officers, of the difficulties which were constantly arising in the administration of justice from Acts purporting to declare the Common Law. The action of the Courts had given them a number of reported cases, with fine distinctions drawn between them; but persons who understood the technicalities of law knew how to work the law out of these cases. Then somebody passed a fresh Act of Parliament, which did not use exactly the same expressions as had been used by the Courts, but which was intended to clear up the matter, and the result was merely a new crop of cases and any number of appeals, in order to determine how far the statute changed the previous law, or whether or not any change was really made. He submitted, therefore, that they would merely increase litigation if they introduced this sub-section, and that the proper course would be to omit it altogether. This was not merely a question of drafting. He knew that the Government did not desire any advice on the drafting of their Bill, although the difficulties which had arisen were not, as it seemed to him, due to any fault on the part of the draftsman, but merely to the character of the scheme adopted by the Government, who were trying to steer a middle course between two opposite views. There really was, as he thought, a substantial question involved here; and he should like to ask whether the sub-section was intended to put the workman in a different position or not from that of a stranger?

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 4, to leave out from the word "under," to the word "condition," in line 9, both inclusive.—(Mr. Bryce.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) hoped the Committee would not agree to the Amendment. He could assure his hon. and learned Friend that there was no indisposition on the part of the Government to receive advice even on questions of drafting; but he thought he would see that it was not worth while to take up time in discussing questions of mere drafting in the limited period that still remained at their disposal. He had no doubt that this sub-section did, to some extent, limit sub-section 1. In other parts of the Bill they had not thought it desirable to go the extreme length of abolishing the rule as to common employment. The law at present was that the employer was bound to take reasonable care, to have proper machinery, and to keep it in a proper state; but he could get rid of that liability, and discharge himself of it, if he engaged somebody else to do that work. The law held that the person so engaged was a fellow-servant, and in that way the law had allowed the employer to get rid of his Common Law liability. The Government, desiring to meet that difficulty, had provided that the employer should not thus get rid of his liability, but should be liable not only if he himself did not take due care, but if the person to whom he intrusted that duty failed to discharge his trust. Therefore, if the defect arose from the neglect of some person in the service of the employer intrusted by him with the duty of preventing it, the employer was liable. On the other hand, they might have two men engaged on a boiler, for instance, and one might take out a rivet, and, consequently, some mischief might happen to the other. The Government had determined not to go the whole length of making the employer liable in that case. The Bill merely made the employer liable for his own want of care, or for that of those to whom he had intrusted the duty, and it was to carry out that view that this sub-section had been introduced. Of course, if an employer looked after the matter himself the law cast upon him the liability. If, next, he did not put anybody in his place, it still cast upon him the liability; and if he put somebody in his place he would not be discharged of his liability under this Act if that substituted person was guilty of negligence. That being so, his hon. and learned Friend would see why this sub-section was put in, and exactly how it carried out the view of the Government.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, he considered this sub-section was absolutely necessary to qualify the wording of Clause 1. [Cries of "Agreed, agreed!"] If that was so, it was unnecessary to continue the discussion.

MR. BRYCE said, that, after the explanation of the Solicitor General, he would not press his Amendment, although he continued to think that no sufficient reason had been shown for putting the workman in any different position, under sub-section 1 of Clause 1, from the position of a stranger. As respects the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had last spoken, if that hon. and learned Gentleman would read with attention the last part of Clause 1, he would see that his criticism was erroneous, and that there was good ground for the Amendment which he (Mr. Bryce) had proposed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he believed the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill was disposed to accept the Amendment which stood in his name—namely, in page 2, line 5, after "arose," insert "or had not been discovered or remedied owing to." He, therefore, begged to move it.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. INDERWICK said, he wished to move the next Amendment—namely, in page 2, line 8, before "works," insert "ways." Inasmuch as the Committee had already agreed to insert the word "ways," in sub-section 1, they must also, he presumed, accept it there.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON begged to move that the words "in trade" be inserted after "stock," in the same line.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. INDERWICK said, that he had an Amendment, to insert, in page 2, line 9, after "condition" —

"Or unless the defect might have been discovered by reasonable care or skill by or on behalf of the employer."

But, inasmuch as the defect in the clause had already been pointed out by the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), and that hon. and learned Gentleman had suggested an Amendment, which had been agreed to, he should not move the one which stood in his name.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, the addition which he proposed to make to that sub-section was a matter of great importance. Unfortunately, by some mistake, his proposition had been divided into two parts; and, consequently, the words, as they stood, appeared to have no meaning. The mistake seemed to have arisen owing to the fact that some words had been introduced between the first and second parts of his Amendment. But his intention was to move the whole as one addition to the sub-section. The remaining portion would be found in page 406 of the Amendments that day. His object in moving the Amendment was as follows:—By that Bill employers were made liable for the negligence of men who were very little removed from the position of ordinary workmen. If he were asked the grounds upon which employers might justly, in any degree, be made liable for men of that class, the only answer he could find was that they had appointed those men themselves, and that the employers had no voice in the appointment, or continuance in office, of those men. He could well conceive that workmen might say such and such subordinate officers had been appointed. They had no voice in his appointment, and could not protest against his continuance in office, or take steps for his removal. “Our lives are in danger by that man being appointed to such a post as that.” He could quite understand that that feeling might exist, and he knew that such a feeling had been in the minds of workmen for many years. That principle had been suggested by workmen in former days, at the time when the Mines Regulation Act was passed. They had always sought to have some voice in the appointment of subordinate officers in mines. So long as the present system continued, so long, then, might be some justice in employers being liable for the negligence which ensued. Now, his object was to permit an employer to post up, in the ordinary way in which notices were posted, a notice stating the name of the man whom he proposed to appoint to any particular subordinate office, and then his Amendment provided that if 10 men should wish to give notice to the employer that they disapproved of the appointment of such a man, then he thought any reasonable employer would hear all these men had to say in regard to the capacity and character of the man whom it was proposed to appoint. He had little doubt, from his knowledge of the relations which existed between employers and workmen, that such an arrangement would give rise to any difficulty. He believed that employers, as a rule, endeavoured to obtain the services of the best men they could find for the subordinate officers in their employ, precisely in the same way that non-commissioned officers were selected for regiments, and the good wages which they gave, generally secured the services of good men. He had little doubt that no practical grievance would arise, and he felt also that fellow-workmen would not oppose the appointment of a really good man. If out of any prejudice merely they did so object, then it was provided that the matter be referred to the Inspector of Mines or Factories as the case might be. If they considered the appointment of men under those circumstances, it would be obvious to them, he believed, that such appointments would entirely remove what might be a just excuse of complaint on the part of the men, that they had no voice in the appointment of those subordinate officers. He had also provided that by some machinery they might object to any man continuing to hold any such office—namely, by the process of 10 men giving notice to the owner that they objected to such man continuing in such office. He thought himself that a great advantage would ensue to the employer from that course, because the character of the man was better known to the employés than to the employer. A man might not be supposed to be worthless or idle; but his fellow-workmen might be fully aware of the fact. Under the clause which he proposed the men would be able to object to the employment of a man whom they did not consider to be a proper and a right man to occupy a certain post. He could not understand the very grave objection that had been felt to that proposal by employers at the time that the Mines Regulation Act was past, and those same objections might be raised now perhaps. If the employer did not avail himself of that clause, then he would continue liable for the action of that man, and he would almost say justly so. On the other hand, if he availed himself of that clause, which allowed him to give notice of his intention to appoint any particular man to a particular office, then he thought that the employer might fairly and justly claim to be relieved from responsibility. He had endeavoured not to occupy the time of the Committee longer than was necessary in order to explain the bearing of that particular clause. He believed that it would be considered by workmen as a very great concession on the part of the employers, and he would put the Amendment on the Notice Paper in compliance with a request which he had received. For his part, he thought it was a just, fair, and reasonable proposal, and he pressed it on the consideration of the Government.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 9, after "condition," insert "and whose appointment and continuance in office has not had the sanction and approval of the workmen in manner hereinafter mentioned (that is to say): that, except in case of emergency."

"Seven days' notice of the intention of an employer to entrust any person with the duty aforesaid shall be posted at the works, and that such notice shall specify—

1. The christian and surname of the person proposed, and his occupation and address;
2. That any ten workmen at the works in question may object to the intended appointment, and give the grounds of objection, either in writing or personally, at the pay office to the employer or his manager;

That thereupon, in case the employer shall still be desirous of making such appointment, he shall forthwith refer the question to the inspector of mines or factories and workshops, or to an inspector of the Board of Trade, as the case may require, of the district wherein such works are situate, and such inspector shall, within fourteen days after the matter has been referred to him, after hearing the parties, if required by them, decide in writing whether such appointment shall be made or not.

If the appointment be not objected to as aforesaid within seven days, or if the appointment shall be sanctioned by the inspector after objection, such appointment shall be deemed to have the sanction and approval of the workmen employed at the works.

For the purpose of making known the person so appointed the employer shall cause a copy of the appointment to be posted up in legible characters in some conspicuous place at or near the works, where the same may be conveniently read by the workmen, and so often as the same becomes defaced, obliterated, or destroyed shall cause it to be renewed with all reasonable despatch during seven days.

During the continuance of such appointment any ten workmen may object to the person so appointed either in writing or personally at the pay office to the employer or his manager, and thereupon the matter shall be referred to and decided by an inspector in the manner aforesaid; and in case such inspector decides that the person objected to is unfit to discharge the duties assigned to him, he shall no longer be deemed to have the sanction and approval of the workmen."—(Mr. Hussey Vivian.)

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said, he believed that the various objections to the proposed Amendment were obvious. One of the recommendations brought before the Committee in favour of that Amendment was that it would be a great advantage to the employer to be able to consult the workmen, who knew more about the man than those in a responsible position. One would suppose, from what the hon. Member who had just sat down had said, that at present an employer was forbidden to consult his men as to the character of a man whom he proposed to appoint to a particular office. The various objections to that Amendment were of a highly positive kind. In the first place, it obviously defeated the responsibility of the employer, which was the guiding principle of the legislation on that subject; and not only did it defeat the responsibility, but it diminished the efficiency with which the work was carried on. If they wanted a thing carried out well, let them make one man do it. By dividing the responsibility it would not be done better, but worse. Let them bear one thing in mind, which was that if they carried that Amendment the workmen would be in part liable for those employed in superintendence, and the employer might be relieved from all injury arising from the carelessness of an inferior workman. It was perfectly true that the workmen might know of a person disqualified who would necessitate an inquiry into the case. But, supposing that the superintendents were men wholly unknown to the workmen, but known to the employer? How could 10 men really raise an objection to a man of whose antecedents they were wholly ignorant? And yet they might be desirous to object to him, because the employer had appointed a man whom they did not know. He had said that the workman would be, in part, responsible.

Mr. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he thought the hon. Gentleman had not read the last part of the clause, which provided for raising the same objection during the continuance of the employment.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said, he did not quite see how that affected the argument. An accident might happen before an owner could be made aware of the facts. There was still one more objection to the Amendment. It said that in case there was a difference of opinion, appeal lay to the Inspector of Mines and Factories. What on earth could the Inspector of Mines and Factories know about it? The hon. Member said that the master was ignorant of the qualifications of the man appointed. How much more ignorant was the Inspector of Mines, Factories, and Workshops, who knew nothing whatever of the man personally, and yet was to be a final Court of Appeal. It appeared to him, for the reason he had stated, and for many other reasons that might be stated, that the Amendment was an anomalous one; and he trusted, therefore, that the Government would not accept it.

MR. DODSON said, he thought that the objections which had been raised by the hon. Member who had just sat down were sufficient to induce the Committee not to accept the Amendment. He would just point out one other objection. That was, that the Amendment would apply to all employers—for instance, to a farmer or a boatman—in fact, to every trade; and it did seem a little absurd, in such cases, to appeal finally to the Inspector of Mines, Factories, and Workshops. He would say, on behalf of the Government, that they could not accept it.

Amendment negatived.

MR. DODSON said, he would move to add to the end of Section 2, in order to give effect to the undertaking he had entered into with the hon. Member for East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes).

MR. WARTON said, that he had an Amendment to move before that, which was, in line 11, to insert the words, "illegality or unreasonableness," instead of the words "impropriety or defect."

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, there was an Amendment before that in the name of the hon. and learned Member for Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce).

MR. BRYCE said, he did not intend then to move his Amendment.

MR. WARTON said, then he would move the Amendment he had just read.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 11, leave out "impropriety or defect," and insert "illegality or unreasonableness."—(Mr. Warton.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he did not know what those words would imply, except something which was directly in opposition to the statute of Common Law. The words used in the sub-section were carefully chosen, and the Government could not accept the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member.

MR. WARTON said, he referred to bye-laws, and certainly bye-laws might be illegal and in contradiction to the law of the country.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he hoped his hon. and learned Friend would not press his Amendment. At the same time, he did not think that the words used by the Government were altogether perfect. He wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board proposed to insert in that sub-section the same Amendment as had been inserted in a sub-section of Clause 1?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): Yes.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he was sorry that the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) had not moved his Amendment. It seemed to him that persons claiming under that sub-section should be bound to prove an impropriety or defect in the rules; and also, on the other hand, that if, through obedience to the instructions, injury were received by a workman, that should be dealt with as a liability.

Amendment negatived.

MR. DODSON said, he would then propose to add at the end of sub-section 2 the words which would give effect to what he had promised the hon. Member for East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes).

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 12, after "mentioned," insert "Provided, That where the rule or by-law has been proved, or accepted, as a proper rule or by-law by one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, by the Board of Trade, or any other Government Department, it should not be deemed for the purposes of this Act to be an improper or defective rule or by-law."—(Mr. Dodson.)

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, that under the Mines Regulation Act there were certain rules, and he did not think that the Amendment would cover them.

MR. J. W. PEASE said, the hon. Member was quite right as regarded the general rules, as laid down in the Coal Mines Act; but there were also special rules which applied to all collieries, and which had to receive the approval of the Home Secretary.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, that he should like to hear what the sub-section was as it now stood in the Bill.

MR. WARTON said, that he thought it would be well to insert the words "or any authority at law stated for that object."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he would suggest whether it would not be well to add this as an Interpretation Clause at the end of the Bill.

MR. DODSON said, that in accordance with the request of the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) he would insert at the end of sub-section 2:—

"Provided that where the rule or by-law has been approved or accepted as a proper rule or by-law by one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, by the Board of Trade, or any other Government Department, it shall not be deemed for the purposes of this Act to be an improper or defective rule or by-law."

MR. HOPWOOD said, he thought that it would be in accordance with precedent if the words were inserted "in pursuance of an Act of Parliament."

MR. DODSON said, no Government would have power to approve of rules except under the authority of an Act of Parliament.

MR. HOPWOOD said, that he thought his right hon. Friend somewhat misconceived his objection. This Bill proposed, in effect, to give power to the Government to recognize bye-laws to be settled by some Department of the Government. He thought, therefore, it would be well to add in the clause that the bye-laws were accepted in pursuance of the powers of some Act of Parliament. He would move that "under or by virtue of any Act of Parliament" be inserted after the word "Department."

Amendment agreed to.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he would suggest that the clause should be brought up upon Report, because it was obvious from what had been said that, as it now stood, it was liable to some misinterpretation.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of sub-section 2 to add these words "Provided that where the rule or bye-law has been approved or accepted as a proper rule or by-law by one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, or by the Board of Trade, or any other Government Department, under or by virtue of any Act of Parliament, it shall not be deemed for the purposes of this Act to be an improper or defective rule or by-law."

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he was not quite clear as to whether the rules in the Mines Regulation Act would come under the provisions of this clause. There were 31 general rules laid down by that Act of Parliament.

MR. DODSON said, that the objection raised by his hon. Friend really amounted to a Breach of Privilege, for he was assuming that rules laid down in an Act of Parliament could be improper or defective.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. BRYCE said, that he begged to move to omit sub-section 3, on the ground that it was clearly unnecessary. There could be no doubt that the doctrine of what was commonly, though perhaps inaccurately, called contributory negligence was part of the Common Law. That being so, it was unnecessary to insert this as a sub-section in the 2nd clause, for the 1st clause of the Bill only gave a workman the same right of compensation against his employer as a stranger would have, and the stranger's right being subject to the doctrine of contributory negligence, so would the workman's right be likewise. He would further submit that there was a real danger that the word "materially," as applied to contributory negligence in this sub-section, would cause considerable difficulty. In all probability, if that word were left in the sub-section, it would be a fruitful source of litigation, for the question would be raised whether there was a difference between "contributing" and "materially contributing."

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 13, to leave out from the word "in" to the word "injury," in line 14, both inclusive.—(Mr. Bryce.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'In any case where the workman' stand part of the Clause."

MR. DODSON said, that he must ask the Committee to retain the sub-section. The words were in the original Bill before it was amended in Select Committee of the House; and it was the opinion of the Government that it was desirable to retain this declaration of the existing law, in order to keep the statement of the law clearly before the Judge. He did not think that any difficulty would arise from the sub-section, the provisions of which had been very carefully considered.

MR. BRYOE asked if the right hon. Gentleman would have any objection to the omission of the word "materially?"

MR. DODSON said, that he had no objection to the omission of that word.

MR. HOPWOOD said, that if that word were omitted it would injure the cause of the workman. The general law was that they must show some material contributory negligence. If, however, the Law Advisers of the Crown thought that this word might be safely left out of the sub-section, he should have no objection; but it seemed to him that it would be better to retain it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that he thought the sub-section was right as it now stood.

MR. BRYOE said, that he proposed to withdraw his Amendment, if the Government would consent to omit the word "materially" from the sub-section.

MR. GORST said, that he thought his hon. and learned Friend was absolutely right upon the point which he had raised, and he should like to know what the Government had to say against it. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board said that it must be taken to be right, because it was in the original Bill. But that did not recommend itself to him as a legal argument. He should like to know what the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had to say upon this matter. He fully agreed with the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets that this declaration of the law was quite unnecessary.

It being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Chairman reported Progress; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

FREE EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Dr. CAMERON, Bill to enable School Boards in Scotland to provide, by means of rates only instead of by rates and fees, for the education of children resident in their district in Board Schools, so far as that education is compulsory, ordered to be brought in by Dr. CAMERON, Mr. M'LAREN, Mr. HENDERSON, and Mr. MIDDLETON.

Mr. Dodson

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 299.]

MARRIED WOMEN (MAINTENANCE, &c. OF CHILDREN) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Hopwood, Bill to provide a remedy by Law for Married Women against their Husbands neglecting or refusing to maintain and educate their children, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Hopwood and Mr. THOMAS-SON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 300.]

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 5th August, 1880.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Committee negatived—Third Reading—Epping Forest (179).

Committee—Report—Courts of Justice Building Act (1865) Amendment (174-182); Merchant Shipping (Fees and Expenses) (165).

Report—Tramways Orders Confirmation (No. 2)* (134).

Third Reading—County Court Jurisdiction in Lunacy (Ireland)* (146); Wild Birds Protection Law Amendment (172); Inclosure Provisional Order (Llanfair Hills)* (146); Tramways Orders Confirmation (No. 1)* (133), and passed.

EPPING FOREST BILL.

(The Earl Granville.)

(No. 179.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

EARL GRANVILLE moved that the Bill be now read a second time, and asked that the Standing Orders might also be suspended to allow of the Bill being passed through its remaining stages. It was merely a Continuance Bill. A similar Bill had been brought in by the late Government, but had fallen through in consequence of the Dissolution. The Act which sanctioned various arbitration proceedings was about to expire, and hence the necessity for the present Bill, to enable those arbitrations to be carried on.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl Granville.)

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) thought that, under the circumstances, the wiser course would be to suspend the Standing Orders and allow the Bill to go through. If anyone was injuriously affected by not having an opportunity of petitioning against it, his case could be re-considered. But it was a very serious thing that a Bill should pass without any person having an opportunity of being heard by Petition against it.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly; Committee negatived; Then Standing Order No. XXXV. considered (according to Order), and dispensed with: Bill read 3^a, and passed.

WILD BIRDS PROTECTION LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Lord Aberdare.)

(Nos. 144, 172.) THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^a."

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that his noble Friend (Lord Aberdare), who was not now present, did not intend to move an Amendment of which he had given Notice. Under the Bill all those counties which had obtained independent variations of close time by order of the Home Office were to go through the process of applying for them over again; but his noble Friend thought it would save inconvenience if the orders issued by the Home Office were made to preserve their force by an Amendment to the Bill. Out of 30 orders, half would be coincident in point of time with the time provided by the Bill. He understood that his noble Friend intended to abandon his Amendment, because he thought the counties which had obtained particular orders would be willing to withdraw from the existing limitations of time for the purpose of adopting the general orders. For his own part, he was not quite certain that it was very desirable that they should aim at uniformity in the matter, as different parts of the country differed so much from one another.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 3^a accordingly, with the Amendments, and passed, and sent to the Commons.

House adjourned at half past Five o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter before Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 5th August, 1880.

MINUTES.] — PRIVATE BILL (by Order) — Second Reading—Ennis and West Clare Railway*.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Drainage and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Provisional Order (No. 4) * [301]; Law of Ejectment (Ireland) * [302].

Committee — Employers' Liability (re-comm) [209]—R.P.

Committee—Report—Drainage Boards (Ireland) (Additional Powers) [290].

Committee — Report — Considered as amended—Railway Construction Facilities Act Amendment [293]; Married Women's Policies of Assurance (Scotland) (re-comm.) * [270].

Considered as amended—Spirits [210]; Metropolitan Board of Works (Money) * [272].

Third Reading—Exchequer Bonds and Bills * [294], and passed.

Withdrawn—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment * [165].

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House, that he had received from Mr. Justice Lush and Mr. Justice Manisty, two of the Judges selected, in pursuance of The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, for the Trial of Election Petitions, a Report relating to the City of Oxford.

CITY OF OXFORD ELECTION.

The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868.

The Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Act, 1879.

The Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Act, 1880.

To The Right Honourable

The Speaker of the House of Commons.

We, the Right Honourable Sir Robert Lush, knight, and the Honourable Sir Henry Manisty, knight, Judges of the High Court of Justice, and two of the Judges for the time being for the trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby, in pursuance of the said Acts, certify that upon the 2nd day of August 1880, at the Town Hall, and on the 3rd and 4th days of August 1880, by adjournment at the County Hall, both places being within the Borough of Oxford, in the County of Oxford, We duly held a Court for the trial of, and did try, the Election Petition for the said Borough between Thomas Hill Green and others, Petitioners; and Alexander William Hall, Respondent.

On the 3rd day of the trial, and after several Witnesses had been called in support of the case for the Petitioners, the Respondent declined further to contest the seat, and we, being satisfied that the Respondent had been by his Agents guilty of bribery, determined that the said Alexander William Hall, being the Member whose Election and Return were complained of in the said Petition, was not duly elected or returned, and that his Election and Return were and are wholly null and void on the ground of bribery by Agents, and we do hereby certify in writing such our determination to you.

And whereas charges were made of corrupt practices having been committed at the said Election, we, in further pursuance of the said Acts, report as follows:—

- (a.) That no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed at the said Election by or with the knowledge or consent of any Candidate.
- (b.) That the following persons have been proved at the trial to have been guilty of the corrupt practice of bribery:—

Persons bribed.	Persons by whom Voters were bribed.
Daniel Higgins. John Jones. Robert Dunsby. George Mills.	Joseph Henry Gynes. John Dumbleton. Thomas Wheeler. Charles Linnell. Benjamin Bennett. George Porter. Isaac Luker. Edward Carr.

We have given a Certificate of Indemnity to each of the persons bribed.

- (c.) That there is reason to believe corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the Election for the Borough of Oxford to which the said Petition relates, and the grounds upon which we have arrived at that conclusion will be found in our Judgment.

Dated this 4th day of August 1880.

ROBT. LUSH.
H. MANISTY.

And the said Report was ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

QUESTIONS.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (IRELAND)
—THE CLERK OF THE CROWN IN THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

If John Fox Goodman is Clerk of the Crown in the late Court of Queen's Bench (now Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice) in Ireland, and if he is the same person who holds the office of Salaried Examiner of Solicitors' Apprentices under the Act 29 and 30 Vic. c. 84, s. 24 and 25; and, if so, what course the Government intend to adopt towards him, having regard to the provisions of the sixteenth section of the Act 2 and 3 Will. 4, c. 48, whereby it is enacted—

“ That it shall not be lawful for the Clerk of the Crown, nor for his assistant, to be appointed, under the provisions of this Act, to hold or exercise the duties of any other office or place whatsoever, nor to practise as an attorney or solicitor in any court of law or equity in Ireland, under pain of forfeiting the said office of Clerk of the Crown or the said office of assistant to such clerk, as the case may be.”

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Mr. Goodman is Clerk of the Crown in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, and the same person who holds the office of Salaried Examiner of Solicitors' Apprentices. I am informed, and legally advised, that the retention of the Examinership does not affect his continuing to hold the office of Clerk of the Crown. If the hon. Member thinks by acting as Examiner he forfeits his office as Clerk of the Crown he can bring the matter before the Courts of Law.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY COMMISSION.

MR. ROUNDELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, considering the serious inconvenience which will ensue to the University of Cambridge and the Colleges thereof in the event of the non-completion in the course of the present year of the work of the Cambridge Commissioners, he can give assurance that the Statutes for the University and the Colleges will be settled by the Commissioners within the time mentioned?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had communicated with the Secretary of the Cambridge Commission in reference to the subject of the hon. Member's Question, who stated that there was good reason to hope, and certainly he earnestly wished, that the statutes might be completed at such a date before the end of the Christmas Vacation as would allow of their running the course prescribed by the Act before the end of next Session of Parliament, taking that to be as late as August, 1881.

CRIMINAL LAW—CONVICT LABOUR.

MR. BROADHURST asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can inform the House if there is any truth in the statement which recently appeared in the "Western Daily Mercury," that one thousand convicts were to be brought from Chatham to Plymouth to be employed in the erection of the Royal Naval Barracks at Keyham Barton; and, if it is true, whether, seeing the great depression now existing in the building trades in the West of England, he will take steps to prevent such a concentration of convict labour in one district in one branch of industry?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he knew of no such intention as that mentioned in the Question of the hon. Member.

ROYAL PATRIOTIC FUND—THE REPORTS OF 1878 AND 1879.

MR. GORST (for Baron HENRY DE WORMS) asked the Secretary of State for War, Why the Reports of the Commissioners of the Royal Patriotic Fund for 1878 and 1879 have not yet been presented to Parliament; whether the accounts for those years have yet been audited; and, whether he will appoint a Committee similar to the one appointed by him in 1869, with reference to the Greenwich Hospital Schools, to inquire into the past management of the fund, with authority to prepare a scheme for its reorganisation, upon a plan calculated to restore public confidence, and to provide for the efficient administration of the numerous other trusts which have, during recent years, been handed over to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to the first Question of the hon. Member, I have to state that the Reports in question have not been presented, because they have only just been received. They will be submitted to Her Majesty immediately, and then presented to both Houses of Parliament. The Report for 1878 has been consolidated with that for 1879, as an inquiry was going on at the time when the former would naturally have been drawn up. The accounts for 1878 have been audited; those for 1879 have been sent to the Treasury for audit. The Commission is a Royal Commission, and no Department of the Government has direct authority over it. Among its distinguished Members are the late Prime Minister, the present Prime Minister, and other eminent statesmen, and officers of both Services. I cannot undertake to deal with such a body as if it were an ordinary school board. But I will carefully peruse the Report, and obtain what information I can about the complaints which I understand have recently been made as to details in the management; and I will consult my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty, who is jointly interested with myself in the matter, whether any other steps should be taken. I understand that the Executive Committee has been within the last few weeks greatly strengthened.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—DISPENSARY HOUSES.

MR. BELLINGHAM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a Return of the number of Dispensary Committees that have availed themselves of an Act passed in August 1879, giving facilities for providing dispensary houses and dwelling houses for medical officers of dispensary districts in Ireland?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The Boards of Guardians, and not the Dispensary Committees, provide dispensary houses. If the hon. Member will move for a Return showing how many Boards of Guardians availed themselves of the Act referred to I will be happy to give it to him.

NAVY—H.M.S. "ATALANTA"—SUICIDE OF ELLEN HATHAWAY.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If his attention has been called to the reports in the daily papers of the suicide of Ellen Hathaway, widow of a Quartermaster drowned in the "Atalanta," which reports state that the act was committed during a period of depression of mind caused by her receiving from the Admiralty an unfavourable answer to her application for allowances due to her on her husband's death; whether there is any truth in these reports; whether he will inform the House of what passed between Mrs. Hathaway and the Admiralty; and, will they, under the circumstances, allow any moneys which may have been due to her to be paid to her children?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: There is no foundation for the statements referred to by the hon. and gallant Member, that Ellen Hathaway, who recently committed suicide, had received an unfavourable reply from the Admiralty to her application for allowances. This poor woman was entitled to the balance of pay due to her late husband—namely, £16; she would also have received a gratuity equal to one year's pay of her husband, or £42. On the 24th of last month she applied personally to the Admiralty for payment of the balance of wages. I am assured by the gentleman who saw her that he received her most kindly, and fully explained what she was entitled to. She was told that, on filling up a form, she would be paid at once the balance of wages. The form was sent to her by post the same day, but was not returned by her. On the 29th her landlady wrote to the Admiralty to say that Ellen Hathaway had committed suicide "through grief of her husband being drowned." I understand she left no children. The money will therefore be paid to the legal representative of the deceased.

JUDICIAL PENSIONS—SUPER-ANNUATIONS.

MR. PUGH asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether, having regard to the provisions for superannuation in the Civil and Military Services, Her Majesty's Government will consider the desirability of providing that Her Majesty's Judges shall, on attaining a certain age, be eligible for pensions, notwithstanding that they may not have completed the term of fifteen years' service, and may not be permanently disabled within the meaning of the Acts at present in force, and of bringing in a Bill in the next Session of Parliament for that purpose?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, the subject referred to in the Question was one which had not in any way attracted the attention of the Government. The policy of pensioning learned Judges after short service was one of a very doubtful nature. He could not hold out any hope to the hon. Member that it would be dealt with at any early date by Her Majesty's Government.

HARES AND RABBITS BILL—POOR RATE.

MR. DONALDSON-HUDSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in the event of the Hares and Rabbits Bill becoming Law, and the landlord reserving as much of the sporting rights as the Law will allow, he will state what proportion of the poor rate in respect of such sporting rights the tenant will be empowered to recover from his landlord?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, as the law stood the tenant was liable, in the first instance, to the rateable value of the whole of the sporting rights; and in the event of the Hares and Rabbits Bill becoming law, he would be empowered to recover from the landlord a portion of the poor rate corresponding with the amount of sporting rights reserved by the landlord.

MR. DONALDSON-HUDSON: What proportion?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: That depends on the proportion which the landlord reserves.

TURKISH GUARANTEED LOAN, 1865.

MR. MONK asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether a payment of £65,000 has been made in cash to the Porte in respect of the Surplus Revenues of the Island of Cyprus, while a sum of £61,000 is owing from the Porte to this Country in respect of the interest on the Guaranteed Loan of 1865; and, if so, whether such payments will be withheld for the future, until the Porte has repaid all sums due in respect of that loan?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: There is a large sum owing to this country from the Porte. It is not exactly the sum mentioned in the Question. The hon. Gentleman has taken the amount that was owing a short time ago to the Governments of England and France together. That is a first charge to us; but we were to recover half of it from France. But since the Question was placed on the Paper—indeed, yesterday—the Porte has forwarded a further payment. The sum owing to England by the Porte on account of the 1855 Loan is now about £52,000, an equal sum being due to France—making, together, £103,000. The sum paid to the account of the Porte by the Government of Cyprus cannot be stated in pounds sterling, because of the difficulty of computing the rate of exchange. For the year 1879-80 the sum paid at the end of March amounted to 11,092,377 “metallique” piastres plus £5,000. For the year 1878-9 the amount paid was 7,402,625 piastres. Her Majesty's Government are not at present in a position to state the measures which should be taken to insure observance by the Porte of its obligations to the guaranteeing Powers.

POST OFFICE MONEY ORDERS BILL— SPURIOUS POSTAL NOTES.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Postmaster General, What precautions are intended to be taken by the Post Office authorities to enable postmasters and postmistresses of small country Post Offices and others to distinguish genuine from spurious postal notes, seeing that no letters of advice will be employed under the new system as embodied in the Bill now before the House?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, the subject had been considered; and it was the opinion of the most experienced officials of the Post Office, as well as of those who were largely engaged in commercial and banking business, that there would be no difficulty in the matter.

IRELAND—ST. PATRICK'S HOSPITAL, DUBLIN.

MR. W. CORBET asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, with reference to the way in which the Charter of His Majesty King George the Second for erecting and endowing St. Patrick's Hospital, Dublin, has been carried out by the governors of that institution, Whether he is aware that it is expressly provided by the will of Dean Swift, and by the provisions of the Charter, that the trustees of the estate should lay out the same in purchasing lands of inheritance in fee simple, and not encumbered with or subject to any leases of lives renewable for ever or for any term of years longer than thirty-one; that, notwithstanding this provision, the Trustees bought certain lands held by tenants under leases of lives renewable for ever, two of which leases were subsequently purchased by the father of the present receiver of the hospital rents, who himself shortly afterwards purchased a third perpetuity lease; and, whether said purchases by the Trustees were not made in violation of the Charter, and are therefore utterly void?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): In reply to my hon. Friend, I have to state that by the Charter of 1746, constituting St. Patrick's Hospital (popularly known as Swift's Hospital), the administration of the property of this Institution is vested in Trustees, who are not under the control of the Government, or responsible in any way to the Government. The provisions of Dean Swift's will are stated in the Question with substantial accuracy; but the Trustees are empowered by the Charter to accept future gifts or bequests to be invested at interest or in purchase of real estate of inheritance in fee simple. In the last century, the Trustees, I believe, purchased real estate at different times which still forms part of the property of this Institution; but whether the purchase money was acquired under Dean Swift's will, or was subsequently acquired, I have no means of ascertaining; and, therefore, I can offer no opinion as to such investment. My hon. Friend, from his long experience in the Lunacy Office in Dublin, is aware that the Commissioners of Charitable Donations and Bequests are empowered to authorize or direct proceedings in reference to the management of the property of any charity; and my hon. Friend may apply, in the ordinary way, to the Attorney General for his sanction to enable him, as a relator, to take any proceedings he may be advised.

LAW AND POLICE—ITALIAN CHILDREN IN ENGLAND.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether any success has attended the measures adopted in 1877 to suppress the introduction into this Country of Italian children taken away from Italy in violation of the Laws of that Kingdom; and, whether the Home Office can present to the House any Returns or Reports on the subject?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that, as the result of inquiries, he found that the Circular of 1877 had had an excellent effect. A considerable number of cases had been brought before the magistrates, and the result had been that some children had been sent to industrial schools and others to their own country. He did not think the Home Office were in possession of Returns showing the exact number of these cases. The Metropolitan Police had orders to take all Italian children found begging before the magistrates.

THE CONSTABULARY (IRELAND)—
FOXFORD, CO. MAYO.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can now see his way to order the removal of the hut for extra police erected in the parish of Pulnagowna, Foxford, county Mayo, and the withdrawal of those police, so as to relieve the distressed inhabitants of this district from the cost of their maintenance? I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman would be prepared, without Notice, to answer another Question which I venture to put to him in consequence of a telegram I have just received from the Rev. Patrick O'Connor, who wires me to say that the Castlebar Board of Guardians refuses to give out-door relief to families in that Union, because it is alleged the head of the family is employed in England. I would ask the Chief Secretary, Whether the absence of the head of the family, in the absence of evidence as to whether he is employed or not, should be sufficient reason for withholding relief from his wife and children?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: With regard to the last Question, I must ask the hon. Gentleman to give me a Notice sufficiently long in order that I may hear the explanation of the Board of Guardians of Castlebar. As to the Question on the Paper, I cannot see my way to order the removal of the hut referred to, which is still necessary for the preservation of peace in the district and the protection of the lives of those on whom the outrage was committed. Half the cost of the maintenance of the force will, on the 1st of June, fall on the barony, and not solely on the immediate locality. I very much regret that persons who are poor should be obliged to pay that; but the outrage was of a serious nature, and though several persons were engaged in it, no assistance whatever was given to the local police in their efforts to discover the offenders.

DISTRESS (IRELAND)—ROAD WORKS, SLIGO CO.

MR. O'KELLY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is a fact that the Contract for Road Works No. 2, Coolavin Barony (county Sligo), on the property of The O'Connor Don, was awarded to Mr. William Kennedy of Carrowkeel, county Roscommon, and that on the 1st of July Mr. Kennedy was directed to begin work by the county surveyor; whether, on the 18th of July, the Board of Works (Ireland) ordered the work to be stopped by telegram, and, without alleging any cause or offering any explanation, transferred the contract to a tenant of The O'Connor Don; and, whether any complaint had been made against Mr. Kennedy or the manner in which he was carrying out his contract by the county surveyor; and, if not, upon what ground was his contract annulled by the Board of Works?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: I find, Sir, that the facts of the case referred to by the hon. Member are as follows:—The road works in question were put up to tender, and the only one received was from a Mr. Harrington, a tenant of The O'Connor Don. The tender was accepted, and due security given for the work. At that time the work was not sanctioned by the Board of Works, and the tender was subject to that approval. When the Board subsequently sanctioned the works, the original contract was forgotten, and they handed over the work to the county surveyor. He immediately employed Mr. Kennedy to do the work. The Board of Works, on learning the true facts of the case, and the existence of Mr. Harrington's contract, which could not be set aside, at once informed the county surveyor, and directed him to hand the works over to him.

Sir H. Drummond Wolff

RAILWAY WORKS (IRELAND) — PRACTICE OF THIS HOUSE IN REGARD TO QUESTIONS.

MR. FINIGAN (who was met with constant interruption) read the following Question, of which he had given Notice:—To ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether his attention has been directed to two advertisements in the "London-derry Sentinel" of the 10th of July, in the case of the West Donegal Railway and the Limavady and Dungiven Railway, and in which notice is given that a Mr. Edmund Murphy is appointed by the Board of Works as Government arbitrator to inquire into the interests of persons, landlords and tenants, whose lands are to be taken for said Railways; whether the said Edmund Murphy is not a land agent to several landlords in the county of Donegal, and land agent upon one or more estates through which the Finn Valley Railway, of which the West Donegal is only an extension, runs, and of one of which Railways he, or the landlord he represents, is a large shareholder; whether the West Donegal Railway does not run through estates which have been the subject of litigation and disputes as to the relative value of tenant right and rents between landlord and tenant in the county of Donegal; whether his attention has been called to a letter published in the "Belfast Whig," written by the same Edmund Murphy, and deposed to in evidence by his son before the late County Down Election Petition inquiry, in which the said Edmund Murphy explains to the tenants of an estate in that county, where he is also land agent, that he cannot personally canvass them, inasmuch as he was busy operating in the county of Donegal, where "Conservative interests were also assailed," and earnestly begging of them, the tenants, to vote for the Conservative candidates; whether the said West Donegal Railway is not practically conducted by the Finn Valley Railway Company, of which the said Edmund Murphy, or his principals, are shareholders, and are trying to cut down the claims of the tenants for the tenant right upon their lands to be taken for said Railway; whether the Government think it right to appoint a land agent circumstanced as Mr. Murphy is, and a well-known active political partisan to the office of Government arbitrator, before whom questions affecting landlord and tenant frequently arise; whether it is a fact that the said Government arbitrator is or was an Orangeman, and whether he was appointed through party influence by the Board of Works at the instance of one of the Commissioners sent to inquire into the state of the said Board of Works, and about the time when said inquiry was held; whether this same son, or any other son, of Mr. Edmund Murphy, who deposed to being his father's active political agent in canvassing the county Down tenants, is, or was, an Orangeman; and, if he does not hold, and does not his father also hold, the office of Inspector of Land Improvements under the Board of Works; and, whether they are not both officially engaged reporting upon the Government loans to landlords, to whom one or both act as agents in their private capacities?

MR. OTWAY: Before the noble Lord answers that Question, I beg to ask your opinion whether it is in Order—whether it is not a great abuse of the Rules of the House—that a Member should give Notice of one Question, and then put nine distinct Questions, and should read them at full after having read them once before?

MR. SPEAKER: In reply to the Question put to me by the hon. Member, I have to state that the matter is not so much one of Order as of propriety. I consider that the hon. Member, in reading the Question of which he has given Notice, was, strictly speaking, not out of Order. With regard to the propriety of his doing so I give no opinion.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: I have made inquiry into—

MR. PARNELL: I beg to rise to Order. I wish to know if, until the present Session, it was not always the universal custom in this House to read Questions at full length, of which you, Sir, had permitted the placing on the Notice Paper of the House; and whether it was not usual, when Members attempted to avoid reading Questions of which they had given Notice, for Members of the House to insist on the reading of them at full length?

MR. CALLAN: I wish to know whether it was not the custom, Sir, when you were a Member of the House, and before you occupied your present position, not to read Questions unless they were of sufficient importance to commend themselves to the good taste and feeling of the House; and whether or not the bad practice of reading Questions was not initiated during the régime of the late Conservative Government, when they insisted that Questions should be read, for the purpose of occupying the time of the House, no matter how immaterial they were?

MR. SPEAKER: In answer to the hon. Member for the City of Cork, I have to say, as I have already stated to the House, that it was formerly the practice for Members to read their Questions, and that practice has generally prevailed down to the present day. But I am bound to say that latterly the practice has prevailed of putting Questions at such extraordinary length that I am inclined to think the House will do well to depart from it.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: I have made inquiry into the various allegations contained in the Question of the hon. Member; and without following him into all the details, I may say, generally, that I am satisfied that there is no ground whatever for supposing that the appointment of Mr. Murphy or his son was influenced by political or any other motive except regard for the public advantage. Mr. Murphy has for many years been engaged as a Land Improvement Inspector under the Board, and has been employed, from time to time, to act as arbitrator solely on account of his special qualifications for the duty, which are well known to the Board of Works, and have been also certified, among other persons, by one of the Committee which inquired into the Department of the Board of Works. Whether his connections are such as are described by the hon. Member the Board of Works have no knowledge, nor have they ever inquired into his political opinions.

MR. FINIGAN: As the answer of the noble Lord is by no means satisfactory, and this is a most important question, I beg to give Notice that on an early day I will repeat my Question, with more details.

PORTUGAL—COLLISION OF THE "CITY OF MECCA" AND THE "INSULANO."

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs,

Mr. Callan

If his attention has been drawn to the confirmation by the Supreme Court at Lisbon of the decisions of the Inferior Courts in the case of the collision between the "City of Mecca" and the "Insulano;" if those decisions were arrived at either by ignoring altogether the 14th (Portuguese 15th) rule of the International Sailing Code, or by adopting an interpretation contrary to that of the Portuguese Government, as explained in a declaration by the King, issued since the collision, through the Secretary of State for Maritime Affairs; and, what steps Her Majesty's Government now propose to take to remedy the great injustice inflicted on a British shipowner by this decision?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The litigation at Lisbon arising out of this collision has extended over a period of two years, and has throughout received the careful attention of Her Majesty's Government, who are in possession of copies of the judgments referred to. The decisions arrived at have given rise to questions of great importance, both as regards jurisdiction and the application of the international rules for the prevention of collisions at sea. Her Majesty's Government addressed representations to the Portuguese Government on the subject through Her Majesty's Minister at Lisbon in January last; but no reply has yet been received. Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires was instructed last week to press for an answer to that communication; and until it has been received Her Majesty's Government will not be in a position to state what further steps it may be their duty to take in the matter.

IRELAND—DRAINAGE WORKS, KILLALOE.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, From what cause the delay has arisen in commencing the Shannon drainage works at Killaloe?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH, in reply, said, that the cause of the delay in putting in the sluices in the weir at Killaloe had been the difficulty of obtaining tenders in the desired form. It had now been decided to execute the local work by day-work under an engineer to be appointed by the Board of Works, and to obtain the ironwork by contract, a tender for which had been received. The works would now be begun as soon as possible.

DISTRESS (IRELAND)—FEVER AT BALLINA.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has observed that the Rev. P. McNulty, Catholic administrator of the parish of Ballina, informed the Ballina Board of Guardians, at their meeting of the 17th ult. of the existence of thirty cases of fever in one district of the Union, and assured the Board that the fever had made its appearance in every case in families which had been obliged to subsist for a long time on Indian meal, used without milk; that this diet had resulted in dropsy and phthisis, as well as fever, and that a change of diet is necessary if the epidemic is to be abated; whether it appears, from the statement of the Rev. P. McNulty, that the fever had been active in the district in question for a very considerable time; that, nevertheless, its existence there was not known to the Board of Guardians until he informed them of it, and that many of those stricken by fever had neither food, bed clothing, nor any common necessary of life; and, whether, considering the number of districts from which fever has been reported, the danger of a further spread of the epidemic, and the evident inadequacy of the ordinary agencies of the Poor Law system to deal with the present and probable state of things, the Government will specially instruct the Board of Guardians, and will take steps to strengthen the relieving staffs, increase the number of medical officers, and appoint competent nurses to attend upon the sick in localities where such assistance may be needful?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Before the Rev. Mr. McNulty communicated with the Board the Ballina Guardians had heard that fever had made its appearance in one division of the Union, situated in the Ballina Dispensary District. They directed their medical officer to pay all his attention to the cases, and they also sent out a nurse. The medical officer reported to-day there are only four cases treated in this district for simple fever, and two of rheumatic fever, and one family convalescent. The means adopted by the Local Government Board have, I am happy to say, been very successful in checking disease in the district in which it prevailed. I cannot admit that the Poor Law machinery has been inadequate to deal with the present state of things. If it should be necessary, in any Union, the Local Government Board will issue a Provisional Order to enable the Board of Guardians to strengthen their medical staff.

ARMY—RE-ENLISTMENTS.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Secretary of State for War, Under what regulation men who enlisted in 1858-9 for ten years (not exceeding twelve), and subsequently re-engaged to complete a total service of twenty-one years, have been retained for an extra year; and, whether there are any men now retained beyond the period of twenty-one years amongst the troops serving in Afghanistan?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that any man who enlisted in 1858-9, and who re-engaged before the 21st of June, 1867, might, if on foreign service, have his service prolonged for two years. If he re-engaged after the 21st of June, 1867, his service may similarly be prolonged for one year. This latter provision is continued by the Army Discipline Act of 1879. There is no information in the War Office to enable me to answer the second Question.

COMPENSATION FOR DISTURBANCE (IRELAND) BILL—PROTECTION TO POOR CULTIVATORS.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What steps the Government now propose to take for the protection of poor cultivators of the soil in Ireland who may be evicted for an inability to pay rent, caused by the recent and prevailing distress in that country?

MR. PARNELL also wished to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in view of the rejection by the House of Lords of the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill, he proposes to employ the Constabulary and Military Forces of the Queen for the purpose of assisting at the eviction of tenants who can be proved to be unable to pay their rents owing to the recent distress in Ireland?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, it will be convenient to answer these two Questions together, as they both relate to the rejection last Tuesday by the House of Lords of the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill. The hon. Member for Dungarvan asks me what steps we now propose to take for the protection of poor cultivators of the soil in Ireland who may be evicted for an inability to pay rent caused by the recent and prevailing distress in that country? The object of the Bill passed by this House was to protect such tenants upon the fulfilment of conditions to which I need not now refer. The House of Lords have thought it right to reject that Bill. Though we deeply regret their decision, I must reply that, after careful consideration, the Government does not think it would be to the public advantage to bring in any fresh Bill on the subject this Session. The hon. Member for the City of Cork asks me whether we propose to employ the Constabulary and Military for the purpose of assisting at the eviction of tenants who can be proved to be unable to pay their rents owing to the recent distress in Ireland? I trust there will be no need to call in the aid of the Military for any purpose in Ireland; but it is my duty to state that we shall protect the officers of the Courts of Law in the execution of the law. We must enable the law to be carried out, or society would be disorganized altogether; but I can assure the House that we shall strive to fulfil our duty in this respect with the utmost consideration for the sufferings of these poor tenants. I earnestly hope that the expectation of a plentiful harvest will not be disappointed, and that thereby the sufferings of the people will be alleviated, and the difficulties of the Irish Government diminished. These difficulties are great; and I can only call upon all Members of this House—upon all Members of either House of Parliament, upon all good citizens, of whatever class, party, or condition—to try to realize to themselves these difficulties, and to aid us in the maintenance in Ireland of good order and good feeling, and to use any influence they may have in Ireland to counsel moderation by the landlords in the exercise of their legal rights, and to beg the landlords to remember—as I doubt not the large majority of them will remember—the condition of many of their tenantry.

Mr. Parnell

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS—THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. VILLIERS-STUART asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Her Majesty's Government are willing to extend the scope of inquiry of the Royal Agricultural Commission to the subject of Irish farm labourers' dwellings, with the view of ascertaining the best means of promoting their improvement?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The hon. Gentleman's Question refers to the Royal Commission appointed a year or two ago. The Government could not now very well, as it has been sitting so long, impose on it any fresh labour. Information on this subject can be had, I think, by other inquiries.

RAILWAYS (IRELAND) — THE GREAT SOUTHERN AND WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY OF IRELAND AND THE WATERFORD AND LIMERICK RAILWAY COMPANY.

MR. GIBSON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Why the Railway Commissioners do not hold the inquiry into the pending differences between the Great South Western Railway Company of Ireland and the Waterford and Limerick Railway Company in Ireland; what has caused them to abandon the intention of holding the inquiry in Ireland; and, can he suggest any public advantage which is gained by holding the inquiry in London, and thus compelling two Irish Railway Companies to bring over from Ireland some of their leading officials?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, he could not see that any public advantage would be gained by holding the inquiry in London instead of on the spot. On the contrary, he thought it was clearly a case contemplated by the Legislature in which it was desirable that the inquiry to be held should be local. He understood that the Railway Commissioners in the present instance were willing, and had made arrangements, to hold the inquiry on the spot; but that at the request of the parties interested they proposed to hold the inquiry in London.

MR. GIBSON asked if the request could be made public?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, if the right hon. and learned Gentleman wished, he would inquire whether the request had been made verbally or by letter; but he was informed by the Railway Commissioners that the request had been made.

MR. CALLAN gave Notice that on Monday next he would ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he was aware that, when last year the powers of the Railway Commissioners were renewed, it was on the express condition that when cases of complaint occurred in Ireland inquiry was to be made in that country?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, no doubt, some statement of the kind had been made, and he thought himself it was desirable the inquiry should be made in the locality; and it was only decided to hear the case in London on account of the request of the litigants themselves.

THE LUNACY LAWS—LEGISLATION.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, as indicated in Her Majesty's Speech, the Lunacy Laws do not require amendment; whether it is the intention of Government to introduce a measure next Session for amending these Laws; and, whether the Government will during the Recess institute a full and searching inquiry into the system and working of these Laws, by a Royal Commission or otherwise, in order that, with the view of satisfactory legislation, the fullest possible information on the subject may be before Parliament?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, there could be no doubt that the Lunacy Laws required amendment; but he thought it would be very imprudent to pledge Her Majesty's Government to introduce a measure on that subject next Session. There was already ample information available in order to supply material whenever there was time to bring in a Bill on the subject.

AFGHANISTAN—THE WAR—MILITARY EXECUTIONS AT CABUL.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether he has any information as to the execution of Afghan prisoners by our troops at or in the neighbourhood of Cabul during April of this year?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, the only information he had on the subject was contained in a Report from General Stewart, which was dated the 12th of May, and inclosed a list of prisoners taken in two actions, on the 19th and the 20th of April. In the first action 12 prisoners were captured, of whom nine were released, one died in hospital, and two were shot by order of General Stewart. In the second action 14 prisoners were taken, of whom 11 were afterwards released, and three shot by order of General Stewart. In both instances the prisoners who were ordered to be shot had fired on our men when the action was over. The Report of General Stewart would be inclosed in the Papers which he hoped before long to lay on the Table of the House; but it would be presented as an unopposed Return if his hon. Friend moved for it.

NAVY—THE ROYAL MARINES—VOLUNTARY RETIREMENT.

COLONEL RUGGLES-BRISE asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is true that an officer, late a Captain in the Royal Marine Light Infantry, was refused retired pay after a service of over nineteen years; whether, by existing Order in Council, officers of the Royal Marines who joined prior to April 1870, and having less than twenty-two years' full pay service, are debarred from voluntarily retiring with either an annuity or a gratuity, notwithstanding, under the same Order in Council, they became subject to compulsory retirement at the age of forty-two; and, whether this officer, if he had been serving in the Army, would have been entitled to an annuity or gratuity; and, if so, the amount?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: It is quite true that the Admiralty, on a recent occasion, refused retired pay to an officer who desired voluntarily to retire from the Marine Infantry for family reasons after 19 years' service. The Admiralty had no power to do otherwise under the existing Orders in Council. By remaining in the Service two years longer this officer would probably have been compulsorily retired under the Order in Council of 1878, or he might have retired voluntarily under a previous Order with retired pay. The rule of the Army is different; an officer voluntarily retiring with the consent of the War Office would receive a gratuity varying according to his length of service. On the other hand, the retired pay for Marine officers at the age of 42 is much higher than that in the Army. It was the object of the Order in Council of 1878 to apply to Marine officers the same rates as in the Army; but the older officers most strongly objected to this, preferring the higher rates of the previous rule. They were, therefore, excepted from its provisions, so far as regards the amount of the retired pay, hence the inability of the Admiralty to give a pension or gratuity in the case referred to.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—EXCLUSION OF CATHOLICS.

MR. CALLAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether since the 26th of July he has been furnished with any further and more correct information regarding certain representations made to the Irish Government complaining that Catholics were excluded from the magistracy, especially in Ulster; whether his attention has been called to the statement made in a leading article in the "Belfast Morning News" of Wednesday, under the heading of "The Irish Magistracy":—

"We are in a position to state that Mr. Thomas A. Dickson, late M.P. for Dungannon, and Mr. Litton, M.P. for Tyrone, wrote a joint letter to Lord Charlemont, Lord Lieutenant of the County, submitting the names of six Liberals, Catholic and Presbyterian, as proper persons to be invested with the Commission of the Peace. To this letter Lord Charlemont did not extend the ordinary courtesy of a reply. The two gentlemen waited a month, and then interviewed Lord O'Hagan. Lord O'Hagan expressed himself anxious to carry out the wishes of the deputation; but what could he do? He was powerless to act except on the recommendation of the Lord Lieutenant of the County. These two gentlemen, however, handed to Lord O'Hagan a list of the names they had forwarded to Lord Charlemont; and the Lord Chancellor undertook to use whatever influence he was capable of to have effect given to their desires. We understand, furthermore, that deputations have waited on the Lord Chancellor from the Counties of Antrim and Armagh, and from other Ulster counties, touching the vastly undue proportion of Protestant Episcopalian magistrates on the bench; and yet nothing is being done;" whether he will inform the House if this statement is a correct version of the communications made to, and the interviews had with, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland with reference to this matter; and, whether the alleged statement of the Lord Chancellor "that he was powerless to act except on the recommendation of the Lord Lieutenant of the County," is a correct statement of the Law on the subject; and, if so, will he kindly inform the House by what authority then Lord Chancellor O'Hagan on a former occasion, not only without the recommendation of, but in opposition to the declared wish of the Lord Lieutenant of the County, appointed a non-resident Non-Catholic gentleman to the Commission of the Peace?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The hon. Member asks me as to an article which appeared in The Belfast Morning News. This article professes to give an account of a private interview between the Lord Chancellor and two gentlemen. No reporters were present. I really do not know that I am called upon to give an explanation with regard to such a statement as this; but I may state that the Lord Chancellor has informed me he never made such a statement as that quoted.

MR. CALLAN gave Notice that on Monday he would ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether, at the time he made a statement to him in that House that no representations complaining of the exclusion of Catholics from the Irish magistracy had been made, he himself had received representations from leading Catholics in the North of Ireland?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: No, Sir; I had not.

MR. CALLAN wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he had received representations from any solicitor upon the subject?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: It is entirely new to me.

SOUTH AFRICA—BASUTOLAND.

MR. GIBSON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the proclamation of Sir Bartle Frere, extending the operation of the South African Peace Proclamation Act to Basutoland, is now in force and being applied; and, whether that proclamation was issued in pursuance of and in accordance with the provisions of the South African Peace Preservation Act?

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

MR. GRANT DUFF: The Cape Peace Preservation Act of 1878 was applied to Basutoland by a Proclamation which was issued on the 6th day of April, and is now in force. As many Questions have been asked about this subject, I may mention that on the 29th of July the Governor telegraphed from the Cape that large quantities of arms were being given up, and that a telegram received yesterday reports that there was no fresh cause for anxiety.

RULES AND ORDERS OF THIS HOUSE— ALTERATION OF QUESTIONS.

THE O'DONOGHUE, who had given Notice of a Question on this subject, hoped he might be permitted to say that his Question did not appear in the form in which he gave Notice of it. He wished to be informed by the Speaker whether it was competent for any Clerk of the House in any case to deal with a Question without submitting it to the Speaker, and if he did so, whether that was not a serious violation of the privileges of the House? On coming to the House he said it would be his duty to communicate to the Speaker that his Question had been altered, that he could not acquiesce in the omission that had been made, inasmuch as the omitted portion related to facts about which there could be no dispute whatever, and had an important bearing on his Question. The House would notice that his Question referred to the eviction of a tenant by the Rev. Mr. Bland; and the part which the Clerk had thought fit to draw his pen through was this—

"That the Government valuation of the tenant's holding was £18, while his rent was £36—that is 100 per cent over the Government valuation."

Having stated that, he would read his Question, and he hoped to obtain the Speaker's ruling on the point which he had raised. The hon. Member then read his Question as follows:—

"If, in the case of the eviction of a tenant where the relieving officer has not received from the landlord notice of his intention to evict, it is obligatory upon the board of guardians of the union in which the eviction took place, upon being made aware of the fact, to proceed against the landlord for not complying with the requirements of the law; and, if so, whether he will see that the Killarney board of guardians institutes proceedings against the Venerable Archdeacon Bland, of Knockane, near Killarney, who neglected to give the relieving officer the necessary notice on the eviction of John M'Mahon, a tenant who only owed a gale's rent and the running gale; and, if he is aware that this is not the first time the Venerable Archdeacon Bland has omitted to communicate with the relieving officer when evicting his tenants."

MR. SPEAKER said, with regard to the point of Order raised by the hon. Gentleman, he had to point out to him and the House that one of the Rules applying to all Questions put to Members of the Government was that there should be no argument, or opinion, or any fact stated by the hon. Member putting a Question, except in so far as was necessary to explain such Question. Now, the fact stated in the portion of the hon. Member's Question which had been struck out was not necessary to the clear understanding of the Question, and it also advanced an opinion. Therefore, that part of the Question was out of Order; and it was properly struck out, in pursuance of the Order of the House applying to Questions.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had received no Notice of this Question till it appeared that morning, and therefore he was unable to do more than to state that he had written to make inquiry into the matter. He was aware that a similar omission to that referred to had been previously made by Archdeacon Bland; but, with regard to the law, the landlord was bound by Act of Parliament to give notice to the relieving officer of any writ, decree, or process for taking possession of land on which there was a dwelling-house, and he was liable to a penalty of £20 if he omitted to serve such notice. As far as he could learn, the enforcement of the law rested on the Board of Guardians. As far as the Government were concerned, he had to state that the Constabulary, when reporting evictions to the Government, reported whether due notice had been served on the relieving officer or not; and in all cases in which such notices were served, they were communicated to the authorities and the necessary steps taken.

AFGHANISTAN—RE-INFORCEMENTS TO CANDAHAR.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked, Whether the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India could inform the House in what time the reliefs were likely to reach Candahar?

M

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Does the hon. Gentleman refer to the reinforcements under General Phayre?

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: Yes.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I am not able to state exactly the time, nor do I think it would be expedient to state it even if I could.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—THE IRISH ESTIMATES.

MR. PARNELL asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he could now fix a day for proceeding with the Irish Estimates; and, if not, whether he could name a day before which they would not be taken?

MR. W. E. FORSTER feared that it was not in his power to fix a day at this moment. Those Estimates would not, however, be taken before next Monday week, and he would endeavour to give a Notice that would suit the convenience of hon. Gentlemen.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS AND CORRUPT PRACTICES ACT—CORRUPT PRACTICES IN REPORTED BOROUGHES—COMMISSION OF INQUIRY.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES), in reference to a Question of which Notice had been given by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope) with regard to the day on which the question of the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the corrupt practices reported to have prevailed extensively in certain boroughs would be brought before the House, said, he had consulted with his noble Friend the Secretary to the Treasury on the subject, and the only promise he could obtain from his noble Friend was that he would give him the earliest possible day for that purpose which the state of Public Business would afford.

DISTRESS (IRELAND)—EMIGRATION.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether there was any fund available to assist emigration from the distressed districts in Ireland; and, if there was such a fund, by whom it was administered?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that was rather an important Question to be put without Notice; but he thought he was right in stating that Boards of Guardians had, under certain conditions, power to use the rates to assist emigration. He was not aware that there was any other fund for that purpose.

ARMENIA, ASIA MINOR, AND SYRIA—THE DEBATE—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. BOURKE said, that the House would, perhaps, allow him to make a short personal explanation with regard to an incident which arose in the debate which took place in respect to Armenia on Friday week. He had stated, on the day before yesterday, that it was not his wish to bring on that subject in the absence of the Prime Minister; but the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India intimated that it would be convenient for the Government, if he thought it necessary to do so, for him to bring on the question on some early opportunity. His hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs expressed the same opinion, remarking that it would not be necessary for either of them to allude to anything except the Papers already in the possession of the House. Therefore, he hoped that the House would indulge him for a very few moments while he made the explanation he desired to offer. The statement made by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, to which he took exception at the time, and to which he had said he would call the attention of the House on a future occasion, was that—

“The jealousy of the European Powers with reference to that Convention (the Anglo-Turkish Convention) was placed at the time on record by France, although that record was, unhappily, concealed from us.”

There were two statements contained in those words. The first was, that the jealousy of the European Powers was placed on record by France. As a matter of fact, the jealousy of the European Powers was not placed on record by France, as far as he could find, at the time. There was a despatch, no doubt, on the subject from the French Government; but that was not the question. The question was as to the jealousy of the Powers, and that he did not understand to have been placed on record by France. There was no jealousy expressed on the part of Austria, on the part of Germany, or on the part of Italy. The next statement of the Prime Minister was that, "unhappily, that record was concealed from us." He would state, very shortly, the facts with regard to the despatches. The despatches to which his hon. Friend had already alluded were contained in Paper 48, 1878, and they were substantially three documents. Their dates were respectively July 7, July 21, and August 7. They were laid on the Table of the House on August 15 with a number of other Papers, and Parliament was prorogued on the next day. Therefore, it was the intention of the Government that those despatches should be in the hands of Members as soon as possible. He had laid them on the Table before the House rose, among a great number of other Papers. He had presented about 16 different classes of Papers on that day. The consequence was, there was a vast deal of business at the Foreign Office and much printing to be done; and the ordinary course was followed in regard to all those despatches and Papers—namely, that they should be distributed to Members and the public as soon as convenient; and although it was nearly three months before the particular class of Papers alluded to were in the hands of Members, yet other classes were not published till a later date, some of them not till the following January. There was, therefore, nothing extraordinary or unusual done in respect to those despatches. They were not kept back or concealed from the public by the Government in any way whatever; and he could not understand how anybody could read them and not see that it was for the interest of the Government that they should have been made public. With respect to the statement which he (Mr. Bourke) made on a recent occasion, he would only ask the House to recollect that, at the time, he had had no means of consulting any document, and that it was made on the spur of the moment. What he then said was that—"He had heard with much surprise the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that the Anglo-Turkish Convention had aroused the jealousy of France, and that the late Government had concealed from the House despatches on the subject. He was not prepared to say that there was no despatch in existence that betrayed jealousy on the part of France; but that he had no recollection of such a document, and that he should be surprised to hear of its existence."

Sir H. Drummond Wolff

He now admitted that statement was far too general; and if the despatch from M. Waddington had been in his recollection at the time, he should rather have said that though, at one time, apprehensions did exist in some quarters in France as to the probable consequences to French interests of the Anglo-Turkish Convention, yet, after the explanations had been given at Berlin which had been asked for by the French Government, there was no jealousy on the part of France, and that the relations between the two Powers were as satisfactory as ever. That would have been a more accurate description of the state of things; and he hoped that the House would allow him, as a matter of historical accuracy, to substitute these words for those which he actually used. The right hon. Gentleman having quoted several passages from M. Waddington's despatches, which he admitted to be of a strong character, said that the object of the despatch was simply to put on record the fact that there had been, in some quarters in France, a misapprehension as to the Anglo-Turkish Convention; and that explanations having been asked for and given, they were considered satisfactory. He did not think he need delay the House any longer. He thanked the House for allowing him to say so much. He could only say, in conclusion, that although it was unfortunate the Prime Minister should have used the word "conceal," it would have been better to have used the words which he had now used instead of the words which he did use at the time.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he hoped that, by the indulgence of the House, he might be allowed to say a word with regard to what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman, and he would say it, as it were, in the manner of a personal explanation on behalf of the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman had seemed to invite him to make a personal explanation of that nature on behalf of the Prime Minister, inasmuch as he had said that it was unfortunate that the Prime Minister should have made use of the word "concealed." Now, the impression which the House had derived, he thought, from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman on Friday week was very fairly stated in The Times summary of his speech, which was that—“Mr. Bourke denied altogether Mr. Gladstone's assertion that the Anglo-Turkish Convention had led to any jealousy on the part of France.”

The statement made by the Prime Minister was that—

“The jealousy of the European Powers with reference to the Convention was placed at the time on record by France, although that record was, unhappily, concealed from us.”

Those were the words which the right hon. Gentleman considered unfortunate; but they were absolutely justified by the facts. The right hon. Gentleman, on Monday last, stated that he should have brought this subject forward earlier, but for the absence of the Prime Minister; and he afterwards added that he had not brought it forward, because in the previous week he had not been able to obtain access to Papers necessary to his case. He did not know yet whether he referred to the confidential Papers, though he put the question at the time. The right hon. Gentleman had the same access to Papers which had been presented to the House as anyone else had, and he could hardly see what he meant. It was not right for him (Sir Charles W. Dilke) to make any reference to documents which the late Government thought it undesirable should be laid before the House, and he would only say, what the custom and traditions of the Office which he represented would justify him in saying, that the case which he had to present to the House would not be weakened if he went to the confidential documents. The right hon. Gentleman had not alluded to speeches which Ministers had made in the course of the debate upon the Congress of Berlin, which terminated in a division, and in which the House was informed of the then condition of the subject. No Papers relating to the views of foreign Powers upon the Anglo-Turkish Convention had at that time been laid before the House. That debate took place on the 29th and 30th of July, and the 1st of August, 1878. On the 29th of July, his noble Friend the present Secretary of State for India asked the Government as to the opinion of foreign Powers in regard to the Asia Minor Convention; and on the 30th the noble Lord the Member for

Sir Charles W. Dilke

Liverpool (Viscount Sandon) alluded to the subject, and implied that foreign Powers were favourable to the Convention. On the same day the present Prime Minister also asked the Question, and the late Home Secretary said that France was satisfied with the Convention. But, on the 1st of August, the Question was more distinctly asked than on any previous occasion by Mr. Lowe. He asked the Government to state whether France “had not expressed dissatisfaction at the Asia Minor Convention;” and the noble Lord the then Postmaster General replied that, to judge from the speeches of Members of the Opposition, there was alienation, and, in fact, exasperation, on the part of France. He said—

“I give to that statement the most unqualified and explicit denial. . . . Not a cloud has arisen. . . . We have proceeded . . . in complete harmony with the Government of France. . . . France knows that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) represents only a minority that is dwindling and dwindling every day.”—[See 3 Hansard, cxlii. 904.]

The right hon. Gentleman had just stated that at that time the objections which France had at first entertained to the Asia Minor Convention had been removed by explanations given at Berlin; but he could only say that was not the case. The Paper “Turkey, No. 48,” which the right hon. Gentleman had quoted, was dated long after any explanation which had been given at Berlin. That document, the French despatch, was dated the 21st of July, and, 12 days after it had been received, the noble Lord had said that not a cloud had arisen, and that they were in perfect harmony with France. What the Prime Minister said was that “the jealousy of the European Powers was placed on record by France.” That was an exact and accurate statement of the case. M. Waddington, on the 21st July, had written that—

“The Convention which was signed on the 4th June, and not made public until the beginning of this month, has produced a considerable sensation in all quarters” —of course, that meant in other parts of the world—and he went on to say that—

“This impression has been deeper in France than anywhere else.”

He then spoke of that which had “touched France to the very heart,” and of “the outburst of surprise and uneasiness" which had taken place in France. Twelve or 13 days after the receipt of that despatch a Cabinet Minister assured the House that no cloud had arisen, and that the Government were proceeding in complete harmony with France. He would leave to the House the appreciation of those statements. The information was, he maintained, concealed from that House, because the House was allowed to debate and to decide by a division upon the grave issues of the Congress of Berlin without this information, and in the face of the contradiction of the noble Lord the then Postmaster General. Fourteen days after the division a dummy Paper containing this despatch was laid before the House, which ultimately became "Turkey, No. 48," and which, on the 5th November, was circulated to Members. He maintained, in the face of these facts and dates, that the Prime Minister was amply justified in stating that jealousy had arisen in France. In fact, the Government kept back this despatch till the last possible moment, for the publication only preceded by two or three days the publication of the French Yellow Book in which it was contained; indeed, it would have reached this country, through the newspapers, in about the same time that the Blue Book would be in the hands of Members.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he thought it would have been more courteous, and more in accordance with the course generally taken, if the hon. Gentleman had given him some intimation of his intention to allude to the speech he had made so far back as 1878. He wished to say, however, that, having listened to the account the hon. Gentleman had given, he adhered to what he had said in 1878—that, as between the two Governments of England and France, there was at the moment he made the speech no cloud. The two Governments were acting in perfect harmony and perfect consistency; and if the hon. Gentleman wished for any proof of that statement, he would refer him to the fact that at that time the most delicate and complicated negotiations with respect to Egypt, which had since been brought to an entirely successful issue, were going on between France and England. He maintained that he was correct and justified in using the language referred to by the hon. Gentleman; and with regard to M. Waddington's statement that considerable sensation had been caused by the news of the Anglo-Turkish Convention, that did not in the least imply that there was anything but harmony between the two Governments, and was equally true of England, where, no doubt, great excitement was created.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. PARNELL gave Notice that, to-morrow, he would ask the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India and the present Leader of the House, Whether the Government could afford him facilities for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the House on the Motion of which he had given Notice respecting the Parliamentary relations between England and Ireland?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: In accordance with the Notice I gave the other day, I rise to move—

"That the Orders of the Day subsequent to the Employers' Liability Bill be postponed until after the Notice of Motion relating to the Land Act, 1870 (Commission)."

It may be convenient for me to take this opportunity of stating, as far as I can at this moment, what arrangements we propose with regard to the Business of the House. We hope it may be possible to dispose of the Employers' Liability Bill to-night; but, if not, to proceed with it at the Morning Sitting to-morrow. If that Bill is finished to-night, we propose to go on to-morrow morning with the Post Office Money Orders Bill, the Merchant Shipping (Grain Cargoes) Bill, the Census Bill, and with other Business of minor importance. If it should be necessary to proceed with the Employers' Liability Bill to-morrow, and we cannot make any progress with the measures I have mentioned, I hope the House will give us a Sitting on Saturday, for the purpose of making some progress with those measures which are not of general interest to the great body of the House. On Monday we propose to proceed with Supply, and we shall ask the House to go into Committee on the Hares and Rabbits Bill on Tuesday next. It will be necessary; I am afraid, to postpone once more the consideration of the Indian Financial Statement. I am aware that, in ordinary circumstances, it is very desirable that that Statement should be made before quite the close of the Session; but the House, I hope, will bear in mind, not only the exceptional position of its own Business, but the exceptional circumstances that exist with respect to Indian finance. Besides, there may, possibly, be some advantage in deferring the consideration of affairs of which we are even now without complete knowledge. Our further arrangements must, of course, depend on the progress made during this week and the next with the Bills I have named. With regard to another matter, I wish to make an appeal to the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett), who has a Motion for to-morrow evening on the affairs of Afghanistan. It was observed during the conversation on the count-out on Friday last that Members of the Government, when the discussion of a particular subject was inconvenient to them, ought to appeal to hon. Members themselves not to introduce those topics. I have no hesitation in appealing to the hon. Member on this matter, and in saying that the present time would be inconvenient for the discussion of affairs in Afghanistan, and especially of the point to which he proposes to call attention. I am sorry that it would be almost impossible for me at present to make any statement as to the condition of affairs in that country. I will answer the Question of the hon. Member for Cork to-morrow.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Orders of the Day subsequent to the Employers' Liability Bill be postponed until after the Notice of Motion relating to the Land Act, 1870 (Commission)."—(The Marquess of Hartington.)

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, after the appeal of the noble Lord, he should, of course, not think of pursuing any other course than that of withdrawing his Motion. As for the count-out on Friday evening, whatever might be the proper course for the Government, it could not be usual for one of the Secretaries to the Treasury to endeavour to induce hon. Members who were already in the House to leave it, as had been openly done on that occasion.

MR. ROBERTS said, he was not prepared to oppose the Motion, or in any way to interfere with the concession which it proposed to make to the Irish

Members; but he thought it rather hard that they could not get five minutes of Government time to push through its final stages a measure which had the support of a large majority in the House, and which was supported by 29 out of the 30 Welsh Members. He referred to the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Wales) Bill. He appealed more strongly to the noble Lord, as he himself had for many years been a Welsh Member, and at the late Election a safe seat in Wales was reserved for him, until he had fought and won a more important, though not more worthy, constituency in Lancashire.

MR. RICHARD said, it was rather dangerous to suggest to the Welsh Members that the only way they could get the claims of their country attended to was by a system of Obstruction. There were dangerous possibilities in the Welsh character. If the Welsh Members did not habitually obtrude themselves upon the House, it was not from incapacity to talk. Seeing the unanimity of feeling on the subject of Sunday closing in the Principality, he appealed to the Government to give them an opportunity of proceeding with their Bill.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that after the answer of the noble Lord, there was very little hope of a satisfactory answer in reference to the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Bill. If it was in the power of the Government to afford facilities for a discussion on the second reading, he trusted that this might be afforded. He thought the Scotch Members would be very glad to take advantage of the Saturday Sitting.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he should have assented to the postponement sine die of the discussion on the Indian Budget if the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India were awaiting information from India of a character of much importance. If this were not so, it was most desirable, before Members began to disperse, that the discussion on the Budget should be taken, before Bills, which the Government admitted were not of equal importance, were dealt with. He appealed to the noble Marquess to give them an assurance that he would make his Financial Statement in the course of next week.

MR. DILLWYN remarked, that the Welsh were enthusiastically in favour of the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Wales) Bill, and he hoped that facilities would be given for a discussion upon it.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE appreciated the difficulties which surrounded the Government, though he did not sympathize with them. But the Government were free to state when they intended to take the first stage of measures not yet before the House. Among them was one of considerable interest and importance, the Ballot Continuance Act. The introduction of this Bill was in the power of the Government, while they were bound to give sufficient time for its later stages, so as to enable a question of so much interest to be adequately considered; and he would be glad to hear of any morning, any night, or any day, in short, in any week, on which the Government proposed to bring it in.

MR. COURTNEY also deprecated the postponement of the Indian Budget indefinitely. He was a strong supporter of the Hares and Rabbits Bill; but he would willingly sacrifice a day's discussion of that measure to the consideration of our Indian finances. He was at a loss to understand the reasons alleged for the delay. It was impossible to get full and complete information from India before the close of the Session; but the Government had already had sufficiently definite information to enable them to make a statement on the subject, so that the question might be discussed as to the duty of this country to assist India in the cost of the Afghan War. The proper consideration of that question was necessary not merely to fulfil their duty, but for the honour of that Assembly.

MR. STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: While we on this side of the House are naturally desirous of assisting the Government, as far as we can, with Public Business at this period of the Session, we cannot but feel that it is inconvenient to fix a particular hour for the close of a discussion in Committee, in order that a particular Motion may be taken, which I do not understand the Government intend to agree to. It might be arranged that the House should meet at 3, in order, if possible, to finish the Committee on the Employers' Liability Bill at one Sitting. With regard to the Saturday Sitting, I think we ought to be told clearly what Business it is proposed then to take. A Saturday Sitting is never very convenient; but the House would probably not be indisposed to take that step for the furtherance of what may be described as Business of a non-contentious character, such as the Post Office Savings Bank, or the Census Bill.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD urged the claim of the Welsh Members to have the measure brought forward in which they were interested.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Although I have no right to address the House, perhaps I may be allowed to say a few words in reply to the appeals and arguments which have been addressed to me. My hon. Friends from the Principality of Wales will remember that, not long ago, the Prime Minister answered an appeal made to him on the subject of the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Wales) Bill, by pointing out the difficulties which lay in the way of the Government preventing them promising to afford assistance for the consideration of the Bill during the present Session. The state of Public Business has not advanced since then. At that time my right hon. Friend expressed his hope and a strong desire that the Government should be able in the next Session to afford facilities for the consideration of this Bill as that afforded to Irish Members on the occasion of the passing of the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill. The matter will receive the consideration of the Government; but I do not think it would be possible, at this period of the Session, to make any reply as to this subject beyond that made a short time ago. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope), and my hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), seem to have understood me to say that it was my intention to postpone sine die the Indian Financial Statement; but I have, I can assure them, no such wish. On the contrary, although I do not think it possible, until we see what progress is made this week, to name any day for taking the Budget, yet I am most anxious to bring it forward. Every mail that arrives from India will, probably, bring additional means of arriving at a comparatively clear idea as to the financial state of that country. We have made some inquiries with respect to it, partly by telegraph and partly by despatches, and the replies which we have received by telegraph are not altogether clear; but, as I have said, we expect that every mail may make the situation more clear. Therefore, it is not simply with the hope of "something turning up" adding to our information, but for a definite reason that the postponement is asked for. I fear that, in any circumstances, the Financial Statement this year must be very imperfect and unsatisfactory; and I quite admit that it is desirable that hon. Members who desire to discuss the financial position of India should have that opportunity afforded them as soon as possible. I can assure them that there shall be no intentional or indefinite delay, so that they may have that opportunity. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) put a Question to me about the Ballot Bill; and I may inform him that provision to prolong the Ballot Act has been already introduced in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill. It appears to me undesirable that the House should be invited to consider until next year the Ballot Bill, as well as the other Acts regulating elections. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) pointed out that it is not very convenient to interrupt our proceedings in Committee this evening as is proposed, and I regret that the Government are under the necessity of doing so; but we have thought the Motion of the hon. Member for Longford deserving of discussion, and as we have nearly the whole time for Business at our disposal, we felt that the hon. Gentleman had some claim on us to give him facilities for bringing the Motion on. Having agreed to do so, the time given must be either at the beginning or at the end of a Sitting, and we are of opinion that the proposal which we made was, on the whole, the best. I may add that the practice of taking non-contentious Business only on Saturday has not always been followed by the late Government, for they put down measures such as the Army Mutiny Bill for that day.

MR. GIBSON observed, that they had not been told that the Government were going to take nothing but Government Business on Saturday.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN understood that the Government pledged themselves to give next year the same facilities for the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Wales) Bill as had been given for the similar measure which had been brought forward in the case of Ireland. He would also like to hear whether there was any probability of the Burials Bill being taken, in which measure the Welsh people were also greatly interested.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL expressed his surprise at the remarks which had fallen from the noble Marquess with respect to the Ballot Act. At the commencement of the Session they stated that that Act would be dealt with in a separate Bill; but some time after the Prime Minister said that it was intended to deal with the Ballot temporarily by means of a separate Continuance Act. That announcement was not altogether satisfactory to many hon. Members on both sides of the House; but, still, they thought that an opportunity for a debate on the Ballot would be given; and he himself, about a fortnight ago, gave Notice of a Motion which he intended to make when the Continuance Bill came on for discussion. Further, he had taken an opportunity to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who of the Ministers would have charge of the Bill; and the reply of the hon. Gentleman was that he would have charge of the Bill, and that he would give due Notice of its introduction. But now, without one word of Notice, in a most extraordinary manner — ["Oh!"] — if that was the way in which hon. Gentlemen opposite thought the Public Business ought to be conducted, he begged to remind them that the course which they deemed it right to pursue might give rise to counter proceedings of a similar nature. He repeated, in a most extraordinary manner, the Government intimated that the Ballot Act would be included in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill, in direct opposition to the pledges they had given. He would merely add that, under the circumstances, he would take every possible opportunity for preventing the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill from passing into law.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT thought the grievance of which the noble Lord complained was purely imaginary. He would have the same right to discuss the terms of his Motion when the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill was introduced as he would if a Continuance Bill had been brought in instead. He himself had understood the Prime Minister to say, speaking in a colloquial manner, that the Bill to be brought forward would be an ordinary Continuance Bill, and not a separate measure. It had become necessary to continue the law, and he had never heard of the necessity for a second Bill. As to there having been any pledge to have a separate Continuance Bill, he knew of no instance in which this had been given.

The Marquess of Hartington

MR. J. R. YORKE said, he had, ever since the beginning of the Session, been anxious to bring before the House a subject in connection with the Corrupt Practices Bill, and had endeavoured to engage the attention of the House with respect to it. He was, however, informed by the Prime Minister that the time at which he was about to bring the matter before the House was somewhat inopportune; but that it would be open to him to bring it forward later in the Session. That opportunity, he thought, would have arisen when the Ballot Act Continuance Bill was introduced; but under the arrangement which it was now proposed by the Government to make he should be placed completely at a disadvantage.

MR. MUNDELLA said, with reference to the Question put by the hon. Member behind (Sir Edward Colebrooke) as to the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Bill, that he regretted that he was not in a position to indicate the day when it would be taken; but he hoped it would be taken some day next week, and he would, as early as possible, give Notice of the day.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT was exceedingly disappointed at the statement of the Secretary of State for India with regard to the Business of the House. He had been in great hopes that they would have heard what Bills the Government intended to drop. He thought that on the 5th of August, with the enormous amount of Supply still to be granted, and the Indian Budget to be discussed, as also the proportion of money which was to be paid by this country and India on account of the Afghan War, he was only expressing the wishes of both sides of the House in saying that he hoped the Government would make known on Monday what Bills they did not intend to press forward this Session.

MR. OTWAY greatly regretted that the discussion on Indian finance had again been postponed; but he accepted the reasons given by the Government as satisfactory. The Prime Minister—whom he sincerely trusted they might see in his place this Session—at the opening of Parliament, informed them that there were two questions pending of a European character, one of which was a burning question. Now, nothing had transpired since that statement was made to detract from the importance of one of these questions, and, so far from its diminishing, it had increased in importance. He believed that, at this moment, the state of Europe, and the part that this country was taking, were such that it was indispensable to consider them; and it would be most improper for Parliament to separate without a full discussion of the foreign affairs in which Her Majesty's Government were taking so prominent a share. It was impossible, after the rumours which were reaching them day by day of the intention of the Government to commit the folly of proceeding, by naval force, to compel an independent Power to take a certain course, to allow the Session to close without giving the Government an opportunity of denying or of confirming those rumours. No allusion had been made to that all-important subject in the programme of Business which had been announced; and no statement had been made that an opportunity would be afforded to the House of discussing it, deeply though the interests of the country were involved in it. He should, therefore, on Monday appeal to the noble Lord to inform them on what day Papers would be laid on the Table, or by what other means an opportunity would be given to that House to elicit information and discuss these matters.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR protested against the proposal that had been made—that the House should sit on Saturday. Before the Government took a Saturday Sitting they should show that they were willing to proceed with the Business in a regular way. But they were going to allow a discussion to come on to-night as to the Irish Land Commission which they knew must be barren, as the Chief Secretary for Ireland had announced that he did not intend to alter it. A Saturday Sitting should only be allowed if there was some exceptional Bill which must be passed before the end of the Session. The truth was, the Government were going upon two different views as to the Business of the House. They sometimes talked as if they were going to sit till the end of October, and sometimes as if the Session were soon to be brought to a conclusion. Personally, he had no objection to sit as long as the Government might wish; but, if their labours were really to be prolonged for any length of time, it would be obviously unfair to treat the 5th of August as the end of the Session. If that date was to be treated as the middle of the Session, Business should be conducted in the ordinary manner; but if the Government intended to treat it as marking the close of the Session, the House ought, without delay, to be told what Bills the Government desired to pass. As to the Ballot Act, the complaint of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had not been met by the Home Secretary. He hoped the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would make a statement in reference to the pledge which his noble Friend believed he had given.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had told the noble Lord that he would give him Notice when the Ballot Act would be brought forward; but he was not in a position which gave him a knowledge of the intentions of the Government, nor had he any part in the settling of those matters. The Ballot Act did not come within the province of his Department; and the noble Lord was not, therefore, justified in the statement he had made.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY thought the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour) was a little premature in saying that the discussion he intended to introduce to-night would be barren. The Government might be induced to change their intentions even later than the eleventh hour. Considering the attitude of some hon. Members, he did not think the Employers' Liability Bill would suffer by the delay that his discussion would cause.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON sympathized very much with the difficulties of the Government, and also with his Welsh Friends, who had complained that they could not get on with their Bill for the closing of public-houses on Sunday. He, therefore, moved that the Order which stood 19th on the list should be excepted from the postponement of the Orders for the Day, which had been moved by the Secretary of State for India.

MR. E. J. REED seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed, after the word "Bill," to insert the words, "with the exception of Order No. 19."—(Sir Wilfrid Lawson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GORST joined the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour) in protesting against all the Orders being postponed for the purpose of bringing on a barren discussion. He would oppose a Saturday Sitting. After the arduous work of the week it was impossible for hon. Members to deal with the legislation in a manner in which it ought to be dealt with. If the Government were determined to pass all the measures on the Paper—and he hoped they were determined to pass them—they must make up their minds to a protracted Session, and to take the Bills in fair course. He was ready to sit till the end of September if necessary, and he did not wish to hurry through the Business in an improper manner. For this reason he thought the conduct of the Government with reference to the Ballot Act was deserving of the most serious reprehension of the House. It was understood that an opportunity would be given to consider the election law of the country; and it ill became the Government, after the revelations in the course of the trial of Election Petitions in connection with boroughs for which Cabinet Ministers had been candidates—he was particularly referring to Oxford, where it had just been reported that extensive corrupt practices had prevailed on both sides. He was not saying this for the purpose of making any personal reproach against any Member of the Government, nor upon any single Member of the Liberal Party opposite; because he believed that 99 candidates out of 100 did the utmost within their power, even in the most corrupt elections, to stop corrupt practices; but he made the remark because, such things having taken place, it did not become the Government to smuggle the Ballot

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Act through the House in the form of a Continuance Bill.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the time of the House was being wasted. The hon. and learned Member was confusing the Corrupt Practices Act with the Ballot Act.

MR. WARTON said, that, notwithstanding the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, the Prime Minister had most distinctly and unequivocally promised to deal this Session with the Ballot Act. He thought, therefore, that the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) was quite justified in the remarks which he had made. He thought, if the Session was to be prolonged, India ought to receive fuller consideration than it had. There had been postponement after postponement of the Indian Budget, and it was a great reproach to the House that India received so little attention. He greatly admired the Postmaster General for the warm interest he had always taken in Indian affairs. They were, in his opinion, far more important than the trumpery Bill with reference to Ireland which the Government had brought forward. But it appeared the Government cared more for hares and rabbits than they did for India.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON appealed to his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle not to press his Amendment. It was impossible for him to go beyond what he had already stated to the House. It would not be fair to the House and to the other Members who had Business on the Paper to postpone all the Orders in order to bring forward one particular private Member's Bill out of its place. He could not make any further announcement until he knew what progress was made with the Public Business this week. He trusted this discussion might now terminate.

SIR ROBERT CUNLIFFE hoped that his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle would accede to the suggestion of the noble Lord.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put.

Ordered, That the Orders of the Day subsequent to the Employers' Liability Bill be postponed until after the Notice of Motion relating to the Land Act 1870 (Commission).

ORDER OF THE DAY.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY (re-committed) BILL.—[BILL 209.]

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Brassey.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 4th August.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 13, to leave out from the word "in," to the word "injury," in line 14, both inclusive.—(Mr. Bryce.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'In any case where the workman,' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had stated that he believed it was necessary that that sub-section should be retained. The words of the sub-section would not, if retained, alter in any way the Common Law, because a workman who brought an action under those circumstances would not be able to recover compensation. But since the discussion of the previous day, he had had an opportunity of considering the matter with the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill (Mr. Dodson), and they had come to the conclusion that the sub-section had better be struck out. There appeared to be no necessity for declaring the fact in that clause, that if the workman were guilty of contributory negligence he could not recover. If he were guilty of personal negligence he would be exactly in the same position if the words were struck out. The difficulty had been that which his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) had stated—namely, that which would be likely to occur if those words remained. If the words were retained, the effect would probably be that a workman would be placed in a different position to that which he would occupy if they were struck out. The consequence would probably be, in fact, that the County Court Judges would consider that the Legislature had a particular object in retaining the words, in order that the position of the workman might be changed. The effect of that was that the Committee ought to be careful to put nothing in the Bill which would be likely to give rise to litigation. It had been said that it would be a fruitful source of litigation; and it would, he believed, probably be so. He thought, with his hon. and learned Friend, that there could be no action brought by any workman to recover, by way of compensation, so as to be successful, if he had contributed by his negligence to the injury. With regard to the decisions that had been come to on the subject, he would not trouble the Committee with them, nor with the different views that had been expressed in those decisions as to the defence on the ground of contributory negligence; their object was not to alter the present state of the law upon the subject. They wished to leave the Common Law alone; and if the words were inserted, it would only be for the purpose of declaring the Common Law, and not for the purpose of carrying it further. Therefore, it seemed to them that as their object must be to prevent litigation as far as possible, and to give employers protection in cases of injury generally, they ought to prevent both strangers and servants from recovering in all cases where there had been contributory negligence. Those words, therefore, would have no effect on the existing law if they were inserted; and, inasmuch as their insertion might be misunderstood, the Government thought it was better to omit them, so as to avoid litigation as far as possible.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, that he was placed in rather a painful position when the Law Officers of the Crown said, on their responsibility, that such and such would be the effect of the retention of those words; for he knew that unless he could persuade them he could not persuade the Committee, and the words would be struck out. He protested against those words being left out, and he must appeal to his hon. and learned Friends. If his hon. and learned Friend would read the Common Law as it stood, he was quite satisfied that he would see that that Bill would alter the Common Law on that subject, and create a statutory liability. That would be construed by the Courts as being, as it really was, an alteration of the Common Law. By that Bill they were interfering with and altering the Common Law. It was to the effect that an employer should be liable for the acts of certain persons mentioned in the Bill, for whom he was not liable at present. There was no connection between that and any particular law. The Judge found nothing of the same kind already in existence. He would read the 1st clause, if he might be allowed. There was a distinct enactment—

“Where after the passing of this Act, personal injury is caused to a workman, &c., &c.”

Then a liability is to attach in the same way—

“As if the workman had not been a workman of nor in the service of the employer, nor engaged in his work.”

There was a statutory liability. They knew very well that, by the law at present, there was a certain defence to be found in the words under consideration—namely, that the man himself contributed to the injury which affected him. The Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) contained that clause, because he wished that that matter should be left perfectly clear. As he read the enactment, there was a distinct statutory liability; but he failed to see why that immunity should only be given where the accident was contributed to by the workman himself. His hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General said that the words were inoperative. If so, they could do no harm. How could they? If they were inoperative, why leave them out? He contended that they were a safety and protection to the employer, and, therefore, ought to be left in. His hon. and learned Friend said, also, that if they were left in, they would be, probably, a fruitful source of litigation. But he contended that their absence would leave a loophole, because there should always be an expressio unius—the law should be within certain well-defined limits, and those limits would not be so well defined if this sub-section were omitted. Of course, it was no use to divide the Committee upon the question, or to trouble them about it, if he failed to persuade his hon. and learned Friends the Law Officers for the Crown; but he did protest against the omission of that sub-section, which, if it remained as it was, could not possibly do any harm.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he hoped the Government would strike out the sub-section, for it appeared to him that it might be liable to misconstruction if it remained in. He could not, of course, pretend to discuss law with the hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson); but he believed that what he quoted from the end of the 1st clause was distinctly against his own argument. It said there that a workman—

"Shall have the same right to compensation and remedies against the employer as if the workmen had not been a workman of nor in the service of the employer, nor engaged in his work."

Therefore, he was placed in the condition of a stranger. But if a stranger contributed by his own negligence to injury, received from machinery or anything else, he fancied, and he said it with all deference to the hon. and learned Member, that he could not claim damages. Therefore, he was placed in that condition as regarded remedies. He trusted that the Government would strike out the sub-section for the reasons already given.

MR. MACLIVER said, after the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson), he thought they were all puzzled to know what the law was. He thought, also, that they had had rather too much law. It began last Monday night. They had then the heavy boom from the late Attorney General, followed by the sharp artillery from that side, and the small shot from below the Gangway, and it appeared to him there had been rather too much law about, especially as the speeches had been contradictory. He saw a good many Amendments were still to be disposed of, which came principally from the employers of labour, apparently; and he thought they ought to ask the Committee to deal with the proposals of the Bill calmly and deliberately, and not to interpose unnecessarily questions which might affect not only themselves but others outside their circle. A good deal had been said about mining. No doubt, that subject was beset with difficulties. When they heard the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian) talking about the grave consequences which followed upon the distress in mining, he could not help thinking that he had failed to tell them something which should be told. Mine-owners had not always borne the brunt of those accidents; and even at the present they had gone about the country seeking help to pay the families of the sufferers in accidents. He could speak, from his own experience, of having been instrumental in collecting and transmitting a large amount to South Wales to meet the calamities which had happened there, by which, he believed, mineowners had been greatly benefited. He thought, with regard to the discussion of the Bill, they ought to look more at public interests than at private.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must call the attention of the hon. Member to the fact that the Committee is discussing the omission of a sub-section. The hon. Member's remarks seem to be general, and do not appear to refer to the Question before the Committee.

MR. MACLIVER would simply say that he had intended to rise yesterday on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. Morley). He would now observe that, with regard to the Question before the Committee, he hoped as few Amendments as possible would be pressed.

MR. GIBSON said, that no one had a greater respect for the opinion of the hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) than he had; but he really did not see the objection to the course taken by the Attorney General. He thought that the protection contained in the sub-section was sufficiently preserved in the previous clauses of the Bill; and the only advantage in retaining it would be that it would operate as a reminder to the County Court Judge. He really thought that, the County Court Judges of England and Ireland being capable and intelligent men, the matter might be left to them.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he wished to call attention to one point. Lord Campbell's Act had extended the law to persons who, previously, in cases where damage was shown to have resulted partly from the negligence of a person, were not able to recover.

MR. THOMPSON said, he should like to ask the Attorney General a question. He understood that that sub-section dealt with cases where the Common Law liability existed. If so, did not the Common Law liability also apply in the 1st clause, where any defect had been shown to exist in the machinery? He understood from the hon. and learned Member for Preston (Sir John Holker) that if the Common Law liability extended in the one case, so would it in the other.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that Common Law liability existed in the case of an employer's negligence. The object of that Bill was to put workmen in the same position as strangers.

MR. RYLANDS said, that he must express his great regret at the change of opinion which had taken place on the Government Bench. He thought that the course the Government was then taking was one that justified the previous attempt to refer the matter to a Select Committee. He did not vote for that, because he did not wish to oppose the Government; but this was a Bill supposed to have received the most careful attention of the Law Officers of the Crown. At their last meeting, the Law Officers opposed that Amendment entirely. The hon. and learned Gentleman had shown a change of front that day, for which no sufficient justification had been shown. The hon. and learned Gentleman said—and no doubt it was so—that he wished the Bill to be so drawn that it might prevent litigation. But he (Mr. Rylands) wanted the Bill so drawn, that if it was the fact that no workman could get any compensation for an injury where he had contributed to it by his own negligence, in the interest of the workman that ought to appear upon the Bill, and ought not to be concealed. [Cries of "Agreed!"] He did not know what hon. Gentlemen meant. There was the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) interrupting every hon. Gentleman by crying "Agreed." Was it intended that the Bill should be discussed or not? He would not dispute the law with the Attorney General; but he thought good reason had been shown why that clause should be retained, with a view of reminding County Court Judges in the way the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) had suggested, and also with a view of reminding attorneys that workmen should not be led into litigation in consequence of something which had been concealed in the Bill, without any chance of getting compensation for injury. He would say again that he believed that when a Government, dealing with a Bill of that kind, changed so suddenly, it struck at the confidence which would otherwise be reposed in their judgment in carrying on the Business of the country.

MR. GORST said, it was very desirable that the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) should have an opportunity of expressing his views on that subject to the Committee, and he was specially desirous to listen when he appeared in the capacity of champion of the working man. He was not very often lavish in his praises of the Government; but on that particular occasion he felt bound to say that they did not deserve those epithets of change of front, &c., which the hon. Member had employed. It was really a pure question of law. The Amendment was introduced by a lawyer—the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce)—on the last occasion when the Bill was under consideration. The Attorney General said that he did not consider the words superfluous, and asked the Committee to retain the words. Some other hon. and learned Members had expressed an opinion that the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets was right, and that the words were unnecessary. He supposed the Attorney General, in the interval which elapsed between the last Sitting and the present one, had had an opportunity of having a conference with his hon. and learned Colleague, and had at leisure come to the conclusion that the words were unnecessary, and, therefore, should be struck out. He really thought that hon. Members opposite showed very little confidence in the Government, if they could not confide in the Law Officers with regard to such a simple matter as that. He would advise the great Party opposite not to prolong the discussion, but take the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown, and allow the words, which lawyers said were not necessary, to be struck out.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he would not detain the Committee more than a minute. Enough time, he thought, had been spent already with regard to that matter of contributory negligence. He certainly had held that it might be of advantage to retain those words, for reasons which had already been suggested; but when he came to reflect upon the matter he came to see that the disadvantage would really be greater than the advantage, and for this reason—the sub-section was an incomplete account of the law of contributory negligence, if they had stated part of the law, it would give rise to a discussion before the tribunals as to whether it was meant to alter the law; and, if so, to what extent, and so would lead to litigation. Therefore, although he thought that it might be advisable to keep it before the working man in that form, he felt, at the same time, that it must almost certainly give rise to controversy. Both as regarded employers and workmen, he believed it would do more harm than good, and only put difficulties in the way; and, therefore, he hoped, under the circumstances, that the Committee would consent to the words being omitted.

MR. BRYCE said, he only wished to state, in order to allay the apprehensions which seemed to exist in the minds of some of his hon. Friends, that he had not the slightest intention, in proposing to omit the sub-section, of making a difference as regarded the liability of employers. The Amendment was designed only to simplify the Bill and diminish possible litigation.

MR. THOMPSON asked, how sub-section 1 would be affected by the Common Law liability?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that it would only be affected where there was personal negligence known to exist.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. BARNES moved, in page 2, line 18, after "or" to leave out, "some person superior to himself," and insert, "to the person."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL wished to point out that there was an important Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) on that sub-section.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, he hoped the hon. Member for East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) would not press his Amendment. The truth was, that that immunity clause restricted, instead of increased, the liability of the employer. It freed from liability where the workman neglected to give information to any person. It was intended as a correlative, he believed, to the extended liability of sub-section 3 of Clause 1.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CRAIG said, he wished to move the Amendment which stood in his Bill in page 2, line 19, after

"employer," to leave out to end of clause. His reason for doing so was simply this. The right to compensation depended upon the performance of a simple, but important duty. The clause was, that where a workman knew of the defect or negligence which caused his injury, he was to make it his business to give information of that defect or negligence to his employer or some other superior. It was not necessary to do that personally. He might cause it to be given—as, for instance, when two or more men were working together, it would be sufficient if one of them gave the information. That was a duty which workmen could easily understand. It was very important to owners that the information given by the workmen should be of value to prevent an accident from occurring. That ought to be the first consideration. Nothing which had a tendency to prevent the master becoming aware of the facts ought to be left in the clause. He was of opinion that the words he proposed to omit would occasion great doubt and difficulty. As soon as a workman became aware of the fact that something was wrong, he ought immediately to give information, without stopping to consider whether he had a reasonable cause to believe that the master was already aware of it or not. The clause said "reasonable cause to believe;" but he did not know how any ordinary workman was to decide what was a reasonable cause, or what was not. That difficulty might operate against the workman himself, for he might suppose that the thing was apparent, or that the employer or superior was in possession of the information, or something else which he might deem a reasonable clause, but which might not be in reality such. If an accident happened, and the case came before the jury, their view of the case he deemed reasonable might be different, and he might be deprived of his right to compensation. He begged to move his Amendment for the reasons he had stated.

MR. DODSON said, he was not disposed to assent to the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Staffordshire, and for the following reason. Those words were placed there with a view to improve the position of the workman, and if they took them away it would materially alter that. Of course, it was rather an invidious, and perhaps a difficult, task for one in the position of a workman to state to the employer that there was a defect in the machinery, or to point out that something was wrong; but it must become doubly so if it was known, or there was reasonable cause to believe, that the employer or superior was aware that it existed. It was for the sake of saving a workman from the obligation of giving information in a case where it was not requisite to do so that the words had been inserted. For those reasons, and in the interests of the workmen themselves, he must ask the Committee to retain the words.

MR. A. P. VIVIAN said, he was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had refused to accept that Amendment. He represented a constituency in which there were many mines, and he believed many of that constituency were in favour of that Amendment. For his own part, he must say that if the responsibility were not taken off the workmen in a small matter like that he did not see how small mines were to be carried on at all. He had not interfered with the second reading of the Bill, although it was one of the most unpopular Bills in districts where metalliferous mines existed, and such a district he represented. There was, no doubt, a feeling that something ought to be done in the matter; and, therefore, he had agreed to let the second reading of the Bill take place without opposition, so far as he was concerned. But he did trust that when an Amendment of such practical utility as the present one was brought forward, especially when they mentioned that it had been introduced by a Gentleman who so well understood the matter, it would receive the consideration of the Government. That was one of the Amendments which had been looked into, and approved of, by the Association of Miners in his part of the country, and he hoped that it might be accepted, so as to make the Bill as little objectionable to them as possible.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he should be glad if that Amendment could be further considered by the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill, inasmuch as it had been received with favour, and there were reasons urged on behalf of it on both sides of the question. From the point of view of the workmen, it could, he thought, do no mischief if those words were rejected. There was nothing in the Amendment which defeated the object of the Bill; but it simply removed the complexity of the sub-section. Looking at the sub-section, they would see that the question to be decided, whether by a County Court Judge or a jury, was a complicated and difficult one. If the Committee would examine the words, they would see that that was so—

Mr. Dodson

“If a workman knew of the defect or negligence which caused his injury, and failed within a reasonable time to give, or cause to be given, information thereof to the employer or some person superior to himself.”

So far it was intelligible and simple, and an employer might reasonably say that if a workman knew of a defect that caused his injury, and did not go and tell him, that was negligence on his part, because he had no business to go on working under those circumstances. By not telling the employer he would relieve him from the responsibility, and take it upon himself by leaving the employer in the dark. But it was possible that, as against the employer, the workmen might say, as the clause stood—“I knew of that defect, or negligence on the part of that superior; but I said nothing about it, either to you or the person over me, waiting for a reasonable time to elapse, believing that you would become aware of the fact.” That would, he believed, put a serious burden on the employer, and raise a very difficult question. Compassion had, no doubt, a very great deal to do with the result of an action. Juries would no doubt, often go against the employer, believing that the workmen had reasonable cause for compensation. His opinion was that if the workmen knew of the defect or negligence and did not take the trouble to tell the employer, or his representative, the employer should not be liable. For those reasons, he hoped that the words would be expunged from the sub-section, and particularly as they seemed to introduce needless complexity. He believed they might well be omitted.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he entirely agreed as to the importance of the first part of the sub-section; but he thought, also, that the second portion was almost equally important. Some such provision was absolutely necessary. For instance, a workman saw a fellow-workman call the attention of the employer to a defect, or a group of workmen might see it. Was every one of those men to be debarred, unless they all went separately to tell the employer? They were aware that the master knew of it, for they had seen his attention called to it. If some such words were not used they could not recover against the employer. Surely, neither employers nor employed would desire such a state of things to exist as that. Therefore, they must have something to show that if they had grounds for supposing the employer knew of it, it would not be necessary to go and tell him. It was certainly absurd that the men should be compelled to go and tell the master over and over again, when they knew beforehand that he was already aware of it. The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) said "No." But if those words were left out, then the men would be obliged to do so, or be debarred from recovering. That information was to be given within a reasonable time. That might mean six months, perhaps, or any other time. As soon as possible after the man knew of the defect, of course it would be his duty to communicate it. But if the man knew that the master was aware of it, still, according to his hon. and learned Friend opposite, if he did not communicate it, then just in the same way he was to be debarred. He could not suggest any other words which he believed would equally well meet the case, and therefore he trusted that they would be allowed to remain in the sub-section.

Mr. GORST said, that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) was, no doubt, actuated by a desire to benefit the working classes, when he suggested what he believed would be a simplification of the wording of the sub-section. But, by the clear exposition which they had just heard from the Solicitor General, the consequence of such a change was pointed out—that in every workshop everyone would have to give notice to the employer, when any defect in the machinery or negligence on the part of anyone was going on. Would that conduce to discipline and good order? A whole string of workpeople would be going up, giving formal notice of defects in machinery, or anything else, in order to bring themselves within the clause. That would be the effect, if the clause were passed in the form suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth. He did not know whether better words than those of the sub-section might not be proposed; but, at any rate, they should not adopt the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth unless they wished to create confusion in the factories and workshops of the country.

Mr. J. W. PEASE said, he fully understood the remarks which fell from the Solicitor General. Had it not been for them he should have supported the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth; but he thought the point one which might be further guarded by words on Report.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, he quite appreciated the hypothetical case given by the Solicitor General; but, at the same time, he thought the sub-section would not do in its present form. If the Government would consider all that had been said, and vary the terms on Report, it might stop further discussion. The objection to the words pointed out by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. E. Clarke) was quite a fair one. His notion was, that that clause might be amended by omitting the words suggested by the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Craig), and for this reason—that the object of the Act might be evaded if a workman knew of a defect, but knew also that another had told the employer, because that was not giving, or causing to be given, information. It appeared to him that a workman on that hypothesis might be aware of those facts, and yet run a risk of losing the right to compensation in case of injury. That ought not to be the position of workmen by any means; and, therefore, he hoped that the Government would accede to the proposal he had made. He would not propose any alteration then; but the sub-section might be re-cast, by which they would get rid of the obvious impropriety of allowing a man to go on in such a way that, by a mere technicality, he should lose his right to compensation.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, he had observed that the Solicitor General had not laid stress upon the words

"within a reasonable time." It appeared to him that if a man knew of a defect, and brought it to the notice of an employer, and then an action were brought, if it were alleged that he had not given notice, he would have to show that he had done so within a reasonable time. He was inclined to lay more stress upon those words than the Solicitor General did. If the Government would be willing to alter the words at the end of the clause, as had been proposed, he would suggest something of this kind—

"Unless where such defect or negligence had been brought to the notice of the employer or such superior."

MR. DODSON said, that when his hon. Friend had risen, he was about to state to the Committee that, having heard the criticism on the form of the words, he was ready to consider the matter on Report, with a view of meeting the views of hon. Members, while adhering to the substance of the sub-section.

MR. BROADHURST said, that as the Government had consented to re-cast the sub-section, he did sincerely hope that they would not weaken the intention conveyed in the sentence proposed to be omitted by the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Craig), which he considered was absolutely necessary. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) had not, he apprehended, been recently employed in the modern mode of conducting large works. Under the present system of conducting business, the men were not allowed to meddle or tamper with the managers or foremen. The discipline was, in fact, as strict as it was in the Army or Navy. ["Oh, oh!"] He was giving them his own experience of work. The rules were very strict, and it was necessary that they should be so. He was not finding fault with that. If a workman pointed out every little defect, he would certainly not remain in that employ many days.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN wished to point out to the hon. Member who had just spoken, a portion of a speech made by Mr. Brison at a meeting held in the North of England. Mr. Brison, no doubt, thoroughly represented the men, and was the Chairman of the North-umberland Miners' Association. He said, with reference to that matter—

Sir Henry Holland

"That if there was anything wrong in the pit which rendered any part dangerous, what was the result? The men working where the danger was, instead of simply complaining, called the attention of the colliers to the fact, and the matter was taken up by the whole of the men employed. Notice was given to the overman, and, failing to make safe that part, they proceeded to the owner, and if they failed then to obtain redress they took the matter in their own hands, and stopped the pit."

There was no necessity, he thought, to encourage men to give notice of the danger. All they ought to be anxious to do should be to prevent that kind of evidence to which he believed lawyers so much objected—namely, hearsay evidence. If a man, knowing that a danger existed, refrained from giving notice because he had heard it said that somebody had complained to the employer, that ought not to be sufficient. They should make it absolutely clear that proper notice must be given to the owner of the existence of danger. There should be no ambiguity in that clause at all. His anxiety was, so far as possible, to make it perfectly clear, so that no question should arise on the point between masters and men. He feared that words so ambiguous as those employed might lead to that; and, therefore, he was very glad to hear of the undertaking of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Dodson) that, on Report, he would improve the wording of the sub-section. He hoped that discussion would then cease; and he hoped that such words would be inserted on Report as not to relieve a workman from the responsibility of communicating the information, unless he was perfectly certain that the master was aware of the defect.

MR. COHEN said, that he had listened to the arguments of the Solicitor General, and he believed that it would be extremely unjust to the workman that those words should be left out. He would suggest to the Government that, perhaps, it would be wise to make use of words which were in the Merchant Shipping Act—namely, the words "without justifiable cause." He believed that would do justice to all parties. If the workman had justifiable cause for not mentioning the matter to the employer, then he ought to be able to recover. Suppose an employer told a man that if he made complaints of defects in machinery, he would dismiss him. It was useless, he believed, to leave such a matter as that entirely in the hands of the tribunals, and he believed that the words he had suggested, if inserted, would meet the case. In certain cases, then, a man would be relieved from the responsibility of communicating the information.

An hon. MEMBER said, that whatever the Chairman of the Northumberland Miners' Association might say, what had been quoted from his speech by the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian) did not apply all over the country. He himself had had considerable experience of collieries in Wales, and he knew that the men dare not say if there was danger in the pit; they would be told that it was no business of theirs. He thought that the words at the end of the clause were absolutely necessary; and he, therefore, trusted that if any change was to be made in them, the Government would take care that the meaning be retained.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, he should like to point out to the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) that, as the clause now stood, it was necessary for a workman, when aware of a defect, to make the communication. It was only the last portion of it about which the difficulty had arisen. He did not know, of course, what was the rule in all the mining districts; but it did appear to him that it would probably be the same almost everywhere as it was in Northumberland, and that notice would be given and repeated by the workmen, rather than run the risk of losing the compensation danger, the existence of which risk they were aware of. It was quite possible that there were extreme cases, where miners would be afraid to tell the employers; but all he could say was that, from his knowledge of Welsh miners, nothing was easier than for them to make representations to a superior, or to bring a matter of so important a nature to the knowledge of the master in many ways. On the other hand, there were numberless cases when it would be grossly unjust to assume that the employer was aware of every defect, and when, therefore, the responsibility must rest on the workmen for the consequences, if they refused to communicate the facts to his knowledge. Further, it occurred to him that, although it was not desirable to omit the words altogether, it was necessary that the sub-section should be re-cast.

Amendment negatived.

MR. ROBERTSON said, that he begged to move to add the following sub-section at the end of the clause—

“(5.) As to mines. In any case where the workman in any mine at the time of the injury had become a member of or joined an assurance or provident society, duly certified under the Friendly Societies Acts, and established at or in connection with such mine, and in and by which society the workman was insured against personal injury, and provision made for his dependent relatives in case of a fatal accident, by the contributions of the employer and the workmen in proportions fixed by the code of rules of such society.”

He would call the attention of the Committee to the effect of this sub-clause as regarded mines. It was generally admitted, he believed, in the House, as well as out of it, that mines required special legislation. This was so far the case at present, that mineowners and those engaged in the mine were under special liabilities which, so far as he was aware, was not the case with regard to any other industry. In addition to that, there were dangers which did not affect other employers. Some hon. Members had spoken upon this subject as if it were intended to make mineowners responsible for all accidents which might happen. No doubt, those Gentlemen might be well informed with regard to the risks of manufacturing industry; but they could not know the dangers and necessary precautions which were required in the case of mines. He was himself engaged in manufacturing operations, and, to a certain extent, had been so engaged for the last 24 years. He was a partner in works which employed upwards of 2,000 men; but, so far as the effect of this Act went, it would really make very little difference with regard to them. The same was the case with regard to many other industries; but with regard to mines, he would draw the attention of the Committee to this fact that, whatever the law now was, it was well known and had been known for the last 40 years. A well known case, to which reference had been made, had made employers fully aware of the liability which they were under to their workmen. With that full knowledge of the risks to be run, very large and expensive investments of capital had been made in mines. He might say that, perhaps, the produce of the mines of this country exceeded £16,000,000 a-year in value. In dealing with industries upon so extensive a scale, and which contributed so large a part to the nation's wealth, it was well to consider how far, and in what way, such an industry would be affected. There could be no doubt that the obligations imposed upon mineowners by this Act would very largely alter their liabilities. If there was negligence, the mineowner was liable to compensation to the men for each accident. Not only was he liable, at one sweep, to lose the whole of his property—and what he, perhaps, valued as largely, the men with whom he had been connected in working, and who, by a common fatality, met their deaths—but he was also to be liable for immense sums to the relatives of those persons. He thought it would be well if a means could be found of reconciling the interests of those engaged in mining and the employer; and if that could be done by this Act, all parties would cheerfully and readily acquiesce. He believed that there was one plan under which this Act could be made so workable, and would so provide that the employer and the employed should each be contented. If they wished to keep up that full and mutual assistance and reliance between the workpeople and their employers, they should endeavour to promote a system of mutual assurance which would prevent a feeling of irritation between employers and employed, and which would take away that endless litigation which everyone looked to with appalling interest in connection with this measure. By a system of assurance this could be carried out; and he wished the Act to provide that if such a system were carried out then, so far as that provided for compensation for the workman, the employer should be exempted from liability under the Act. He would ask the Government to consider how far the clause he had moved would carry that object into effect. He did not propose that this should be more than voluntary, or that it should be compulsory. He simply wished to provide that employers and employed, who wished to do so, might concur in a system of mutual assurance, by which they would not be subjected to the provisions of the Bill. One quarter of the whole number of miners in the country were now members of such societies as those provided for under this sub-section. If the Amendment were adopted, he thought that it would do away with a large amount of irritation, and that it would accomplish a great deal of good. No doubt, he should be told that the Bill did not prevent any such system of assurance. But he thought that it was necessary to provide in the Bill that, by concurring in such a system of mutual assurance, the employer should be exempted from liability. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had stated that he should be glad to see a system of assurance carried out. But they feared that this Bill would only operate to prevent assurance, if carried in its present state. A man would say that, as this Act gave him compensation whenever an accident was the result of negligence, he would not join one of these societies, but would rather take his chance of obtaining compensation under the Act. At the present time, the miners had their own societies, which were under the control of their own leaders. If this Bill were passed, there would be an excuse to them for not joining these societies; and it was necessary to have some such Amendment as he had proposed to prevent that occurring.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, he thought the Committee was much indebted to the hon. Member for the able speech in which he had brought forward this proposal. It had occurred to him that this was, perhaps, by no means a happy point in the Bill at which to raise the question of assurance. He made that observation, because, when he looked at the magnitude of this assurance question, he thought it would facilitate the discussion of the proposal if his hon. Friend would not raise a discussion then, but would wait until the proposal had been made for fixing the amount of maximum compensation. He hoped the Government would endorse the suggestion he had made, because they could not deny that this assurance question was one of vital importance. He believed that if the principle of assurance could be carried, three-fourths of the dread with which the Bill was now viewed would be removed. When the Committee came to discuss the proposal of the hon. Member for East

Mr. Robertson

Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes), to fix the maximum sum for the workmen's compensation, they would be in a better position than they now were to discuss the question of assurance. It was first necessary, however, to arrive at a decision upon that head; and he should, therefore, suggest that the present Amendment should be withdrawn, until they could deal with the question of assurance as a whole.

MR. DODSON said, that he wished to endorse the appeal of the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson). He thought it would be far better, and also for the sake of convenience, that the subject of assurance should be discussed on a substantive clause providing for it, rather than as an Amendment in the form of a sub-section to a clause. There was no desire, or intention, on the part of Her Majesty's Government to shrink from a full discussion upon this subject; but he felt that the course recommended by the hon. and learned Member for Coventry was that which it would be more convenient to take.

MR. ROBERTSON said, that, after the appeal that had been made to him, he should be happy to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, that the two hon. Members who had last spoken had, with considerable fairness, stated that they represented the employers on this question. He did not think that any hon. Member had a larger number of miners among his constituents than he had. He wished it to be clearly understood that the question of assurance, so far as the mining operatives were concerned, would be strongly and strenuously resisted. He hoped the Government would not give way upon this subject. This clause, which was going to be withdrawn, would be, practically, a means of inflicting a penalty on every prudent miner who insured in a provident society. But if, in the interests of the mineowners and of the mine workers, the Government could see their way to some means of recognizing the Coal Mines Regulation Act, and exempting mineowners from liability where the provisions of that Act were fully carried out, he thought it would be doing justice to all concerned. He would tell the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson), however, that any attempt to deprive the men of their legitimate right of compensation, by any system of compulsory assurance, would meet with very strenuous opposition.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the amount of compensation which might become due under this Bill was so enormous, that it could not be excluded from consideration in dealing with this subject. To take the case of the lamentable explosion at the Risca Colliery; if it could be proved there, that it happened through the negligence of any person employed in the mine, then, under the operation of this Bill, the owners would become liable for an enormous amount of compensation. He had been told by a competent authority that the amount for which the owners would have been liable in that case would not have been less than £28,000. This was an amount of penalty which was perfectly absurd; and if they meant to ensure compensation to any adequate amount to the miners, and to combine it with proper restraint of negligence, he, as a practical man, did not see how they could accomplish those objects without some system of assurance. He did not believe it would be practicable to inflict penalties of a perfectly exorbitant and ruinous nature upon persons who would have to suffer by the fault of those in their employ whom they had trusted. Therefore, he was strongly of opinion that, if the object of combining compensation for injuries with some restraint against negligence was to be carried out, it could not be done without some system of assurance.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, that he was present at a meeting on Durham Race Course. Between 40,000 and 50,000 miners of Durham, on Saturday, unanimously endorsed the principles of that Bill, but, at the same time, unanimously declared their hostility to any clause which would put upon them a system of compulsory assurance. The effect of the clause which was now proposed would be that if a man assured at all he should have no benefit under the Act.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, that he begged to move an Amendment which stood in the name of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill), in page 2, at would be likely to give rise to litigation. It had been said that it would be a fruitful source of litigation; and it would, he believed, probably be so. He thought, with his hon. and learned Friend, that there could be no action brought by any workman to recover, by way of compensation, so as to be successful, if he had contributed by his negligence to the injury. With regard to the decisions that had been come to on the subject, he would not trouble the Committee with them, nor with the different views that had been expressed in those decisions as to the defence on the ground of contributory negligence; their object was not to alter the present state of the law upon the subject. They wished to leave the Common Law alone; and if the words were inserted, it would only be for the purpose of declaring the Common Law, and not for the purpose of carrying it further. Therefore, it seemed to them that as their object must be to prevent litigation as far as possible, and to give employers protection in cases of injury generally, they ought to prevent both strangers and servants from recovering in all cases where there had been contributory negligence. Those words, therefore, would have no effect on the existing law if they were inserted; and, inasmuch as their insertion might be misunderstood, the Government thought it was better to omit them, so as to avoid litigation as far as possible.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, that he was placed in rather a painful position when the Law Officers of the Crown said, on their responsibility, that such and such would be the effect of the retention of those words; for he knew that unless he could persuade them he could not persuade the Committee, and the words would be struck out. He protested against those words being left out, and he must appeal to his hon. and learned Friends. If his hon. and learned Friend would read the Common Law as it stood, he was quite satisfied that he would see that that Bill would alter the Common Law on that subject, and create a statutory liability. That would be construed by the Courts as being, as it really was, an alteration of the Common Law. By that Bill they were interfering with and altering the Common Law. It was to the effect that an employer should be liable for the acts of certain persons mentioned in the Bill, for whom he was not liable at present. There was no connection between that and any particular law. The Judge found nothing of the same kind already in existence. He would read the 1st clause, if he might be allowed. There was a distinct enactment—

The Attorney General

“Where after the passing of this Act, personal injury is caused to a workman, &c., &c.” Then a liability is to attach in the same way—

“As if the workman had not been a workman of nor in the service of the employer, nor engaged in his work.”

There was a statutory liability. They knew very well that, by the law at present, there was a certain defence to be found in the words under consideration—namely, that the man himself contributed to the injury which affected him. The Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) contained that clause, because he wished that that matter should be left perfectly clear. As he read the enactment, there was a distinct statutory liability; but he failed to see why that immunity should only be given where the accident was contributed to by the workman himself. His hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General said that the words were inoperative. If so, they could do no harm. How could they? If they were inoperative, why leave them out? He contended that they were a safety and protection to the employer, and, therefore, ought to be left in. His hon. and learned Friend said, also, that if they were left in, they would be, probably, a fruitful source of litigation. But he contended that their absence would leave a loophole, because there should always be an expressio unius—the law should be within certain well-defined limits, and those limits would not be so well defined if this sub-section were omitted. Of course, it was no use to divide the Committee upon the question, or to trouble them about it, if he failed to persuade his hon. and learned Friends the Law Officers for the Crown; but he did protest against the omission of that sub-section, which, if it remained as it was, could not possibly do any harm.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he hoped the Government would strike out the sub-section, for it appeared to him that it might be liable to misconstruction if it remained in. He could not, of course, pretend to discuss law with the hon. and learned Member for

Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson); but he believed that what he quoted from the end of the 1st clause was distinctly against his own argument. It said there that a workman—

"Shall have the same right to compensation and remedies against the employer as if the workmen had not been a workman of nor in the service of the employer, nor engaged in his work."

Therefore, he was placed in the condition of a stranger. But if a stranger contributed by his own negligence to injury, received from machinery or anything else, he fancied, and he said it with all deference to the hon. and learned Member, that he could not claim damages. Therefore, he was placed in that condition as regarded remedies. He trusted that the Government would strike out the sub-section for the reasons already given.

MR. MACLIVER said, after the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson), he thought they were all puzzled to know what the law was. He thought, also, that they had had rather too much law. It began last Monday night. They had then the heavy boom from the late Attorney General, followed by the sharp artillery from that side, and the small shot from below the Gangway, and it appeared to him there had been rather too much law about, especially as the speeches had been contradictory. He saw a good many Amendments were still to be disposed of, which came principally from the employers of labour, apparently; and he thought they ought to ask the Committee to deal with the proposals of the Bill calmly and deliberately, and not to interpose unnecessarily questions which might affect not only themselves but others outside their circle. A good deal had been said about mining. No doubt, that subject was beset with difficulties. When they heard the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian) talking about the grave consequences which followed upon the distress in mining, he could not help thinking that he had failed to tell them something which should be told. Mineowners had not always borne the brunt of those accidents; and even at the present they had gone about the country seeking help to pay the families of the sufferers by those accidents. He could speaking, from his own experience, of having been instrumental in collecting and transmitting a large amount to South Wales to meet the calamities which had happened there, by which, he believed, mineowners had been greatly benefited. He thought, with regard to the discussion of the Bill, they ought to look more at public interests than at private.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must call the attention of the hon. Member to the fact that the Committee is discussing the omission of a sub-section. The hon. Member's remarks seem to be general, and do not appear to refer to the Question before the Committee.

MR. MACLIVER would simply say that he had intended to rise yesterday on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. Morley). He would now observe that, with regard to the Question before the Committee, he hoped as few Amendments as possible would be pressed.

MR. GIBSON said, that no one had a greater respect for the opinion of the hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) than he had; but he really did not see the objection to the course taken by the Attorney General. He thought that the protection contained in the sub-section was sufficiently preserved in the previous clauses of the Bill; and the only advantage in retaining it would be that it would operate as a reminder to the County Court Judge. He really thought that, the County Court Judges of England and Ireland being capable and intelligent men, the matter might be left to them.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he wished to call attention to one point. Lord Campbell's Act had extended the law to persons who, previously, in cases where damage was shown to have resulted partly from the negligence of a person, were not able to recover.

MR. THOMPSON said, he should like to ask the Attorney General a question. He understood that that sub-section dealt with cases where the Common Law liability existed. If so, did not the Common Law liability also apply in the 1st clause, where any defect had been shown to exist in the machinery? He understood from the hon. and learned Member for Preston (Sir John Holker) that if the Common Law liability extended in the one case, so would it in the other.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that Common Law liability existed in the case of an employer's negligence. The object of that Bill was to put workmen in the same position as strangers.

MR. RYLANDS said, that he must express his great regret at the change of opinion which had taken place on the Government Bench. He thought that the course the Government was then taking was one that justified the previous attempt to refer the matter to a Select Committee. He did not vote for that, because he did not wish to oppose the Government; but this was a Bill supposed to have received the most careful attention of the Law Officers of the Crown. At their last meeting, the Law Officers opposed that Amendment entirely. The hon. and learned Gentleman had shown a change of front that day, for which no sufficient justification had been shown. The hon. and learned Gentleman said—and no doubt it was so—that he wished the Bill to be so drawn that it might prevent litigation. But he (Mr. Rylands) wanted the Bill so drawn, that if it was the fact that no workman could get any compensation for an injury where he had contributed to it by his own negligence, in the interest of the workman that ought to appear upon the Bill, and ought not to be concealed. [Cries of "Agreed!"] He did not know what hon. Gentlemen meant. There was the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) interrupting every hon. Gentleman by crying "Agreed." Was it intended that the Bill should be discussed or not? He would not dispute the law with the Attorney General; but he thought good reason had been shown why that clause should be retained, with a view of reminding County Court Judges in the way the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) had suggested, and also with a view of reminding attorneys that workmen should not be led into litigation in consequence of something which had been concealed in the Bill, without any chance of getting compensation for injury. He would say again that he believed that when a Government, dealing with a Bill of that kind, changed so suddenly, it struck at the confidence which would otherwise be reposed in their judgment in carrying on the Business of the country.

MR. GORST said, it was very desirable that the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) should have an opportunity of expressing his views on that subject to the Committee, and he was specially desirous to listen when he appeared in the capacity of champion of the working man. He was not very often lavish in his praises of the Government; but on that particular occasion he felt bound to say that they did not deserve those epithets of change of front, &c., which the hon. Member had employed. It was really a pure question of law. The Amendment was introduced by a lawyer—the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce)—on the last occasion when the Bill was under consideration. The Attorney General said that he did not consider the words superfluous, and asked the Committee to retain the words. Some other hon. and learned Members had expressed an opinion that the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets was right, and that the words were unnecessary. He supposed the Attorney General, in the interval which elapsed between the last Sitting and the present one, had had an opportunity of having a conference with his hon. and learned Colleague, and had at leisure come to the conclusion that the words were unnecessary, and, therefore, should be struck out. He really thought that hon. Members opposite showed very little confidence in the Government, if they could not confide in the Law Officers with regard to such a simple matter as that. He would advise the great Party opposite not to prolong the discussion, but take the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown, and allow the words, which lawyers said were not necessary, to be struck out.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he would not detain the Committee more than a minute. Enough time, he thought, had been spent already with regard to that matter of contributory negligence. He certainly had held that it might be of advantage to retain those words, for reasons which had already been suggested; but when he came to reflect upon the matter he came to see that the disadvantage would really be greater than the advantage, and for this reason—the sub-section was an incomplete account of the whole of the law of contributory negligence. Therefore, if they had stated part of the law, it would give rise to a discussion before the tribunals as to whether it was meant to alter the law; and, if so, to what extent, and so would lead to litigation. Therefore, although he thought that it might be advisable to keep it before the working man in that form, he felt, at the same time, that it must almost certainly give rise to controversy. Both as regarded employers and workmen, he believed it would do more harm than good, and only put difficulties in the way; and, therefore, he hoped, under the circumstances, that the Committee would consent to the words being omitted.

MR. BRYCE said, he only wished to state, in order to allay the apprehensions which seemed to exist in the minds of some of his hon. Friends, that he had not the slightest intention, in proposing to omit the sub-section, of making a difference as regarded the liability of employers. The Amendment was designed only to simplify the Bill and diminish possible litigation.

MR. THOMPSON asked, how sub-section 1 would be affected by the Common Law liability?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that it would only be affected where there was personal negligence known to exist.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. BARNES moved, in page 2, line 18, after "or" to leave out, "some person superior to himself," and insert, "to the person."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL wished to point out that there was an important Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) on that sub-section.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, he hoped the hon. Member for East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) would not press his Amendment. The truth was, that that immunity clause restricted, instead of increased, the liability of the employer. It freed from liability where the workman neglected to give information to any person. It was intended as a correlative, he believed, to the extended liability of sub-section 3 of Clause 1.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CRAIG said, he wished to move the Amendment which stood in his name—namely, in page 2, line 19, after

"employer," to leave out to end of clause. His reason for doing so was simply this. The right to compensation depended upon the performance of a simple, but important duty. The clause was, that where a workman knew of the defect or negligence which caused his injury, he was to make it his business to give information of that defect or negligence to his employer or some other superior. It was not necessary to do that personally. He might cause it to be given—as, for instance, when two or more men were working together, it would be sufficient if one of them gave the information. That was a duty which workmen could easily understand. It was very important to owners that the information given by the workmen should be of value to prevent an accident from occurring. That ought to be the first consideration. Nothing which had a tendency to prevent the master becoming aware of the facts ought to be left in the clause. He was of opinion that the words he proposed to omit would occasion great doubt and difficulty. As soon as a workman became aware of the fact that something was wrong, he ought immediately to give information, without stopping to consider whether he had a reasonable cause to believe that the master was already aware of it or not. The clause said "reasonable cause to believe;" but he did not know how any ordinary workman was to decide what was a reasonable cause, or what was not. That difficulty might operate against the workman himself, for he might suppose that the thing was apparent, or that the employer or superior was in possession of the information, or something else which he might deem a reasonable clause, but which might not be in reality such. If an accident happened, and the case came before the jury, their view of the case he deemed reasonable might be different, and he might be deprived of his right to compensation. He begged to move his Amendment for the reasons he had stated.

MR. DODSON said, he was not disposed to assent to the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Staffordshire, and for the following reason. Those words were placed there with a view to improve the position of the workman, and if they took them away it would materially alter that. Of course, it was rather an invidious, and perhaps a difficult, task for one in the position of a workman to state to the employer that there was a defect in the machinery, or to point out that something was wrong; but it must become doubly so if it was known, or there was reasonable cause to believe, that the employer or superior was aware that it existed. It was for the sake of saving a workman from the obligation of giving information in a case where it was not requisite to do so that the words had been inserted. For those reasons, and in the interests of the workmen themselves, he must ask the Committee to retain the words.

MR. A. P. VIVIAN said, he was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had refused to accept that Amendment. He represented a constituency in which there were many mines, and he believed many of that constituency were in favour of that Amendment. For his own part, he must say that if the responsibility were not taken off the workmen in a small matter like that he did not see how small mines were to be carried on at all. He had not interfered with the second reading of the Bill, although it was one of the most unpopular Bills in districts where metalliferous mines existed, and such a district he represented. There was, no doubt, a feeling that something ought to be done in the matter; and, therefore, he had agreed to let the second reading of the Bill take place without opposition, so far as he was concerned. But he did trust that when an Amendment of such practical utility as the present one was brought forward, especially when they mentioned that it had been introduced by a Gentleman who so well understood the matter, it would receive the consideration of the Government. That was one of the Amendments which had been looked into, and approved of, by the Association of Miners in his part of the country, and he hoped that it might be accepted, so as to make the Bill as little objectionable to them as possible.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he should be glad if that Amendment could be further considered by the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill, inasmuch as it had been received with favour, and there were reasons urged on behalf of it on both sides of the question. From the point of view of the workmen, it could, he thought, do no mischief if those words were rejected. There was nothing in the Amendment which defeated the object of the Bill; but it simply removed the complexity of the sub-section. Looking at the sub-section, they would see that the question to be decided, whether by a County Court Judge or a jury, was a complicated and difficult one. If the Committee would examine the words, they would see that that was so—

Mr. Dodson

“If a workman knew of the defect or negligence which caused his injury, and failed within a reasonable time to give, or cause to be given, information thereof to the employer or some person superior to himself.”

So far it was intelligible and simple, and an employer might reasonably say that if a workman knew of a defect that caused his injury, and did not go and tell him, that was negligence on his part, because he had no business to go on working under those circumstances. By not telling the employer he would relieve him from the responsibility, and take it upon himself by leaving the employer in the dark. But it was possible that, as against the employer, the workmen might say, as the clause stood—“I knew of that defect, or negligence on the part of that superior; but I said nothing about it, either to you or the person over me, waiting for a reasonable time to elapse, believing that you would become aware of the fact.” That would, he believed, put a serious burden on the employer, and raise a very difficult question. Compassion had, no doubt, a very great deal to do with the result of an action. Juries would no doubt, often go against the employer, believing that the workmen had reasonable cause for compensation. His opinion was that if the workmen knew of the defect or negligence and did not take the trouble to tell the employer, or his representative, the employer should not be liable. For those reasons, he hoped that the words would be expunged from the sub-section, and particularly as they seemed to introduce needless complexity. He believed they might well be omitted.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he entirely agreed as to the importance of the first part of the sub-section; but he thought, also, that the second portion was almost equally important. Some such provision was absolutely necessary. For instance, a workman saw a fellow-workman call the attention of the employer to a defect, or a group of workmen might see it. Was every one of those men to be debarred, unless they all went separately to tell the employer? They were aware that the master knew of it, for they had seen his attention called to it. If some such words were not used they could not recover against the employer. Surely, neither employers nor employed would desire such a state of things to exist as that. Therefore, they must have something to show that if they had grounds for supposing the employer knew of it, it would not be necessary to go and tell him. It was certainly absurd that the men should be compelled to go and tell the master over and over again, when they knew beforehand that he was already aware of it. The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) said "No." But if those words were left out, then the men would be obliged to do so, or be debarred from recovering. That information was to be given within a reasonable time. That might mean six months, perhaps, or any other time. As soon as possible after the man knew of the defect, of course it would be his duty to communicate it. But if the man knew that the master was aware of it, still, according to his hon. and learned Friend opposite, if he did not communicate it, then just in the same way he was to be debarred. He could not suggest any other words which he believed would equally well meet the case, and therefore he trusted that they would be allowed to remain in the sub-section.

Mr. GORST said, that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) was, no doubt, actuated by a desire to benefit the working classes, when he suggested what he believed would be a simplification of the wording of the sub-section. But, by the clear exposition which they had just heard from the Solicitor General, the consequence of such a change was pointed out—that in every workshop everyone would have to give notice to the employer, when any defect in the machinery or negligence on the part of anyone was going on. Would that conduce to discipline and good order? A whole string of workpeople would be going up, giving formal notice of defects in machinery, or anything else, in order to bring themselves within the clause. That would be the effect, if the clause were passed in the form suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth. He did not know whether better words than those of the sub-section might not be proposed; but, at any rate, they should not adopt the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth unless they wished to create confusion in the factories and workshops of the country.

Mr. J. W. PEASE said, he fully understood the remarks which fell from the Solicitor General. Had it not been for them he should have supported the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth; but he thought the point one which might be further guarded by words on Report.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, he quite appreciated the hypothetical case given by the Solicitor General; but, at the same time, he thought the sub-section would not do in its present form. If the Government would consider all that had been said, and vary the terms on Report, it might stop further discussion. The objection to the words pointed out by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. E. Clarke) was quite a fair one. His notion was, that that clause might be amended by omitting the words suggested by the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Craig), and for this reason—that the object of the Act might be evaded if a workman knew of a defect, but knew also that another had told the employer, because that was not giving, or causing to be given, information. It appeared to him that a workman on that hypothesis might be aware of those facts, and yet run a risk of losing the right to compensation in case of injury. That ought not to be the position of workmen by any means; and, therefore, he hoped that the Government would accede to the proposal he had made. He would not propose any alteration then; but the sub-section might be re-cast, by which they would get rid of the obvious impropriety of allowing a man to go on in such a way that, by a mere technicality, he should lose his right to compensation.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, he had observed that the Solicitor General had not laid stress upon the words

"within a reasonable time." It appeared to him that if a man knew of a defect, and brought it to the notice of an employer, and then an action were brought, if it were alleged that he had not given notice, he would have to show that he had done so within a reasonable time. He was inclined to lay more stress upon those words than the Solicitor General did. If the Government would be willing to alter the words at the end of the clause, as had been proposed, he would suggest something of this kind—

"Unless where such defect or negligence had been brought to the notice of the employer or such superior."

MR. DODSON said, that when his hon. Friend had risen, he was about to state to the Committee that, having heard the criticism on the form of the words, he was ready to consider the matter on Report, with a view of meeting the views of hon. Members, while adhering to the substance of the sub-section.

MR. BROADHURST said, that as the Government had consented to re-cast the sub-section, he did sincerely hope that they would not weaken the intention conveyed in the sentence proposed to be omitted by the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Craig), which he considered was absolutely necessary. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) had not, he apprehended, been recently employed in the modern mode of conducting large works. Under the present system of conducting business, the men were not allowed to meddle or tamper with the managers or foremen. The discipline was, in fact, as strict as it was in the Army or Navy. ["Oh, oh!"] He was giving them his own experience of work. The rules were very strict, and it was necessary that they should be so. He was not finding fault with that. If a workman pointed out every little defect, he would certainly not remain in that employ many days.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN wished to point out to the hon. Member who had just spoken, a portion of a speech made by Mr. Brison at a meeting held in the North of England. Mr. Brison, no doubt, thoroughly represented the men, and was the Chairman of the North-umberland Miners' Association. He said, with reference to that matter—

Sir Henry Holland

"That if there was anything wrong in the pit which rendered any part dangerous, what was the result? The men working where the danger was, instead of simply complaining, called the attention of the colliers to the fact, and the matter was taken up by the whole of the men employed. Notice was given to the overman, and, failing to make safe that part, they proceeded to the owner, and if they failed then to obtain redress they took the matter in their own hands, and stopped the pit."

There was no necessity, he thought, to encourage men to give notice of the danger. All they ought to be anxious to do should be to prevent that kind of evidence to which he believed lawyers so much objected—namely, hearsay evidence. If a man, knowing that a danger existed, refrained from giving notice because he had heard it said that somebody had complained to the employer, that ought not to be sufficient. They should make it absolutely clear that proper notice must be given to the owner of the existence of danger. There should be no ambiguity in that clause at all. His anxiety was, so far as possible, to make it perfectly clear, so that no question should arise on the point between masters and men. He feared that words so ambiguous as those employed might lead to that; and, therefore, he was very glad to hear of the undertaking of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Dodson) that, on Report, he would improve the wording of the sub-section. He hoped that discussion would then cease; and he hoped that such words would be inserted on Report as not to relieve a workman from the responsibility of communicating the information, unless he was perfectly certain that the master was aware of the defect.

MR. COHEN said, that he had listened to the arguments of the Solicitor General, and he believed that it would be extremely unjust to the workman that those words should be left out. He would suggest to the Government that, perhaps, it would be wise to make use of words which were in the Merchant Shipping Act—namely, the words "without justifiable cause." He believed that would do justice to all parties. If the workman had justifiable cause for not mentioning the matter to the employer, then he ought to be able to recover. Suppose an employer told a man that if he made complaints of defects in machinery, he would dismiss him. It was useless, he believed, to leave such a matter as that entirely in the hands of the tribunals, and he believed that the words he had suggested, if inserted, would meet the case. In certain cases, then, a man would be relieved from the responsibility of communicating the information.

An hon. MEMBER said, that whatever the Chairman of the Northumberland Miners' Association might say, what had been quoted from his speech by the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian) did not apply all over the country. He himself had had considerable experience of collieries in Wales, and he knew that the men dare not say if there was danger in the pit; they would be told that it was no business of theirs. He thought that the words at the end of the clause were absolutely necessary; and he, therefore, trusted that if any change was to be made in them, the Government would take care that the meaning be retained.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, he should like to point out to the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) that, as the clause now stood, it was necessary for a workman, when aware of a defect, to make the communication. It was only the last portion of it about which the difficulty had arisen. He did not know, of course, what was the rule in all the mining districts; but it did appear to him that it would probably be the same almost everywhere as it was in Northumberland, and that notice would be given and repeated by the workmen, rather than run the risk of losing the compensation danger, the existence of which risk they were aware of. It was quite possible that there were extreme cases, where miners would be afraid to tell the employers; but all he could say was that, from his knowledge of Welsh miners, nothing was easier than for them to make representations to a superior, or to bring a matter of so important a nature to the knowledge of the master in many ways. On the other hand, there were numberless cases when it would be grossly unjust to assume that the employer was aware of every defect, and when, therefore, the responsibility must rest on the workmen for the consequences, if they refused to communicate the facts to his knowledge. Further, it occurred to him that, although it was not desirable to omit the words altogether, it was necessary that the sub-section should be re-cast.

Amendment negatived.

MR. ROBERTSON said, that he begged to move to add the following sub-section at the end of the clause—

“(5.) As to mines. In any case where the workman in any mine at the time of the injury had become a member of or joined an assurance or provident society, duly certified under the Friendly Societies Acts, and established at or in connection with such mine, and in and by which society the workman was insured against personal injury, and provision made for his dependent relatives in case of a fatal accident, by the contributions of the employer and the workmen in proportions fixed by the code of rules of such society.”

He would call the attention of the Committee to the effect of this sub-clause as regarded mines. It was generally admitted, he believed, in the House, as well as out of it, that mines required special legislation. This was so far the case at present, that mineowners and those engaged in the mine were under special liabilities which, so far as he was aware, was not the case with regard to any other industry. In addition to that, there were dangers which did not affect other employers. Some hon. Members had spoken upon this subject as if it were intended to make mineowners responsible for all accidents which might happen. No doubt, those Gentlemen might be well informed with regard to the risks of manufacturing industry; but they could not know the dangers and necessary precautions which were required in the case of mines. He was himself engaged in manufacturing operations, and, to a certain extent, had been so engaged for the last 24 years. He was a partner in works which employed upwards of 2,000 men; but, so far as the effect of this Act went, it would really make very little difference with regard to them. The same was the case with regard to many other industries; but with regard to mines, he would draw the attention of the Committee to this fact that, whatever the law now was, it was well known and had been known for the last 40 years. A well known case, to which reference had been made, had made employers fully aware of the liability which they were under to their workmen. With that full knowledge of the risks to be run, very large and expensive investments of

"within a reasonable time." It appeared to him that if a man knew of a defect, and brought it to the notice of an employer, and then an action were brought, if it were alleged that he had not given notice, he would have to show that he had done so within a reasonable time. He was inclined to lay more stress upon those words than the Solicitor General did. If the Government would be willing to alter the words at the end of the clause, as had been proposed, he would suggest something of this kind—

"Unless where such defect or negligence had been brought to the notice of the employer or such superior."

MR. DODSON said, that when his hon. Friend had risen, he was about to state to the Committee that, having heard the criticism on the form of the words, he was ready to consider the matter on Report, with a view of meeting the views of hon. Members, while adhering to the substance of the sub-section.

MR. BROADHURST said, that as the Government had consented to re-cast the sub-section, he did sincerely hope that they would not weaken the intention conveyed in the sentence proposed to be omitted by the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Craig), which he considered was absolutely necessary. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) had not, he apprehended, been recently employed in the modern mode of conducting large works. Under the present system of conducting business, the men were not allowed to meddle or tamper with the managers or foremen. The discipline was, in fact, as strict as it was in the Army or Navy. ["Oh, oh!"] He was giving them his own experience of work. The rules were very strict, and it was necessary that they should be so. He was not finding fault with that. If a workman pointed out every little defect, he would certainly not remain in that employ many days.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN wished to point out to the hon. Member who had just spoken, a portion of a speech made by Mr. Brison at a meeting held in the North of England. Mr. Brison, no doubt, thoroughly represented the men, and was the Chairman of the North-umberland Miners' Association. He said, with reference to that matter—

Sir Henry Holland

"That if there was anything wrong in the pit which rendered any part dangerous, what was the result? The men working where the danger was, instead of simply complaining, called the attention of the colliers to the fact, and the matter was taken up by the whole of the men employed. Notice was given to the overman, and, failing to make safe that part, they proceeded to the owner, and if they failed then to obtain redress they took the matter in their own hands, and stopped the pit."

There was no necessity, he thought, to encourage men to give notice of the danger. All they ought to be anxious to do should be to prevent that kind of evidence to which he believed lawyers so much objected—namely, hearsay evidence. If a man, knowing that a danger existed, refrained from giving notice because he had heard it said that somebody had complained to the employer, that ought not to be sufficient. They should make it absolutely clear that proper notice must be given to the owner of the existence of danger. There should be no ambiguity in that clause at all. His anxiety was, so far as possible, to make it perfectly clear, so that no question should arise on the point between masters and men. He feared that words so ambiguous as those employed might lead to that; and, therefore, he was very glad to hear of the undertaking of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Dodson) that, on Report, he would improve the wording of the sub-section. He hoped that discussion would then cease; and he hoped that such words would be inserted on Report as not to relieve a workman from the responsibility of communicating the information, unless he was perfectly certain that the master was aware of the defect.

MR. COHEN said, that he had listened to the arguments of the Solicitor General, and he believed that it would be extremely unjust to the workman that those words should be left out. He would suggest to the Government that, perhaps, it would be wise to make use of words which were in the Merchant Shipping Act—namely, the words "without justifiable cause." He believed that would do justice to all parties. If the workman had justifiable cause for not mentioning the matter to the employer, then he ought to be able to recover. Suppose an employer told a man that if he made complaints of defects in machinery, he would dismiss him. It was useless, he believed, to leave such a matter as that entirely in the hands of the tribunals, and he believed that the words he had suggested, if inserted, would meet the case. In certain cases, then, a man would be relieved from the responsibility of communicating the information.

An hon. MEMBER said, that whatever the Chairman of the Northumberland Miners' Association might say, what had been quoted from his speech by the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian) did not apply all over the country. He himself had had considerable experience of collieries in Wales, and he knew that the men dare not say if there was danger in the pit; they would be told that it was no business of theirs. He thought that the words at the end of the clause were absolutely necessary; and he, therefore, trusted that if any change was to be made in them, the Government would take care that the meaning be retained.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, he should like to point out to the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) that, as the clause now stood, it was necessary for a workman, when aware of a defect, to make the communication. It was only the last portion of it about which the difficulty had arisen. He did not know, of course, what was the rule in all the mining districts; but it did appear to him that it would probably be the same almost everywhere as it was in Northumberland, and that notice would be given and repeated by the workmen, rather than run the risk of losing the compensation danger, the existence of which risk they were aware of. It was quite possible that there were extreme cases, where miners would be afraid to tell the employers; but all he could say was that, from his knowledge of Welsh miners, nothing was easier than for them to make representations to a superior, or to bring a matter of so important a nature to the knowledge of the master in many ways. On the other hand, there were numberless cases when it would be grossly unjust to assume that the employer was aware of every defect, and when, therefore, the responsibility must rest on the workmen for the consequences, if they refused to communicate the facts to his knowledge. Further, it occurred to him, that, although it was not desirable to omit the words altogether, it was necessary that the sub-section should be re-cast.

Amendment negatived.

MR. ROBERTSON said, that he begged to move to add the following sub-section at the end of the clause—

“(5.) As to mines. In any case where the workman in any mine at the time of the injury had become a member of or joined an assurance or provident society, duly certified under the Friendly Societies Acts, and established at or in connection with such mine, and in and by which society the workman was insured against personal injury, and provision made for his dependent relatives in case of a fatal accident, by the contributions of the employer and the workmen in proportions fixed by the code of rules of such society.”

He would call the attention of the Committee to the effect of this sub-clause as regarded mines. It was generally admitted, he believed, in the House, as well as out of it, that mines required special legislation. This was so far the case at present, that mineowners and those engaged in the mine were under special liabilities which, so far as he was aware, was not the case with regard to any other industry. In addition to that, there were dangers which did not affect other employers. Some hon. Members had spoken upon this subject as if it were intended to make mineowners responsible for all accidents which might happen. No doubt, those Gentlemen might be well informed with regard to the risks of manufacturing industry; but they could not know the dangers and necessary precautions which were required in the case of mines. He was himself engaged in manufacturing operations, and, to a certain extent, had been so engaged for the last 24 years. He was a partner in works which employed upwards of 2,000 men; but, so far as the effect of this Act went, it would really make very little difference with regard to them. The same was the case with regard to many other industries; but with regard to mines, he would draw the attention of the Committee to this fact that, whatever the law now was, it was well known and had been known for the last 40 years. A well known case, to which reference had been made, had made employers fully aware of the liability which they were under to their workmen. With that full knowledge of the risks to be run, very large and expensive investments of capital had been made in mines. He might say that, perhaps, the produce of the mines of this country exceeded £16,000,000 a-year in value. In dealing with industries upon so extensive a scale, and which contributed so large a part to the nation's wealth, it was well to consider how far, and in what way, such an industry would be affected. There could be no doubt that the obligations imposed upon mineowners by this Act would very largely alter their liabilities. If there was negligence, the mineowner was liable to compensation to the men for each accident. Not only was he liable, at one sweep, to lose the whole of his property—and what he, perhaps, valued as largely, the men with whom he had been connected in working, and who, by a common fatality, met their deaths—but he was also to be liable for immense sums to the relatives of those persons. He thought it would be well if a means could be found of reconciling the interests of those engaged in mining and the employer; and if that could be done by this Act, all parties would cheerfully and readily acquiesce. He believed that there was one plan under which this Act could be made so workable, and would so provide that the employer and the employed should each be contented. If they wished to keep up that full and mutual assistance and reliance between the workpeople and their employers, they should endeavour to promote a system of mutual assurance which would prevent a feeling of irritation between employers and employed, and which would take away that endless litigation which everyone looked to with appalling interest in connection with this measure. By a system of assurance this could be carried out; and he wished the Act to provide that if such a system were carried out then, so far as that provided for compensation for the workman, the employer should be exempted from liability under the Act. He would ask the Government to consider how far the clause he had moved would carry that object into effect. He did not propose that this should be more than voluntary, or that it should be compulsory. He simply wished to provide that employers and employed, who wished to do so, might concur in a system of mutual assurance, by which they would not be subjected to the provisions of the Bill. One quarter of the whole number of miners in the country were now members of such societies as those provided for under this sub-section. If the Amendment were adopted, he thought that it would do away with a large amount of irritation, and that it would accomplish a great deal of good. No doubt, he should be told that the Bill did not prevent any such system of assurance. But he thought that it was necessary to provide in the Bill that, by concurring in such a system of mutual assurance, the employer should be exempted from liability. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had stated that he should be glad to see a system of assurance carried out. But they feared that this Bill would only operate to prevent assurance, if carried in its present state. A man would say that, as this Act gave him compensation whenever an accident was the result of negligence, he would not join one of these societies, but would rather take his chance of obtaining compensation under the Act. At the present time, the miners had their own societies, which were under the control of their own leaders. If this Bill were passed, there would be an excuse to them for not joining these societies; and it was necessary to have some such Amendment as he had proposed to prevent that occurring.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, he thought the Committee was much indebted to the hon. Member for the able speech in which he had brought forward this proposal. It had occurred to him that this was, perhaps, by no means a happy point in the Bill at which to raise the question of assurance. He made that observation, because, when he looked at the magnitude of this assurance question, he thought it would facilitate the discussion of the proposal if his hon. Friend would not raise a discussion then, but would wait until the proposal had been made for fixing the amount of maximum compensation. He hoped the Government would endorse the suggestion he had made, because they could not deny that this assurance question was one of vital importance. He believed that if the principle of assurance could be carried, three-fourths of the dread with which the Bill was now viewed would be removed. When the Committee came to discuss the proposal of the hon. Member for East

Mr. Robertson

Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes), to fix the maximum sum for the workmen's compensation, they would be in a better position than they now were to discuss the question of assurance. It was first necessary, however, to arrive at a decision upon that head; and he should, therefore, suggest that the present Amendment should be withdrawn, until they could deal with the question of assurance as a whole.

MR. DODSON said, that he wished to endorse the appeal of the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson). He thought it would be far better, and also for the sake of convenience, that the subject of assurance should be discussed on a substantive clause providing for it, rather than as an Amendment in the form of a sub-section to a clause. There was no desire, or intention, on the part of Her Majesty's Government to shrink from a full discussion upon this subject; but he felt that the course recommended by the hon. and learned Member for Coventry was that which it would be more convenient to take.

MR. ROBERTSON said, that, after the appeal that had been made to him, he should be happy to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, that the two hon. Members who had last spoken had, with considerable fairness, stated that they represented the employers on this question. He did not think that any hon. Member had a larger number of miners among his constituents than he had. He wished it to be clearly understood that the question of assurance, so far as the mining operatives were concerned, would be strongly and strenuously resisted. He hoped the Government would not give way upon this subject. This clause, which was going to be withdrawn, would be, practically, a means of inflicting a penalty on every prudent miner who insured in a provident society. But if, in the interests of the mineowners and of the mine workers, the Government could see their way to some means of recognizing the Coal Mines Regulation Act, and exempting mineowners from liability where the provisions of that Act were fully carried out, he thought it would be doing justice to all concerned. He would tell the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson), however, that any attempt to deprive the men of their legitimate right of compensation, by any system of compulsory assurance, would meet with very strenuous opposition.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the amount of compensation which might become due under this Bill was so enormous, that it could not be excluded from consideration in dealing with this subject. To take the case of the lamentable explosion at the Risca Colliery; if it could be proved there, that it happened through the negligence of any person employed in the mine, then, under the operation of this Bill, the owners would become liable for an enormous amount of compensation. He had been told by a competent authority that the amount for which the owners would have been liable in that case would not have been less than £28,000. This was an amount of penalty which was perfectly absurd; and if they meant to ensure compensation to any adequate amount to the miners, and to combine it with proper restraint of negligence, he, as a practical man, did not see how they could accomplish those objects without some system of assurance. He did not believe it would be practicable to inflict penalties of a perfectly exorbitant and ruinous nature upon persons who would have to suffer by the fault of those in their employ whom they had trusted. Therefore, he was strongly of opinion that, if the object of combining compensation for injuries with some restraint against negligence was to be carried out, it could not be done without some system of assurance.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, that he was present at a meeting on Durham Race Course. Between 40,000 and 50,000 miners of Durham, on Saturday, unanimously endorsed the principles of that Bill, but, at the same time, unanimously declared their hostility to any clause which would put upon them a system of compulsory assurance. The effect of the clause which was now proposed would be that if a man assured at all he should have no benefit under the Act.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, that he begged to move an Amendment which stood in the name of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill), in page 2, at the end of the clause, to insert, as a new paragraph—

"Provided always, and except in the cases and to the extent in this Act expressly provided for, nothing in this Act shall affect any rule of law relating to negligence, or to common employment, or to risk incident to a contract or employment."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that he thought the Committee would not accept the Amendment, as it was quite unnecessary.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL BARNE said, that he begged to move a new sub-section at the end of the clause. It was—

"Where the injury for which damage is claimed occurs through the drunkenness of such superior person, such superior person only shall be liable."

There was no doubt that even the most superior person might, at some time or other, get drunk. Many cases might happen in which, if this clause were inserted, a man would be liable to one servant through the negligence of another.

MR. DODSON said, that he thought the Committee would not accept the Amendment.

MR. WARTON said, that he thought it would be a very useful moral lesson against drunkenness.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 (Limit of sum recoverable as compensation).

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, that the next Amendment which he had to move, on behalf of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill), was one to which he did not think there could be any objection. Clause 3 provided—

"The amount of compensation recoverable for personal injury to a workman under this Act shall not exceed such a sum as may be found equivalent to the estimated earnings, during the three years preceding the injury, of a person in the same grade employed during those years in the like employment and in the district in which the workman is employed at the time of the injury."

That was intended to include the case of compensation payable to the legal personal representative of the workman in case of death; but he did not think that that would be the true construction of the Bill. It would simplify this clause very much if the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend were adopted, and the words "personal injury to a workman" were left out of the clause. It would then read "the amount of compensation recoverable under this Act in any action brought." He could quite understand that it might be said that the clause, as it stood, did not apply in the case of an injury resulting in death. He begged to move, in page 2, lines 22 and 23, to leave out "for personal injury to a workman."

Mr. Horace Davey

MR. DODSON said, that he had no objection to leave out those words.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. BARNES said, that if this clause were not amended, he ventured to say that there would be hardly a case of action brought in which it would not be almost impossible, or, at all events, very difficult, to find out what a man had received for three years. With the object of preventing litigation, he ventured to propose his Amendment, which fixed the sum to be paid as compensation at a sum not exceeding £100. Another advantage of adopting his Amendment would be that it would place the employer in such a position that he could insure himself. He would know exactly what his liability would be, and he would have a chance, by insurance, of relieving himself from it. He begged to move—

In page 2, line 23, after "exceed," to leave out to the end of the clause, and to insert "the sum of one hundred pounds; but nothing in this Act shall be construed as implying that the compensation ought in any case to amount to that sum."—(Mr. Barnes.)

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, that he did most earnestly recommend the principle of this Amendment to the favourable consideration of the Committee. He did not mean to say that the figure named by the hon. Member should necessarily be adopted, although it seemed not unreasonable, and there was a great weight of authority in its favour. But he would rather increase the figure, if that would induce Her Majesty's Government to lend a more favourable ear to the proposal. The mining interest was most to be considered in this matter, and he would briefly state the ground on which the principle of fixing some maximum sum commended itself to his mind. When he saw the course the discussion had taken in the Committee, and how very few in number were the advocates of the claims of the employers in that House, he thought the Committee would indulge him for a short time while he endeavoured to state the principle on which the fixing of the maximum sum was to be recommended. By this Act the liability of the owners of dangerous property were to be enormously increased. Millions of capital had been invested for the benefit of the community in coal mining and other enterprises; that capital had been productive of good to every class of the community—amongst others, he would venture to say, to the working men themselves. That capital had been invested on the faith of the existing law, upon which all the relations of the employers and employed had, up to the present time, been constituted and established. Urged by what the Government had considered a public necessity, and what he himself deemed, after the experience of the debates in that Committee, to have been an urgent public demand, the Government had thought it necessary to impose upon the capitalists engaged in those industrial enterprises this additional weight. Employers must submit; but it would be necessary to look to the consequences. Those hon. Members who, representing what they called the working man's point of view in this question; although he repudiated the idea that any one particular Member of that House represented the working man more than another; and he maintained that it was their common duty to consider the interest—not of any one class, but of all classes—he would appeal to those hon. Gentlemen who asserted that they represented the interests of the working classes to consider what would be the consequences to capitalists of this Bill. By this Bill, instead of the liability attaching to the employer only by his neglect, he was made responsible for the neglect of men in his employment. That would be done in the most dangerous trades, down to a very humble grade. Therefore, the capitalist was put in this position—that an accident might happen for which he was in no way morally responsible which, under this legislation, might impose upon him, in addition to the loss of his capital, a liability which might mean absolute ruin. They had lately had the sad experience of the Risca disaster. Up to this moment it had not been determined—and it, probably, would never be determined—what was the exact cause of that calamity; but it might have been caused by the neglect of some person in authority a little higher in knowledge than the working man himself; and what would have been the consequence of that negligence under the provisions of this Bill? One hundred and twelve lives had been lost by that explosion. The feeling that such a loss had happened in an enterprise for the profit of any individual would almost be enough to break the heart of the man for whom these colliers were working; and he could imagine nothing more terrible or painful than the feeling of the employer of labour, when he realized that in his employment, and for his profit, such a terrible accident had occurred. If that man was responsible, through neglect, or parsimony, or recklessness, for that disaster, there was no punishment too heavy for him. His conviction was that there was no such thing as a preventible accident. He believed every preventible accident to be a crime. But it must also be recognized that some accidents were not preventible. He appealed to every man who knew anything of this particular industry—to scientific men, and to the knowledge of the Government from their official Reports—whether it was possible totally to prevent accidents in mines; or, as another illustration, accidents at sea? Were there not industries, the necessary and essential conditions of which involved a certain percentage of accidents? They might, by legislation, reduce that percentage to a minimum; and by the Mines Regulation Act they had subjected employers to a supervision which was considered adequate. If it were not adequate, then he would say, in God's name, make it more so, as soon as possible, by making every possible provision. But after all that had been done, after every provision that had been made, it still remained certain that there must be accidents. That was the true answer to the observations of the hon. Member for Northampton, who said that when they were speaking of the consequences to the employers they should also remember the consequences to the widows and orphans. No man, with a heart in his breast, could think of anything but those widows when he heard of an accident. He would gladly see them provided for; and he hoped, out of the assurance clause which they would presently have to pass, efficient means of consoling those poor people in their terrible calamity would be provided. But why, when an accident was inevitable, was the burden to be thrown from one set of shoulders to another? What was the practical result? By the clause of his hon. Friend the Member for East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes), supposing this Risca explosion, for instance, were brought home to the owner, he would have to pay £100 for each man actually killed, or £11,200 in all. But they knew very well that there were many collieries which employed more than 112 men in each pit; and he did not think he was over-stepping the mark when he said that there were many collieries which employed in one shaft at one time nearly 1,000 men. Of course, if the accident did not happen from negligence, or from a breach of the statutory conditions, the employer was not liable. He never forgot that, and it was always present to his mind throughout the whole of his argument. But he maintained that there were many accidents in which the owner was just as innocent as if he had done nothing at all; yet, through the negligence of one of his servants, although there might not be the least moral liability, the workmen would still be able to recover damages from him, which would, practically, have almost the effect of ruining him. He was quite aware that the capitalist was not an object of consideration with the House. He had never heard him alluded to except with sneers or contemptuous pity. ["No, no!"] He had never heard anything said with regard to capitalists except observations as to their greediness, timidity, and the like; yet the House, notwithstanding those feelings, ought to be careful before it subjected them to legislation which might produce their entire ruin. Such a result would not benefit either the community or the working men. He knew he had troubled the Committee with a long exordium; but he felt so strongly on this point that he really was obliged to urge everything that could be said in favour of this proposition, which, in his mind, was the key of the whole Bill. They had now got to this point—that the mineowner might any morning find himself, without his will and against his power, involved in a statutory liability exceeding the whole amount of his fortune. The Committee ought to do what it could to reduce those evil consequences, and the only way was to let the mineowner know what the maximum amount was for which he would have to provide in case of an accident. They could only do that by putting some maximum sum into this Bill beyond which the mineowner could not, under any circumstances, be called upon to pay. Let them name any sum they pleased—£100, or £150, or even £200—and the mineowner would then endeavour to meet his liability by means of assurance companies. But if there were no maximum, the owner would be left at the mercy of the present clause in the Bill. The principle of limitation was quite right, for the Government felt that this liability ought not to be unlimited. Their suggestion bore every mark of amiable consideration; but, at the same time, it was deficient in practicability of application. The clause provided that the amount paid to the workman was to be equivalent to his estimated earnings during the three years preceding the injury of a person in the same grade. What was the meaning of the word "grade?" And let them think of the County Court lawyers, and how they would rejoice over the interpretation of this clause. He said, without hesitation, that that clause carried the largest and widest amount of litigation that he ever saw in any Bill. They might, by accepting his Amendment, give the owner the means of ascertaining what amount of compensation he would be liable to at the worst. But this clause, as it at present stood, did nothing of that kind. The fluctuations in the rates of wages were tremendous. It was notorious that men in the mining districts who, three years ago, were earning £4 or £5 per week, were now scarcely able to earn 25s., let them be ever so industrious. Then there were the men who were out on strike, and the innumerable other contingencies which would have to be taken into consideration, complicating the matter so much that he would defy any man to construe that clause and to declare what the maximum amount should be. He did not dispute the principle that lay at the back of it. His own experience was that three years of a man's average earnings was, in principle, by no means an unfair scale to fix. He did not know that he could himself fix a better scale than three years' earnings; but he did think it would be better that they should state an amount on which those earnings should be valued. His hon. Friend had suggested £100 as the maximum. Now, he thought, taking one year with another, that £1 a-week would be a fair and just wage of the labouring classes for whom this Bill was intended. He would, however, ask his hon. Friend the Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) to tell them exactly what the amount should be. If he said £100 was not enough, he would bow to his judgment, because he knew much better than he did what it should be; but he hoped his hon. Friend would help them to say what the limit should be. He did not care at all what the amount was, so that the employer did know, when the Bill passed, what was the possible worst that could befall him, and so be able to make himself safe against it. The Bill was not to come into effect until next January; and it might be that, in the interval, assurance companies would be established to protect owners from these risks. He hoped it might be so, for he knew no companies which at the present time could do that. But if there were no maximum amount put in the Bill, how could any owner sit down and calculate what would be his liability under the Bill, so as to fix a rate of premium at which these risks should be undertaken? Let the Government fix a sum that would be the worst, and then owners could provide against the evil by an adequate system of assurance. But if they left the Bill as it was drawn, he would defy any man to arrive at an adequate conclusion on the subject. Owners would, consequently, be put into terrible peril until they could find what the incidence of risk was. His hon. Friend (Mr. Craig) had brought out some very startling figures on this point; but he did not think, at present, he had established his figures as correct, and, until the truth of those figures was established, his observation remained that individual owners, no matter what the general average might be, were in a very unsatisfactory position. By inserting a fixed sum in the Bill, also, the temptation to litigation would be removed, and the Bill would be made as palatable to owners as it could possibly be made. He had heard it said that, by fixing a maximum, they invited people to claim compensation at that rate. Those interested would rather run the risk even of that than not have a maximum inserted in the Bill. That observation also would just as much apply to the maximum proposed by the Government as the fixed sum which he wished to have. The alteration he asked the Committee to make was quite consistent with the principle of the Bill. It was perfectly just to the working classes; it would be an advantage to owners; it would much facilitate the operation of the Bill; while it would go far towards removing the extreme anxiety and dread which many large interests undoubtedly did entertain in regard to the passing of this measure.

Mr. J. K. CROSS said, the hon. and learned Baronet who had just sat down had declared that capitalists regarded this Bill with great anxiety. He was himself a very large employer of labour, but he was not at all afraid of anything Parliament might do; and he wished to say that the hon. and learned Baronet was not quite accurate in declaring that nobody could assess the amount of responsibility which the Bill would place upon employers. He was not quite sure that he could exactly assess the responsibility of employers, because, at the present time, he was not sure how far the Government meant to go in accepting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. S. Morley); but, if he did not know that, he could tell almost exactly what responsibility would be placed upon employers by this Bill. For the purpose, however, of his argument, he would take the utmost responsibility which Parliament, in its wisdom, or in the supremest moments of its folly, and with all the energy of youthful inexperience upon it, could impose on the employer. They had, in the Records of that House, and in the statistics of the Mining Associations of Northumberland, Durham, and Lancashire, so many statistics with regard to the accidents in coal mines, that they had very trustworthy data to go upon. If they were to take the whole number of accidents which had occurred in those mines during a given period, and were to assess the amount of compensation which would be sufficient for each of those accidents, and then multiply them together, they would get the aggregate amount of compensation required, and also the average amount necessary. He assumed, also, that they could, by going into the statistics of other trades, arrive at what the liability would be under similar circumstances. He could speak for himself in regard to the cotton trade. He was himself very largely engaged in that trade, and was, probably, more dependent on the equable working of capital and labour than any other Member of that House; and he was prepared to say that the utmost liability which could be imposed upon an employer in the cotton trade would not exceed one-fifth of 1 per cent of the wages paid. That was even supposing an employer accepted liability for all accidents, whether they arose from carelessness of the sufferer or otherwise. If, however, the Government minimized the responsibility in the way it proposed to do, he did not think the burden would be very hard to bear. It had been said by a number of speakers that, with regard to the coal trade, only one-fourth of the accidents which occurred would come under the scope of that Bill. But, for his part, he did not believe it would be anything like that proportion; for his opinion was that certainly much more than four-fifths of the accidents were due to the negligence of those injured. If, then, they divided the total responsibility by four, they would fairly get the full responsibility imposed on employers by the provisions of this Bill. The hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Craig), in assuming the responsibility put on employers, estimated it at 6-10ths of 1*d.* per ton. He would rather prefer to take it as a percentage on the wages paid. He was himself connected with a colliery in which 2,400 men and 900 boys were employed; and he said, without hesitation, that a sum equal to 1½ per cent of the wages paid, laid aside, and accumulated into a reserve fund, would amply compensate for any accident, whether it arose from the negligence of the employer, or his foreman, or from the carelessness of the employed, or from any other cause whatever. Dividing that into four parts, the measure of responsibility laid upon the employer by this Bill was less than

3-8ths of £1 per cent, or about 7*s.* 6*d.* If they took the iron trade, they would find that compensation for all accidents would not be more than 15*s.* per cent, and that only 1-5th of those accidents came under this Bill, because 4-5ths of them were, so far as he could find, in no way within the scope of the measure. Surely 1-5th of 15*s.* per cent on the wages paid was not a very large sum for the employers to bear. In the trade to which he belonged—the cotton trade—and in which he was very largely interested, they minimized their risk to an exceedingly small amount. He wished to assure the hon. and learned Member for Coventry, who thought this responsibility was something more than employers would be able to bear, that he was taking a very fearful view of the case. Hon. Members, he noticed, were smiling at his idea of averages; but smiles, nevertheless, would not destroy arguments based upon facts. He was sure, also, that if the utmost liability were imposed, that companies would spring up, as they had done in Germany and Switzerland, which would accept these liabilities at very small sums indeed; and the result would be that everyone employed in industrial occupations would secure himself from liability by assurance at so small a rate that none of the employers would object to it. This question of assurance, though it had been proposed by several hon. Members, had not received any support from the Government. He did not ask that it should, for he did not, in the least, believe in compulsory assurance; but, still, he thought, that if employers had power to insure the workmen, it would be better. He had been told that they had not at present that power. He did not know whether that was so or not; but he surely thought they should be able to protect themselves and their workmen from any accidents which might possibly happen after the passing of this Bill. The hon. Member for Staffordshire (Mr. Craig) had defined assurance as a licence to commit murder. It was no more a licence to commit murder than a fire insurance was a licence to burn down their house.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, Order! It will be very difficult to discuss this Amendment, if we are also to discuss other large questions which are not connected with it.

Mr. J. K. Cross

MR. J. K. CROSS begged pardon. He had understood that the whole question of assurance was to be discussed on this Amendment. But with regard to the suggestion that the compensation should be limited to £100, it seemed to him to be utterly inadequate. He was inclined to advocate that a certain limit should be put on the compensation given; because, if it was altogether unlimited, the liability would be so uncertain, and it would be very troublesome to fix the sum against which the employer could insure. He knew of a case in his own neighbourhood, in which two young men put their capital, amounting to £9,000 or £10,000, into a colliery, and they borrowed in addition to this. After being at work a short time, they had an explosion, which caused a number of deaths. If, under this Bill, they had had to compensate directly those who were killed through the negligence of any foreman, there could not be any possibility of raising the money which would be necessary, even on the security of the whole of their interests in the colliery. But if an amount were fixed, for which the employers would be liable, the colliery owner would be able to insure against it; and, by so doing, the workmen would be sure that in any case if an accident happened the compensation to which they were entitled would be forthcoming. It was, therefore, exceedingly desirable that this question of limit should be well ventilated and thoroughly understood. He did not, at the same time, understand that there was any claim, even from the working men themselves, for a system of compulsory assurance. Again, if there was no limit, how was the damage done to be assessed? If a young unmarried man with no family was killed, he assumed that the damage would be assessed at a small amount; while if it was a married man with a large family, another amount, comparatively large, would be awarded. If, for instance, a guard upon a railway was to be compensated in the same way as a passenger, the Committee must consider at length whether that guard was married or single, because that would make all the difference in the world. Supposing two guards were killed, both of the same age, one married and one single; would the compensation be assessed at different amounts, or the same amounts? He hoped the Government would accept a maximum limit of £200 or £250, because then an employer would be able to protect himself, and the poor employer could guarantee to his workmen the amount of compensation which was given by this Bill.

MR. BROADHURST begged the Government not to accept this Amendment. No doubt, it would be exceedingly convenient for the capitalists if a money limit was put on their liability; but the hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) had said that they were not there to consider the defence of a class, or the special interests of certain men, but to do justice to the whole nation, without studying the special privileges of a few. That assertion answered and thoroughly disposed of the latter part of the hon. and learned Baronet's speech. For his part, he thought the logical course would be to omit the clause altogether; and he held in his hand a Petition from the Convention of the Royal and Parliamentary boroughs of Scotland, asking the House to do that; because, otherwise, the Bill would weaken the law of Scotland as it at present existed, and do the Scotch people great injustice and injury. Then, again, with regard to many limitations. It had always been the complaint of employers that certain classes of organized workmen demanded that labour should always be put at one rate of wages; but the charge was not true. Yet hon. Members, who started this Amendment, actually proposed to value all men at precisely one sum. ["No, no!"] Well, it was no use saying that, when the Amendment provided that no man should claim compensation beyond a certain sum. By that they did limit the value of every man to a certain sum. He had been asked if £1 a-week would not be a fair average of a workman's wages? It would be, perhaps, correct if they classed the whole of the working classes together—the crossing-sweeper with the highly-skilled mechanic, or the working artist. But the hon. and learned Baronet himself had strongly disclaimed against these general averages; and, for himself, he (Mr. Broadhurst) altogether repudiated being averaged with people who earned much lower wages. Was it common sense or justice to say that the labouring man, who was earning 10s. or 14s. a-week, should have compensation up to £150—and for him that was a pretty liberal proposition as an unskilled labourer, compared with what it would be for the artizan—and that the highly-skilled engineer or working artist, who earned £3 or £4 per week, should be also limited to £150 as the measure of his compensation? Such a proposition was altogether illogical and unjust. They did not limit the compensation to any other class of people except working men. If the principle was good, let the hon. and learned Baronet introduce a Bill to limit the amount of compensation that the travelling public could claim in railway accidents, and then bring the cases of working men under this Bill within the scope of that general law. What he objected to was special legislation for working men. He, and the class he represented, never asked for special favours in legislation, and they equally objected to special exclusion from just laws. He hoped the Government would not listen to this Amendment, although very interesting, and moderate, and well-argued speeches had been made in its support. He was certain that now nothing further could be said in its favour—and that was not saying a great deal, if the Committee would permit him the liberty of making that observation—and, therefore, he hoped they would now take a division.

MR. BIDDLELL said, as an employer of men earning a low rate of wages, he was quite satisfied with a maximum of £100; but, at the same time, he thought the only fair way of fixing the limit was to compensate men according to the loss of time they were likely to suffer. He could not, for a moment, think it fair that labourers on his farm should have the same compensation as skilled artizans. Of course, if the £100 was accepted as a maximum, he would say nothing more; but, for his part, logically, he felt that the compensation should merely be based on the wages of the workmen. It was fairer to the employer, also, to put it on that basis, for the profit of the employer in all trades was in proportion to the wages he paid. ["No, no!"] Well, he maintained it was so. Employers put down everything that they had to spend for materials; they added the cost of the labour, and then they put a percentage on the whole to represent their profits. Therefore, when higher wages were paid, the employer was in a better position to pay compensation than where the labourers merely received small amounts weekly. It might be thought, from the scantiness of the attendance on the Benches near him of those who were supposed to represent the agricultural interests, that this was not a question affecting the farmers very much; but, for his part, he was convinced that the liability of the farmers would far exceed that of the cotton trades, or the manufacturers who had spoken. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. J. K. Cross) had fixed the percentage on wages which it would cost him to insure, and he (Mr. Biddell) could only say he should be very happy to insure his liability, as a farmer, at half such amount. Besides, when this Bill was first brought forward, he thought he was only to be responsible for his overlookers; but he now found that he was not merely responsible for his men, but for his horses. It was very difficult to answer for a man, but it was far more difficult to answer for a horse; and, therefore, he hoped the compensation to be paid would be fairly limited.

MR. DODSON said, he had not risen before, because he was anxious to hear what the views of different hon. Members were; but, after hearing the different speeches, he must say that the Government adhered to the clause as it stood in the Bill. He would remind the hon. and learned Baronet behind him, that when he spoke of the enormous weight which this Bill imposed upon capitalists, that it was nothing compared with the weight which the laws of Germany and France imposed upon them. He had, also, in his speech, lost sight of the fact, to a great extent, that the Bill only made the employer liable for the neglect of persons in authority; and as to inevitable accidents, he would not have to compensate his workmen for them. He was also very glad to hear that, in all probability, before this Bill came into operation, insurance companies would be established. He was glad, also, to hear the very interesting speech of the hon. Member below the Gangway (Mr. J. K. Cross), and his testimony as to the amount of liability this Bill would impose. In adhering to the clause as it stood, he must confess that he did not quite follow the reasoning of the hon. Gentlemen who wished to have a fixed maximum of liability. If it was possible to insure against a fixed liability, why should not an employer who knew what his wages were insure against that? [Sir HENRY JACKSON: How can he tell what his wages will be?] He might remind the hon. and learned Baronet that the limit introduced in the Bill was for the past three years, and he would also beg him to remember that this particular clause was introduced into the Bill at the special request of the employers. The hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) had said that he would prefer no clause at all. But it must be remembered that it was an advantage to the workman himself to have a maximum fixed; because it would lead to compromises in the case of accident, and so, to some extent, prevent litigation.

Mr. GREGORY said, that they were then dealing with an injury that was supposed to have occurred, and providing a remedy. Notwithstanding what had fallen from his hon. and learned Friend opposite (Sir Henry Jackson), he must say that he thought the principle of the Government was right, and that the liability should be measured or estimated as an individual liability, and not as a liability for a class. It was impossible to take it as a matter of average; but it must deal with specific cases. On that principle, he did not see how they could hesitate to accept the clause. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) had admitted that the principle of the three years' earnings of the man was a reasonable one, and he failed to see how, in that case, the hon. and learned Gentleman could object to the clause.

Mr. NORWOOD said, it appeared to him that the argument of the hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) was fallacious, inasmuch as he seemed to argue as if the Bill only referred to one class of labourers—namely, those in mines. He appeared to forget the wide scope of the Bill, that it not only affected mines, but railways, and, indeed, every class. Remembering that, he could not help thinking that the clause of the Government was one that would have an equitable effect. Three years was, he thought, a fair limit at which to assess the wages of the labourers of this country as a class. He would venture to press upon his hon. Friend the Member for East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) to withdraw his Amendment.

Mr. GORST said, that, undoubtedly, the Government proposal was superior to that of the hon. Member for East Derbyshire. By voting for the Government, however, he was not committing himself to any principle of restriction. The restriction proposed was subject to two perfectly conclusive objections. First, that alluded to by the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst), that it would be exceptional legislation. It would create the very same kind of inequality as that which had given rise to the whole agitation in favour of a measure of that sort, and would perpetuate the injustice which they sought to destroy. Upon that ground, it seemed to him that there could be no exception to the limitation which would not be open to the gravest objection. Secondly, there was an objection to that clause, which he believed had not hitherto been noticed. It actually curtailed the existing rights of the workmen. At the present moment, for instance, if a workman was injured by a defect in the plant, resulting from the negligence of the employer, he was entitled to recover full compensation. There was no limitation to the right. As soon as that Bill passed, that right, at present perfectly complete, became subject to the limitation contained in that clause. Upon those two grounds—first, that the legislation was exceptional, and applied to workmen only; and, secondly, that it curtailed or deprived persons of rights now in existence, he thought the clause open to the gravest objection. Therefore, if a division were taken upon the Amendment, in voting with the Government he reserved to himself the fullest right hereafter of moving that the whole clause be struck out.

Mr. INDERWICK said, he should not have risen, but that he wished to point out that the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) were, he believed, not correct. He thought it would be found that there was nothing whatever in the course of that Bill which took away from workmen any right which they then had by any existing law. If a workman suffered an injury in consequence of the personal negligence of the employer, he was entitled to compensation. If killed, his employer was not only criminally liable, but also civilly, for any amount that could be recovered. The 2nd clause of the Bill stated the cases in which the right to compensation did not accrue, and the 3rd clause merely stated that the sum awarded as compensation should not exceed a certain amount. He would venture to say that the hon. and learned Member for Chatham was not right as regarded the curtailing of rights then in existence.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he fully agreed with what had fallen from his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham, that that clause ought to be cut out. If they looked at the 1st clause, they would see that it said "that a workman should have the same right of compensation as if he were not a workman," &c. That was, as if he were one of the public. That very day the Government had cut out Sub-section 3 of Clause 2, on the ground that its meaning was already contained in the Common Law. Whilst he certainly should vote against the Amendment, he should reserve to himself the right to vote against the clause subsequently.

MR. THOMPSON said, he wished to ask a question with reference to the law of insurance.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he should be glad to answer any question when they came to the question of assurance; but that was not the subject before them then.

Amendment negatived.

MR. BOLTON said, he wished to move the next Amendment. He thought the Committee would see that the principle of it was the same as that of the Bill. The only difference was as to the mode of ascertaining the amount of compensation. It was to take the three years' earnings preceding the injury, as compared with the average earnings in the same neighbourhood of a man in the same position. His sole object in moving the Amendment was to avoid litigation as far as possible. By adopting the Amendment, the expensive inquiry which must take place in order to ascertain the possible maximum compensation would be avoided. In fact, what he had suggested was the only possible means of ascertaining the amount of compensation, where the man died. He was very glad, indeed, that the Government had resolved not to name a fixed sum. He thought that would be most unjust and unfair. Hon. Gentlemen who proposed £100, £150, or £200, did not take into consideration the different rates of wages that were received. In the trade with which he was more particularly connected, many men earned, on the average, £150. He most entirely objected to any such limitation being inserted. He wished also for it to be distinctly understood, that while he approved of the principle adopted by the Government of granting a certain number of years as the maximum amount of possible compensation—which was one of the most valuable principles the Bill contained, and for which he, for one, felt grateful to the Government—still, he did not think that they had adopted the proper amount as the maximum compensation. For his part, he would have fixed it higher than three years. But, notwithstanding that, he had adopted the words of the clause in his Amendment, and that was one reason why he pressed it on the attention of the Government.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 23, after "sum," leave out to end of Clause, and insert "as may be found to be the equivalent of three years' earnings of the person injured, calculated, in the case of a person who has been for three years preceding the injury in the service of the employer, at the sum actually earned; and in the case of any person whose service has not extended to three years, at the rate actually earned during the term of service immediately preceding the injury."—(Mr. Bolton.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, that the difference between the clause of the Bill and the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Bolton) was entirely one of detail. The principle was the same; and if the Committee would allow their attention to be directed to the matter for a moment, they would see that it was almost necessary to maintain the clause of the Bill. The Government clause proposed that they should take an estimate of the labour of the three preceding years of the person employed. If the man were not in employ, then they were to take an estimate of the earnings of a person of the same grade employed during those years. It was necessary to use these general terms; for, otherwise, they would not be able to deal with cases where a man was not in employ for three years, or was out of work, or where, for instance, there were bad times at the end of three years and good times at the beginning. They could not deal with the matter, if they fixed the amount, for many considerations. Thus, it might be that there were two different grades of employment on account of the man being advanced, and then they would have to calculate both on the smaller and larger sum. For these reasons, it must be obvious that they must look at the question generally, and not fix a certain amount. His hon. Friend's Amendment really contained no material difference to that of the clause in the Bill. He suggested, that where the period of service had not extended to three years, "the rate should be that actually earned during the term of service immediately preceding the injury." But supposing wages were low at the time, or immediately before the injury was received, although not so previously, the rate would be calculated on a low basis, instead of an average one—they were bound to take an estimate for a more extended period. He hoped the Committee would not accept the Amendment.

Mr. Inderwick

MR. BOLTON said, he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman had misapprehended the meaning of his Amendment. The rate was that actually earned during the term immediately preceding. It was in the last line but one; and supposing, for instance, that the man had been in the service 6, 12, or 18 months, the amount of compensation would be calculated upon that.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): Yes; but suppose the man had only been in the employ six weeks?

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, that his hon. Friend the Member for Stirling seemed to forget that the man might be moving upward in rank during the first, second, or third year. In case he were moving backward, it would be just the same. The amount for compensation must be calculated upon the average rate for three years; then it would work exactly the same, whether the wages were rising or falling.

Amendment negatived.

MR. BARING said, he did not like the expression "estimated earnings." He should like to substitute "average wage paid." He begged to move that Amendment,

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 24, after "to the," omit "estimated earnings," and insert "average wage paid."—(Mr. Baring.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. BURT said, he had an Amendment on the Paper, the object of which was to increase the maximum amount of possible compensation. He wished to substitute "five years" for "three." In a recent case, where a passenger had been injured in connection with a railway accident, he had been awarded £13,000, based, he believed, on a calculation of five years' income. He had wished to oppose the clause altogether; but he had not done so, inasmuch as he had expected that a few concessions to employers would, perhaps, take away the exaggerated apprehensions of which they had had such evidence during the discussion on that Bill. But they had found that that was not so. Employers were still as hostile as ever to the Bill. If they were to have a limit, he thought as wide a margin as was fair and just should, at any rate, be allowed. He understood, from information he had received, that it was not at all an infrequent thing for the amount granted to be equal to five years' wages. On that account he begged to move his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 25, to leave out the word "three," in order to insert the word "five."—(Mr. Burt.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'three' stand part of the Clause."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he should like to say just a word with reference to the question of having any limit at all. It had been said that it was new legislation to lay down a limit as to the amount to be recovered. That was not altogether accurate, for they had precedents in legislation laying down a limit under circumstances precisely similar to the present. He could not help thinking that it was perfectly legitimate, when dealing with a question of that sort, where they were introducing a new head of liability which did not exist before, to introduce with it a limit, if a reasonable one could be found. And if there were no limit, generally speaking, they could be by no means sure that it was not the most reasonable thing to introduce some limit. He would proceed to refer to the precedent precisely in point. In case of damage or loss by reason of the navigation of a vessel, where there was negligence on the part of the servant, the liability was limited to a certain extent; but where there was no such negligence, it was not limited. Therefore, the law already made the distinction between the liability of a person where there was negligence on his part, and that where the negligence was on the part of the servant. He quite agreed that that limitation applied to all persons; but he did not say that that precedent should be followed exactly in the present instance. It appeared that there was another reason in favour of a limit being fixed, and to that he would call the attention especially of his hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt). It was in the interest of both employer and employed that it should be so. The one thing above all others to prevent was litigation—they wanted, in fact, to take away, or diminish, the chances of litigation as much as possible. He believed that if a limit were given it would reduce the chances of litigation; because, so long as the liability was left absolutely unlimited, they knew, by experience, the promises held out to litigants by those who took up their cases. If the defendant offered a sum, they would say, "Leave the matter in our hands, we will get you an amount far exceeding what anyone will offer you." The result would be that it would conduce to litigation, and the only persons who would really benefit would be the lawyers. That was certainly what they wished to discourage in that Bill. Speaking, then, generally on the question of limit, he would say that it would reduce litigation, and be quite as much in the interests of the employed as of the employer. With reference to the particular limit, he would observe that it was always, in fixing a limit, extremely difficult to say what it should be. There was no absolute reason why it should be a particular number of years, any more than one more or less. He thought he should best explain that limit if he were to tell the Committee that it had been based on general experience. In cases where there been permanent injury received, juries usually awarded three years' wages. It was occasionally more and occasionally less; but that was the average. The hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt) had stated that £13,000 had been given in the case of a railway accident based on a calculation of five years. The sum awarded in that case was £16,000, and it was shown that the injured man had been in receipt of £5,000 a-year. That, therefore, only went to show that the basis of the calculation of the Government was the usual one. A great deal had been said on both sides; but he believed that the terms of the clause were as much in the interest of the employer as the employed. Of course, in a great number of cases they would not reach the limit, or anything like it; and those matters must be left open to be treated according to the nature of the accidents that occurred and the injuries that were received. In conclusion, he might say that he thought it was in the interests of both parties that a fair and reasonable limit should be fixed; and he hoped that he had been able to convince the Committee that the limit fixed in the clause was such an one, and one that had, in fact, been based on actual experience of decided cases.

DR. WEBSTER said, that he had great pleasure in supporting the Amendment.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, that, generally speaking, much less would be given by juries than the amount fixed by the Bill—namely, the average earnings of the injured man for the previous three years.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, that three years was fixed as the maximum in this case, because that was the compensation which juries generally gave in such cases.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, that the admission of the hon. and learned Gentleman made their case stronger than ever, and he would instance the case of the Irish Land Act. When, 10 years ago, the House was discussing the maximum amount of compensation to be given under that Bill, it seemed to be assumed by hon. Gentlemen that the maximum allowed by the Bill—seven years—would be given. The fact was, that Judges had given, on an average, only three, and two and three-quarter years' compensation. He hoped the Committee would not be alarmed by the idea that juries would give enormous compensation. What was it that the Amendment proposed? It proposed that if there were some exceptional cases, in which the merits and the justice of the case were so plain, that in a case where a jury would now give five years' compensation, this clause should not prevent its giving the additional two years' compensation. He thought that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Morpeth ought to be adopted; although he agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General that there was a good deal to be said as to the introduction of some limit to the compensation. He would appeal to the Committee to accept the Amendment of his hon. Friend, for he believed that it would be found to work extremely well and to meet many exceptional cases.

The Solicitor General

MR. HINDE PALMER said, that he agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General that it was right that some limit should be fixed to the amount of compensation to be given. If no limit were fixed a great amount of litigation would take place. In 1870, he served on a Committee with reference to compensation for railway accidents. There were on that Committee several hon. Members of very considerable experience in that House, both on legal matters and with reference to railway accidents. That Committee was originated by railway interests with the object of having special tribunals appointed for the trial of railway cases; and it was very strongly contended that there should be some limit to the liability of the Companies. The Committee examined Lord Justice (then Mr. Baron) Bramwell, Mr. Baron Martin, Sir James Hannen, and other Judges, who were in the habit of trying these cases of compensation for railway accidents. Mr. Baron Bramwell, on being asked if he thought it desirable to have a limit, said that he did not think that the damages generally given were excessive; and, on the contrary, that he was much surprised at their moderation. Still, the Committee, in which the railway interest was well represented, came to a conclusion in favour of fixing some limit. They fixed upon the limit of £1,000 for first-class passengers; £500 for the second-class; and £300 for the third-class passengers. If the average rate of wages were taken, he thought it would be found that the limit of £300 was a very fair sum to fix as the amount of compensation to be paid to a third-class passenger. Judging from the class which formed third-class passengers, it seemed to him that £300 represented five years' earning more nearly than three. It should be remembered also that five years was only fixed as a maximum, and it did not follow that that maximum would be given in all cases. In the belief that £300 represented five years' earning of a working man at the average rate of wages, he should certainly support the Amendment if it went to a division.

MR. CARBUTT said, that he should certainly support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Morpeth. There were many cases in which the limit of three years for the earnings would not be fair compensation. If they took the class of apprentices, a young man of 20 might be receiving only 10s. or 12s. a-week; but in a short time he would probably be earning very much more. In such cases the limit of three years would not cover the average earnings of those men. If they took the case of the railway locomotive drivers they would see that a similar argument applied. Those men commenced by being cleaners. They were then drivers for a short time on a goods train, and then they were made drivers on a passenger train. He thought it necessary to increase the maximum of five years, in order to give those men a proper chance of obtaining compensation.

MR. GREGORY said, that they were by that Bill imposing a liability for injury to their servants, and the question was to what extent they should impose it. It had been said that three years' compensation was the general sum given by a jury in cases of accident. He thought it was upon the principle well known to all men of business that three years was about the average purchase of any business requiring skill. He supposed that three years was about the maximum rate of purchase of any business of that character. That being the principle upon which a jury arrived at its decision, he thought that it was a very fair limit for the Committee to fix as the maximum rate of compensation.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that he could not give a silent vote upon this question. He thought it quite right that some limit should be fixed of compensation. The more one looked into this matter, however, the more it would be found that the only practical solution of the question was the abolition of the doctrine of common employment. He did not, however, think that the country was yet ripe for that solution of the question. Still, he was sure that the question would never be satisfactorily settled on any other basis than that. He thought, however, that the question before them then was only the amount of compensation to be fixed, and that three years, as proposed by the Government, was the proper maximum.

MR. DALY said, that they were fixing the maximum rate of damages for injuries sustained by servants at three years' compensation, on the ground that strangers to the employers usually received three years, although it was perfectly true that they might receive a great deal more. He wished to know why that injustice was to be perpetrated? Was it reason or justice that the victim of a terrible injury sustained by the negligence of his fellow-servant should have his compensation limited to three years? He thought the Amendment of the hon. Member for Morpeth was very moderate, and he should certainly support it.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 164; Noes 71: Majority 93.—(Div. List, No. 92.)

MR. ANDERSON said, that he now wished to raise the question whether a limit of any kind, such as made in this clause, ought to be made. He thought it was not right to fix such a limit in this Bill, as it was new in principle, and it was not expedient to introduce a system which would affect the working classes, and none other. If the limitation was right, then there ought to be a limit fixed in the case of all accidents. Then there would be some reason for it; but it was not fair to begin only with one class. This clause limiting the amount of compensation would be unfair in relation to the workman, and he did not think it was altogether fair to the employer. It would be unfair to the employer, because the tendency would be to work up to the maximum amount. In many cases that would result very unfairly to the employer, and in others unfairly to the workman; and he thought it in every way better to leave each case to be judged on its own merits, either to be settled by arrangement or by a jury. For these reasons, he begged to move that the clause be omitted.

Amendment proposed, to leave out Clause 3.—(Mr. Anderson.)

MR. GORST said, that he did not mean to repeat the observation which he made some time ago; but he should like to make some remarks upon the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General. The hon. and learned Gentleman failed to show that there was any precedent in our legislation for applying a restriction to one particular class of persons, as was the case in the present Bill. It was true he produced a precedent for the limitation of compensation generally; but he gave none whatever in our legislation for applying restrictions to one class alone. He left the Government to judge how extremely unpopular a restriction would be, which would apply exclusively to workmen. As to the observations of the hon. and learned Member for Rye (Mr. Inderwick) that the Bill did not take away the Common Law right to sue an employer for personal negligence, that was perfectly true; but the effect would be that one man who sued at Common Law would get full compensation, and another man who sued under the Act would only get partial compensation. Where the employer was not guilty of personal negligence there would be no such option to sue at Common Law, and the compensation would be limited by the terms of this Act. With respect to the practical working of this clause, so far as children were concerned, the compensation would be limited to three years' wages, although the injury might be one which would maim the child for life. In manufactories children were employed at almost nominal wages; and the compensation given by this Bill, if restricted to the average earnings for three years, would be utterly inadequate. A child, therefore, might receive a terrible injury, and only recover an almost nominal sum in respect of it. That was the practical difficulty which would occur if this Bill became law. When two or three cases had occurred in which young children maimed for life by dreadful accidents had been compensated in this inadequate manner, there would be such an outcry that some further alteration of the law would be absolutely necessary.

Mr. Gregory

Dr. WEBSTER objected to the Amendment. He did not at all understand that the Bill was brought in as a matter of favour to working men, but as a matter of justice; and, therefore, the proposals in the Bill should be carried out not grudgingly, but fairly and generously. The clause before them, and those which immediately followed, were contrary to that principle. They had heard a good deal, during the course of the debate, of the evils of litigation. He was not afraid of them, because to prevent litigation was very often to shut the door of the legal tribunals against certain parties. Some of the clauses in this Bill would have very much that effect. While, therefore, he thoroughly approved of the general scope of the Bill, and gave it his warm support, on this particular point he should vote with the hon. Member.

Mr. SERJEANT SIMON said, the clause was quite at variance with the object of the Bill. The measure, at present, gave a right of action to persons who did not now possess that right; and it had been stated, over and over again, in the course of the discussion, that the object of the Bill was merely to extend to those persons the Common Law rights which others enjoyed. In doing that they should surely be consistent, and enable working men to enjoy exactly the same advantages as other persons. As his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had said, in the case of young persons the Bill would work a grievous hardship, because, by its present provisions, they would be entitled to next to no compensation at all. Then in the case of adults, too, he believed that much injustice would be done, and that if the clause were struck out altogether, and the whole matter was left to the Judge and jury to determine, they would decide on precisely the same grounds and proceed on the same lines as this Bill now did; while they would be able to do justice in particular cases when special circumstances arose. The jury would only seek to give compensation according to the position in life of the person claiming. They would consider his actual positive loss, and they would not seek to overburden the employer. He thought there was a good deal of groundless alarm felt on this point. Where juries gave excessive damages the Courts would cure the evil and remedy the injustice. This clause was against the whole principle of the Bill; and he should, therefore, feel bound to support the hon. Member.

Mr. EDWARD CLARKE said, hon. Members were anxious to put this clause in the Bill, because it would limit the amount of compensation; but he rather doubted whether that would be the principal result. In his opinion, the tendency would rather be to make the three years' earnings an ascertained valuation of the damage; and it would encourage litigation, because, instead of the amount of damage being left absolutely as a matter of speculation, his solicitor would always tell the injured workman that he was entitled to three years' wages, and he would have a very good excuse for holding out expectations that the man would get that. Another reason why this ought not to apply was, that it affected not only cases where a man had been disabled by injury, but where his legal personal representatives were suing after the man himself had been killed. In such cases he could quite conceive that three years' compensation would be a very inadequate provision. It would certainly be given, however, in every case under the Bill, because nobody would be able to say there was any reason for not giving that full amount. He voted against putting in five years instead of three, because he believed that would merely be to extend the measure of damages, and that the employers would always be called upon to pay. For the same reason, he should vote for this proposition to leave out the clause, because he believed that was the fairest way to treat the matter.

Sir DAVID WEDDERBURN pointed out that if this clause passed the rates of the working men in Scotland, which had already been restricted by the Bill, would be still further limited. He should vote, therefore, with his hon. Friend.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said, the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) seemed to be of opinion that the Bill would promote litigation, because the solicitor would say to his client that he would be sure to get three years' compensation; but if there was no limit at all, then an unscrupulous solicitor would be able to hold out the most golden hopes to the workmen, and no one would be able to check any lure he might suggest. The working man, therefore, would be far more likely to go to law, if the amount he might obtain was absolutely unlimited, than if the solicitor was forced to tell him that he could not get more than three years' wages. He proposed, therefore, to vote with the Government.

MR. NORWOOD said, he could not help acknowledging that some injustice would be done where children or young persons were injured whose wages were very small, because they would get scarcely anything; and he would, therefore, suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he should undertake to insert some words on Report which would meet such cases.

Question put, "That Clause 3, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 204; Noes 74: Majority 130.—(Div. List, No. 93.)

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Limit of time for recovery of compensation).

MR. DODSON said, he had a proposition to make to the Committee which he hoped would save time and enable them to pass this clause. There were two Amendments on the Paper, one in the name of the hon. and learned Member for Rye (Mr. Inderwick), and another in the name of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), both proposing to extend the time within which the workman should give notice to his employer that he intended to ask compensation for his injuries. There would be some difficulty as to that. Machinery would have to be provided as to whom the notice should be given. The employer might be abroad. On the other hand, Her Majesty's Government thought the limit in the clause—namely, that notice should be given within six weeks after the injury—was unduly short. There was an Amendment on the Paper by his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), proposing that notice should be given of an action within three months of the injury. They thought that was a fair term, and they were ready to accept that Amendment. If his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Stockport and his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rye would agree to that, the Amendments might be disposed of. He proposed to omit the words "six weeks" in order to insert the words "three months."

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 31, to leave out the words "six weeks," in order to insert the words "three months."—(Mr. Dodson.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'six weeks' stand part of the Clause."

MR. HOPWOOD said, he thought the proposition was very fair, and, so far as he was concerned, he was ready to accept it.

MR. INDERWICK said, he introduced his proposition because he thought it would prevent a certain amount of litigation. If the Government were ready to accept these "three months" he did not see why they should object to it.

MR. CHARLES PALMER said, the Amendment seemed to him directly contrary to the other proposals of the Bill, and it was surely very hard that an employer should not know until three months after an injury that he was to be liable to an action. The working men themselves knew how important it was to have immediate notice; for, according to the rules of the Northampton and Durham Association, notice was required of any claim within three days, and many other Associations of the same character had a similar rule. The effect of this extension would, practically, be to allow time to get up the case; and while an employer might not object to the claim being made against him, he certainly would object to all this time expiring before he was aware of what he would have to meet. He thought even six weeks was going too far.

MR. NORWOOD said, notice ought to be given of any action as soon as possible, as, otherwise, how could an employer make inquiry and ascertain what were the facts? Three months seemed to him highly unjust. A man, surely, would know within six weeks whether he wanted to bring an action or not. For his part, even that period seemed to him too much, while three months was a gross injustice.

MR. RYLANDS said, the Government had undertaken to report Progress at half-past 11, yet they had now sprung upon the Committee a sudden change in their own Bill. As the time named had now been reached, he would suggest that Progress should be reported, in order that they might consider the change that was made.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Mr. DODSON said, he would not for a moment resist that proposition; but, as a fact, he proposed his Motion before half-past 11, in the hope that it would be immediately accepted. He begged to move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Dodson.)

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, when this suggestion for reporting Progress was made in the afternoon the Committee was not in the humour for a long argument as to the merits of the proposal, and the persistent way in which the Welsh Members kept dragging the red herring of the Welsh Sunday Closing Bill across the scent diverted attention. It was a most extraordinary thing, and one which many Members were ready to resist, that after they had been engaged in the discussion of a Bill all the evening they should suddenly stop at such an early hour, in order to take up another question. ["Divide, divide!"] He hoped the Committee would allow him a few moments in which to explain the position of affairs. The noble Marquess wanted them to report Progress. For what purpose? Merely that the House might have the pleasure of assisting in what would be nothing more nor less than an Irish row. What was the good of discussing a matter which had been already settled, and which the Government declared they would not alter?—not that he paid much attention to their declarations. He could not believe, if the Government pressed this proposal for reporting Progress, that they were in earnest in their desire to pass the Employers' Liability Bill; and if they did press the proposal it would justify him and his Friends in putting their own construction on the matter, and shaping their course accordingly. If this was a sample of the way in which the noble Marquess proposed to conduct the Business in the absence of the Prime Minister it was a very unsatisfactory one; for he was perfectly certain that if the Prime Minister had been in the House — and it only showed how they ought to deplore his absence—and if he had understood the matter he certainly would not have agreed to the proposition. He would tell the noble Marquess, and those who supported him in this proposition, that they were actuated in their proposal only by fear of the Irish Party, and what they might do in order to prevent progress with other Government Business. If the noble Lord thought by such a step as this he was going to get the House easily to consent to sit on a Saturday he was labouring under a very great error; for hon. Members near him, and he himself, after what had passed, would avail themselves of every opportunity to prevent Government Business being taken at a Saturday Sitting.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) could put what construction he pleased on his action. It was not worth while wasting time by answering his allegations. He was perfectly at liberty to attribute the action of the Government to the fear of the Irish Party, or to any other reason that he chose. He (the Marquess of Hartington) was himself, however, also at liberty to say that the action of the Government had been taken because they thought that the question to be brought before the House by the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) should be allowed a discussion. The position of that hon. Member and his Friends was a reasonable one; and, if this Commission was to be discussed at all, it was most desirable that it should be discussed at an early moment. If the noble Lord had any suggestion to make by which the discussion could be taken more conveniently than now—[LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Take it on Saturday.]—he could explain it to the hon. Member for Longford, and get him to accept it. He trusted the Committee would not be led into a discussion which could only result in waste of time. Even if his right hon. Friends had not proposed to report Progress now, within the next half hour, the noble Lord, or some of his Friends, would inevitably have made the same Motion; and, therefore, the time that would be lost was not serious.

But, at all events, there was no prospect, after the Motion, that they should go on with the Bill that night; and, therefore, they had better at once decide the matter. He could not say what course the noble Lord might take; but he could assure the Committee that in what the Government had done their single object had been to give a fair opportunity to the Irish Members to discuss that important matter.

MAJOR NOLAN said, the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill) had certainly achieved his object of preventing the Irish discussion being taken at a time when it would be reported. He believed that was the only object with which he had made his speech, and he had attained it. The noble Lord had acted as he had done without consulting the Irish Members with whom he used to act five or six years ago. And he could tell the noble Lord, who probably knew very little now of the feeling of Ireland, that at least half the country did object very strongly to this Commission.

MR. J. K. CROSS thought it was very unfortunate that the Committee should be broken in upon at a time like this; but that was not now the question. As had been well said, it would be absolutely impossible to go on with the Bill, because some hon. Members, relying on the proposal of the noble Marquess, had gone away. Therefore, the only reasonable and rational course was to accept the proposition which had been made, and which, if opposed at all, ought to have been opposed earlier in the evening.

MR. WARTON complained that the noble Marquess had paid little attention to the practical suggestion he made earlier in the afternoon, that this ridiculous discussion should be taken on Saturday.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

MOTION.

LAND ACT, 1870 (COMMISSION).

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY rose to move—

The Marquess of Hartington

"That an humble Address be presented to the Crown, praying Her Majesty to reconstitute the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the working of the Land Act of 1870, in such a manner as to afford by its composition an adequate representation to the tenant farmers of Ireland."

The hon. Member said: Mr. Speaker, after the somewhat exciting little episode to which we have just been treated, I am afraid the statement I have to make will seem somewhat dull, prosaic, and uninteresting; but I can assure the House that the question to which I wish to direct attention is most important, and that, viewed in its proportions, it is, at least, as important to Ireland as that which its discussion has interrupted is important to England. I need hardly tell the House that the Land Question is of absolutely vital importance to the whole of the people of Ireland; and as it is to be put in the direction of settlement by the Government through the medium of the Land Commission, the constitution and composition of that Commission assumes an unspeakable importance in the eyes of the Irish people. I know there are some people in Ireland who believe that the appointment of the Commission is only a way of postponing legislation, and is, in fact, a kind of craft and delusion practised by Her Majesty's Government. I ought to say at once for myself that that is a view in which I do not share. I am satisfied that the Government proposed the Commission, sincerely believing that in that way they could mark out a path for the settlement of this most important question of land tenure in Ireland; but I can hardly help marvelling at the kind of simplicity with which the Government propose to approach a settlement of the question by the appointment of a Commission such as that which has been named. I have nothing whatever to urge against any of the distinguished Gentlemen who form the Commission—that is to say, individually I have had no reason to suggest why any or all of them should not be appointed on an Irish Royal Commission; but what I hope to make clear to the House is that, taking them altogether, they offer no reflex and no representation of the great bulk of public opinion, but that a Commission exclusively thus formed shuts out the representation of that part of public opinion most deeply and closely interested in the settlement of the Land Question. Let us see who are the Members of the Commission. First, we have the Earl of Bessborough—who is, I believe, a liberal and most excellent landlord, and against whom I have no word to say. Then comes Mr. Baron Dowse, a distinguished Irish Judge; then the O'Connor Don, lately a Member of this House, and Mr. Kavanagh, also lately a Member of this House; and, lastly, comes my esteemed Friend the Member for Cork County (Mr. Shaw). Now, the first thing that will strike anyone in the consideration of that Commission is that the great majority of its Members are landlords. Let me add that two of them are, by their own avowal, distinctly opposed to that kind of land reform which is at the heart of the great majority of the tenant farmers of Ireland. It is not unworthy of notice that the O'Connor Don and Mr. Kavanagh both lost their seats in their own counties at the late Election because they were opposed to the majority of their constituents on that very question of land reform. Well, then we have Baron Dowse, and I have been reminded more than once that Baron Dowse took a leading part in the working of the Land Act of 1870 through this House. I am not very certain whether that really is a recommendation of Baron Dowse for a Commission which proposes to inquire into the means of extending and improving the Land Act. I say it with sincere regret, but with full conviction of the justice of what I say, that save for its intention, and for the indication it gave to the Irish occupier of land, that he was entitled to some share of ownership in the soil—save for these merits alone, the Land Act has been a failure in Ireland. Well, then, it is not impossible that Baron Dowse, having helped to carry through the Land Act, might, like other artists, have become enamoured of the work of his hands, and might, like other artists falling in love with their own work, have been especially taken with its defects and its mistakes; and it is not impossible that he might prove a less satisfactory Member of the Royal Commission than a man who had had no responsibility for the work of previous legislation. To me, at all events, it seems as if the magic of song, which drew iron tears down Pluto's cheek, would have wrought a less wonderful effect than the influence which could extract a great scheme of extended land reform from an Irish Judge of the school of Baron Dowse. No Commission to inquire into the Land Question in Ireland could be complete or adequate which did not include my hon. Friend the Member for Cork County; but everyone knows that my hon. Friend is neither a tenant farmer, nor represents the opinions of tenant farmers generally, or the more advanced and comprehensive views on land reform which every day find new favour amongst the Irish tenant farmers. My hon. Friend the Member for Galway City (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) once described my hon. Friend the Member for County Cork (Mr. Shaw) as representing the low-water mark of Irish national opinion on the Land Question, and my hon. Friend the Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) as representing the high-water mark of that opinion. That, as a matter of fact, was a just and accurate description. Let the House consider the kind of Commission we have got. It comprises five Members; and of these three are landlords, two of them strongly and openly committed against the opinions which the Irish tenant farmer favours—one of them especially distinguished of later months by a keen and prolonged controversy on that very subject with my hon. Friend the Member for Cork City. Besides these, there is one Irish Judge who, since he left this House, has taken no interest in the Land Question. Then there is my much esteemed Friend who represents the low-water mark of public opinion amongst Irish tenant farmers. I ask any hon. Gentleman, no matter what his opinions are respecting the extreme views of land reforming in Ireland, whether that is a Commission which fairly represents and appeals to the feelings of the Irish people, or is likely to draw from them confidence, support, and testimony? There is the hard, unmistakeable fact that the two litigants in this dispute are the Irish landlords and the Irish tenant farmers. On this Commission the Irish landlords have three direct Representatives, and probably one indirect Representative; and what have the Irish farmers? No representation whatever—no manner of representation whatever. Passing from classes to opinions, I would remind the House that there is growing fast in Ireland, and perhaps quite as fast in England, a certain school which maintains that the landlord right, or supposed right, has been pushed too far of late years, and is untenable in the face of our modern civilization. I do not ask that injustice should be done to any landlord in Ireland; I am no advocate of any measure of confiscation in any interest; but if supposed interests have, through tradition, through the unnoticed lapse of years, through a variety of circumstances, grown and outgrown so as to interfere with and overshadow the interest of the great bulk of the community, the principle on which civilized society rests, and always must rest, is that the supposed interest of the few must give way to the interest of the many. The opinion is growing in Ireland, as well as in England, that the right, or supposed right, of the landlord has outswelled its proper place in civilized society. There are, then, in Ireland, now, two antagonistic classes and two antagonistic sets of opinions. There is the opinion that the landlord's right, as known by tradition, is a kind of Divine right, sanctioned by law and justice, and must stand untouched at any cost; there is the other opinion that the landlord's power has outgrown its proper place in society, and the time has come when it must be modified in the interests of the tenants and the whole population. What representation has this latter opinion on the Commission? It has no representation whatever. Surely a Commission so constituted cannot be fairly said to give satisfaction to the Irish people, and cannot be expected to win their confidence or draw from them the expression of their genuine opinion. When I asked the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether he would not alter the conditions of the Commission so as to give an adequate representation to the Irish tenant farmers, the answer I received seemed to me curiously unsatisfactory. The right hon. Gentleman said his object in appointing a Commission was not only to get at the opinions of certain eminent gentlemen, however valuable they might be, but to get at the facts, so that the Government might be able to form an opinion for themselves. The right hon. Gentleman also said he was convinced he had selected men of fair and impartial mind, who were likely to report the facts without prejudice or prepossession. But I will ask any hon. Member whether a Commission can be considered satisfactory, simply because the Gentlemen who form it are personally honourable and straightforward? Sydney Smith said well that the wit of man never had devised a better way of getting at the truth in any disputed matter than by allowing one man to ask all the questions that could be asked on the one side, and another man on the other. As in a Court of Law, so it ought to be in a Commission. Both classes of opinion should be fairly heard. The Irish Members do not want a sham inquiry, they want a genuine inquiry; and they want on this Commission those who do not admit the utter view of landlord right, as well as those who speak up for the landlords and belong to the class themselves. Without mentioning any names, I may say that not the least doubt or difficulty need rest upon the mind of any Member as to our capacity for suggesting sufficient and adequate representatives of the tenant farmer class if we are only given a chance. I know it has been said that the thing is done and cannot be undone. I refuse to believe that Her Majesty's Government are so pertinaciously or stolidly wedded to the present composition of this Commission that they are absolutely not open to any reason or argument. But if the Chief Secretary for Ireland really dreads the responsibility of re-organizing the Commission, then I ask the House to step between him and that responsibility which he fears, and admit that there is obvious justice in my demand that a Commission like this shall not be forced upon the Irish people. We have heard a great deal about the Irish Land League. It may be that the Land League holds and publishes illusory and dangerous opinions. I do not say so; but many Members of this House seem to look with great alarm on its constitution, its mission, and its character. If such alarms be justifiable, what can be a more useful work on the part of a Royal Commission than to show the Irish people where the Land League is leading public opinion in a wrong and dangerous way? But does any hon. Member imagine that a proclamation that its opinions are illusory and its action wrong will have the slightest effect on those over whom the Land League now holds the greatest control, if it comes from a Commission composed of three landlords and a Judge? There was a Commission sent out to report on the condition of public opinion in the North American Colonies just before their revolt, and it listened to such evidence as came to it, and it reported there was not the faintest intention amongst any considerable body of persons to ask for separation from the Mother Country, and the Report got home here just before the Declaration of Independence. I fancy the Commission now to be appointed will make a somewhat similar Report in regard to Ireland. The very class whose purposes, claims, and grievances we wish to be informed about will hold aloof, just as they did when the sham Commission was sent to the American Colonies. Such a Commission will not advance us one step towards the settlement of the question. It will rather put us back; because there will only be a new body of worthless evidence on which to set up a new scheme of mistaken legislation. I earnestly urge the House to interfere between the Irish tenant population and a Commission of this kind. I ask the House to bear in mind that just now the Irish tenant population has a special claim on the care of Parliament. I ask the House to remember what has occurred but lately in "another place." I would appeal to the Government and to the House not to add to that great act of wrong, not to cap that climax of class selfishness; not to force on the Irish tenant population the conviction that they have no hope of justice from either Chamber of the Imperial Parliament.

Mr. Justin M'Carthy

MR. ASHTON DILKE, in seconding the Motion, said, that while the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) was, no doubt, in a position to know more of the composition of this Commission than an ordinary Englishman, it might not be out of place for one who had no partiality in the case, and who had no interest at heart except that of the nation at large, to say a few words on the subject. The chief point that struck him (Mr. Ashton Dilke), on looking at the composition of the Commission, was that it included three Gentlemen who had at one time or another been Members of that House. Baron Dowse was one of the chief promoters of the Land Act of 1870; but the two others could claim no such distinction. They were both Members who had lost their seats through showing themselves in opposition to the clearly-expressed wishes of the Irish people on the question of land reform. Well, on the whole, he was not sure that he did not prefer the practice of the late Conservative Administration with regard to Members who had ceased to have the confidence of their fellow-citizens. It might not be a very logical practice to say that, because a Member had failed any longer to command that confidence, he should ipso facto be asked to prepare legislation which he was no longer in a position to support in the House of Commons. But, as far as the practical question was concerned, he was not sure that any particular harm resulted; whereas the practice of the present Government of making them Members of an important Commission might lead to considerable harm. There were two ways in which the Commission might report. It might report either in favour of a comprehensive measure of land reform, or against such a measure. The Government, no doubt, wished it to report favourably, and probably their principal motive in appointing it was that such a Commission, reporting in favour of land reform, would possess an authority which no other Commission could lay claim to. But that was taking an extremely hopeful view of the situation. He would ask the Government whether, if the Commission did not report favourably, there was any chance of their Report having any attention paid to it. The hon. Member for Longford said—"Take the case of the English Land Commission appointed not long ago;" but he might have made his case stronger while he was about it. The late Government did not dare, or, at all events, did not care, to neglect the interests of the tenant farmers, though, perhaps, if they had the appointment of that Commission now, they would not show the same zeal in that direction. Several tenant farmers accordingly were appointed to the Commission; but a good many Radicals pressed the Government hard to obtain some representation of the interests of the labouring classes, and it was deemed, at one time, likely that a man whose voice he hoped to hear within those walls would be included. He meant Joseph Arch. The case, however, broke down, and no representative of the labourers was appointed. In Ireland the case was stronger, because there the tenant farmer combined in himself the interests of the tenant farmer and the labourer as well. It was, therefore, all the more necessary to secure, on behalf of the farmers of Ireland, a fair amount of representation on the Commission now in question. The Government, he fancied, appointed the Commission before they were absolutely certain that the Irish Disturbance Bill would be rejected by the House of Lords; and they had, perhaps, shown a little too much tendency to conciliate certain people who absolutely refused to be conciliated. They had a specimen of that tendency during the debate on the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill in that House. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) delivered one of the few sound speeches they had heard on the subject, and the Government at once showed an anxiety to minimize and repudiate as far as possible the view which the hon. Member for Burnley had expressed. The Radical Party during the discussions on that Bill showed a great deal of consideration for the Government by abstaining from speeches; but whether it would not have been better to have spent a few hours more then with the probability of saving two or three months next year was a question. The matter now before them was not one on which they wished to press the Government too hard. He (Mr. Ashton Dilke) was bound to say that since he had been in the House the attitude of the Irish Members towards the Government was well entitled to the respect and consideration of the Government. The Government, he believed, had shown a willingness to meet them in that spirit, and such, he hoped, would be the case as long as the present Administration lasted. Well, he thought the Government might yield on this point with a good grace and with distinct advantage to themselves. What they would have to consider next year would not be so much the question of evidence, as that of the attitude of the people of Ireland. He quite recognized the necessity of not frightening people; but, on the other hand, they might as well be hanged for a sheep as a lamb. The doctrine of conciliation might be pushed too far, especially with people whose particular interests and privileges had already, perhaps, been a little too much consulted. Considering the importance attached to the Land Question in Ireland, he did not think the Irish Members, on the whole, had pressed the Government unduly; although he felt constrained, in the debate on the Address, to oppose the Amendment of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) as asking too much from the Government this Session; and although, in the debate on the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill, he differed from some Irish Members in thinking that the Government had gone as far as they reasonably could, with any prospect of passing the Bill this year. If the Commission was to be appointed, surely it ought to be as representative as possible. It ought to be so composed as to command the confidence of the Irish people. The great majority of the Irish people would not read the evidence. They would look at the names of the Commissioners, and if they saw none representing the interests of the farmers—for the hon. Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Shaw), although entitled to all respect, could not be regarded as a Representative of that class—an impression would get abroad that the Government had made up their minds from the first not to give the tenant farmers justice, and such a result would, in every way, be regrettable.

Mr. Ashton Dilke

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to the Crown, praying Her Majesty to reconstitute the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the working of the Land Act of 1870, in such a manner as to afford by its composition an adequate representation to the tenant farmers of Ireland."—(Mr. Justin M'Carthy.)

LORD ELCHO regarded the appointment of the Commission as quite unnecessary, seeing that another Commission was sitting, which, amongst other things, had entered very fully into the Irish Land Question. The fairness and the representative character of that Commission no one could dispute, including as it did not only tenant farmers, but two Members of the last Liberal Administration—Lord Carlingford and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld)—the former of whom was really the main parent of the Land Act of 1870, which they had been told more than once was the germ of the recent Compensation for Disturbance Bill. The real motive for the appointment of a second Commission appeared to him (Lord Elcho) to be this—that the first was known to have taken evidence unfavourable to the Land Act of 1870. That Act apparently had been anything but an unmixed good to the Irish people; one of its clauses having been mainly instrumental in bringing about that indebtedness of the Irish tenant which, at the present moment, was the great cause of his distress. That first Commission had been working steadily at the Irish Land Question; and it was their intention, he believed, to lay before Parliament, as soon as possible, the evidence they had taken in Ireland. If, then, another Commission was to be appointed at all, it ought to have been a Commission of a totally different character. It ought to have been a purely judicial Commission to inquire into the working of the Land Act. Failing that, they ought to have had on the Commission someone representing extreme views held on the Land Question. The present Commission was one of which he could not in any way approve.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin McCarthy, had brought forward the subject in a speech of great fairness and moderation, and he could assure him and other hon. Members from Ireland that he was really sorry to oppose him. He was very anxious that the Commission should meet with support in Ireland, and he believed it would. There were two reasons why the Government thought they must adhere to the appointment they had made. The hon. Member for Longford objected to Baron Dowse, on the ground that he might be enamoured of the Land Act which he had helped to get passed. Well, he (Mr. Forster) did not think the hon. Member would dwell very much upon that argument. Baron Dowse, whatever else might be said about him, was the greatest master of humour ever known in that House, and he would have relished extremely the notion of his being enamoured of any Act. The hon. Member said he did not expect any great scheme of land reform from Baron Dowse. Well, he (Mr. Forster) did not know that they expected any great scheme of land reform from Baron Dowse, or from the Members of the Commission generally. That was not the object of the Commission. Its object was to give them information as to the working of the Land Act. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) asked why there should be a Commission at all, seeing that another Commission was engaged in conducting an inquiry into the same subject. It was quite true there was that other Commission. It was a large Commission, composed of 20 Members, and it had a most extensive task to perform—namely, to inquire into the Land Question of the entire Kingdom. The Government consequently felt that that Commission would not be able to give so much attention as was desirable to the particular question of Irish land. The hon. Member for Longford had admitted the importance of the Irish Land Question in the consideration of every man in the country; and it was, indeed, impossible to exaggerate its importance. The Government felt that there was a great demand in Ireland for some change in the existing Land Laws; but, on the other hand, as there was an absence of actual information as to the manner in which the Land Laws were at the present moment working, they thought they could not deal with the question of what Amendment there should be made in them, or whether there should be any Amendment made at all, especially in the Land Act of 1870, without having a statement before the House to show exactly what had been the operation of that Act. The Government was of opinion that the existing Commission, to which he had referred, had sufficient to do without extending their inquiry in this direction. It became a question what sort of Commission it was their duty to appoint. The Government thought it would be well to have a small Commission, as being much more likely to be a business-like Commission, and able to go to one part of Ireland and another to get the information desirable. He could not help admitting, that they were encouraged in that view by precedent, and they could not but remember that it was the “Devon Commission,” which made extensive inquiries, and presented a very useful Report to the House. That Commission was a very strong Commission; but if it had been a large, instead of a small one, its Report would not have been anything like as useful as it was. The next question they had to consider was the composition of the Commission. It was a very difficult thing to nominate any Members of such Commission; and he did not suppose they could ever make a nomination which would give universal satisfaction to all Parties. The Government attempted to make it a judicial Commission, by composing it of men who were likely to look into the evidence with a fair, impartial, and judicial frame of mind. He really did not think that, if the House fairly looked at the matter, it would think that they could have made a much better selection than they had made in the difficult circumstances of the case. The hon. Member did not object to the Chairman of that Commission, who was a most respected Nobleman (the Earl of Bessborough); nor did he (Mr. Forster) think it would be possible to find two more fair men than the O'Connor Don and Mr. Kavanagh. It had been said that the O'Connor Don and Mr. Kavanagh were no longer Members of that House; but some of their very ablest and most distinguished men had not always succeeded in retaining their seats with the constituency that elected them. He would appeal to hon. Members who were in the House when the O'Connor Don and Mr. Kavanagh were there, whether they could find any two Gentlemen upon whose fairness and impartiality they could more absolutely rely than upon theirs. He did not understand that there was any objection to the hon. Member for the County Cork (Mr. Shaw), and he could not think that any reasonable objection could be raised to Mr. Baron Dowse, who had left the House much longer than either of the two other Gentlemen. There were, doubtless, some hon. Members who recollected Mr. Baron Dowse when in that House, and he thought it would be generally admitted that he was also a Gentleman who would have great power in arriving at the truth, and great impartiality in stating what he had heard. He did not deny that he was a lawyer; but he thought that it was necessary to have upon the Commission some legal gentleman who was acquainted with the principles of the Land Act, as it was the business of the Commission to inquire into that Act, and Mr. Baron Dowse was one of the Members who assisted in carrying it through the House. He could assure the House that they had not considered for a moment whether those gentlemen were landlords, or whether they were not; all they considered was whether they were likely to come to a fair opinion as to the working of the Land Act. The hon. Member for Longford said that the tenants of Ireland would hold aloof from a Commission of which Lord Bessborough was Chairman, and of which his hon. Friend the Member for the County Cork was a Member. He (Mr. Forster) did not believe that the opinions that the O'Connor Don and Mr. Kavanagh had expressed would prevent any tenant from giving his evidence before the Commission. Did his hon. Friend suppose that the mere addition of a tenant farmer to the Commission would prevent the tenants of Ireland holding aloof? He fully believed, looking at the position which the hon. Member for the County Cork had held, that the part he had taken on the Land Question would prevent the tenants of Ireland from giving their evidence before a Commission of which he was a Member. He had no doubt that, if a tenant farmer of the same character for impartiality as those five Gentlemen could have been found and placed upon the Commission, the other Members would have been glad of his presence. It was all very well to say that they ought to have a tenant farmer upon the Commission, because it was a tenant farmer's question; but what they had to consider was, whether, as the Commission had been appointed, there ought to be any alteration in it. There were hon. Members from Ulster who, if the question were asked them, might say that there ought to be a stronger representation upon the Commission from the Province of Ulster. He (Mr. Forster) was of opinion, however, that Baron Dowse, who was an Ulster resident, knew as much as could be necessary of the Ulster Custom. Then there were other matters which, if there was any change, must be taken into consideration. The hon. Member for Longford, in bringing forward his proposal, entirely forgot the political views of the Members of the Commission. The Government had taken what was not a very usual course—although he did not know that any objection had been made to it—they had taken the course of appointing the Commission with little reference to political views, and, as a matter of fact, there was only one Conservative upon it. If they were, however, to make an addition, and to enter into the matter in all its bearings, they would have to add another Conservative to the Commission, and it would then number eight. He thought that a Commission of eight was much less likely to do the work well than a Commission of five. The Commission was not appointed in order to prepare a scheme of land reform. No doubt, they would be very glad of the opinions of the eminent men who composed it upon that subject. But their real object was to get at information; and, in order to do that, they must have a business-like Commission which would thoroughly do its work, and it was of real importance that it should be kept to a small number. He could only state that the Government was anxious that information should be given to that Commission; and they believed that, notwithstanding any speeches which might have been made by the O'Connor Don or by Mr. Kavanagh, yet considering the position which they held in Ireland, and the respect which they had amongst Irishmen, that a Commission which contained those two Gentlemen, and which also had as Chairman Lord Bessborough, whose whole connection with Ireland had won the respect of the tenants, as well as of the landlords, and considering also the well-known character of Baron Dowse, the Government did not question for a moment that the tenant farmers would give information to that Commission in the fullest possible manner. He was sure that it would be the endeavour of the Commission to obtain such information; and he would only state, in conclusion, that the object of the Government in appointing so small a Commission was its belief that the work for which it was specially required could thereby be best done.

Mr. W. E. Forster

Mr. LITTON said, that when the announcement of the intention of Her Majesty's Government to appoint a Commission to inquire into the operation of the Irish Land Act was at first made, it was received with satisfaction throughout Ireland. At all events, in the Northern part of Ireland, the announcement was regarded with favour, because, as no legislation could take place till next year, it was thought wise to appoint a Commission to inquire into the facts which would have to be brought before the House so as to enable the Government to deal with the question in a large and liberal spirit. In the North of Ireland, they all believed that the Gentlemen who would have been appointed on that Commission would belong not to any one Party, or represent any one opinion, but would have represented the various opinions entertained on the subject; and he could not conceal from the House that a feeling of disappointment prevailed in the North of Ireland, when it was found that the Gentlemen appointed—however eminent they might be in social position and intelligence, or even in technical knowledge, as regarded the working of the Land Act—were Gentlemen who could not be said to have much sympathy with the views of the tenant farmers, either in the North of Ireland, or in Ireland at large. He would make one exception to that observation, for he was bound to say that the hon. Member for Cork County (Mr. Shaw) possessed the full confidence of all moderate men in Ireland on the Land Question. The hon. Member for Cork County did appear to most persons in the North of Ireland a most suitable person to act upon the Commission, not because he was an Ulster man, although he (Mr. Litton) believed he was born in Dungannon; but because he had shown great judgment and ability in dealing with questions of practical interest to Irishmen at large. Still, the aspect in which the composition of the Commission struck most persons was, that while all the Gentlemen placed upon it were of the highest intelligence and position, yet, so far as the Irish tenant class were concerned, they remained unrepresented. It was not that he doubted the fairness, or the impartiality, or even the judgment and wisdom of those Gentlemen; but it was felt that the Commission did not contain any Gentlemen who took that view of the case which the tenant class was anxious to put before the House and the public at large. It was not that they feared the result of the Commission or the result of any Report which might be made, because the Government would not be bound by the Report; it was because those Gentlemen had no sympathy with the ideas and opinions which Irish tenants were anxious to have brought fully and fairly before the House, and it was regarded as impossible to expect that those particular opinions would be elicited without someone on the Commission who would take a special interest in having them made known. That was the reason why considerable disappointment was felt in Ireland at the composition of the Commission. This disappointment naturally resulted in remonstrance; and he, with several of the Ulster Members, felt it their duty to lay their views before the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and they accordingly had solicited the honour of an interview with him. He had very kindly acceded to that request, and they had had an opportunity of placing their views before him. The right hon. Gentleman met them with great kindness, and gave them the information which he had now given to the House. The opinions expressed by the right hon. Gentleman, to which it was stated the Government would now adhere, were no doubt true, in one aspect of the case; but they failed to convince the Ulster Members that the Government had adopted a wise course. He thought, however, that events which had since taken place somewhat altered the position which Irish Members should take. The result of the debate on the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill in "another place"—a result they all deeply regretted—had imposed upon Government increased responsibility. It was not so much the result of that debate which was anticipated that he regretted, as that the result should have been endorsed by such an enormous majority of the House of Lords. The rejection of that measure had dashed, to a great extent, the hopes he had formed of being able to induce the House to adopt a wise and a just measure of land reform for Ireland. The practical question now, however was, whether Irish Members should embarrass Her Majesty's Government in their management of Irish affairs, by forcing them to reconstitute the Commission. He thought it was the duty of the Liberal Party at the present time, and under existing circumstances, to support Her Majesty's Government; and though not necessarily agreeing with the reasons which had been offered for not acceding to the request of Irish Members upon the matter of this Commission, yet he did not think it would be right to throw additional difficulty in their way by pressing them further, after the statements which had been made.

Mr. Litton

THE O'DONOGHUE: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland may be irritated at the course we are taking; but such confidence have I in his impartiality, and in the logical quality of his mind, that I am convinced he cannot help seeing, not only that we are doing what is right, but that what we are doing is the natural consequence of our position as Irish Representatives. The proposed Commission is to investigate matters vitally and exclusively affecting Ireland, and the most ardent stickler for the Union will acknowledge that it especially devolves upon us to have the Commission properly constituted. The right hon. Gentleman will not maintain that we are bound to acquiesce in his selection. On the contrary, from his thorough appreciation of the duty of Members of this House, he must admit that we are bound to criticize unsparingly, or render ourselves amenable to a charge of negligence or incapacity. If this inquiry into an exclusively Irish matter is to be carried on from a Scotch or an English point of view, no doubt it will be strictly in accordance with precedent; and, like all proceedings carried on in a similar manner, it will not result in one single practical suggestion for the settlement of the Irish Land Question, but will leave that question exactly as it is at present, completely unsettled. Such a mode of procedure is nothing else than a sham. It is the sort of performance that always has taken place, and that we might expect always would take place when the majority of this House were the nominees of the territorial class of whom, alone, in those days, the British Constitution took cognizance. But such a proceeding is inconsistent with the professions of the right hon. Gentleman, and with the principles of the Liberal Party, which absolutely require that every act of Government should be based upon the faithful representation of the opinion of the majority, at all events of the majority of the constituent body. I am afraid the selection of such a Commission as this will produce the impression that the right hon. Gentleman is regardless of Irish opinion; that he intends to assume towards Ireland an autocratic bearing, and that our presence here as Representatives is useless. Now, Sir, there is no necessity whatever for an inquiry into the working of the Land Act of 1870. We all know that the Act of 1870 has failed; and we are thoroughly conversant with its weak points. No Commissioner can give us any information with regard to their salient points. What we want is a Commission which will apply itself to showing that the Land Act, in its present form—that is, without a complete re-casting of its machinery—can never be anything but an utter failure. The Land Act condemns eviction, but allows the landlord to evict. The Land Act condemns rack-renting, but allows the landlord to rack-rent. The Land Act points towards a peasant proprietary, and leaves the tenant without the right of pre-emption, or adequate means to complete the purchase of his holding. The Land Act, in fact, lays down excellent principles, without providing any effectual means of enforcing those principles. Does anyone imagine that this Commission will shape its investigations so as to elicit evidence showing the necessity, in order to save the people, for making the provisions of the Land Act absolutely prohibitory of eviction, and of rack-renting? Or that this Commission will recommend, with a view to the establishment of a peasant proprietary, that in the case of all estates offered for sale the occupier shall have the right of pre-emption, and shall be assisted with loans at that moderate interest at which accommodation has so recently been afforded to the landlords. It would be difficult to exaggerate the aversion which this Commission, as constituted, excites in Ireland. Its composition is looked upon as a defiance of popular feeling, and as throwing an air of burlesque over the whole proposal. Some of its Members have ostentatiously displayed not merely their want of sympathy with, but their downright hostility to, the cause of the tenant farmers, either by openly contending that the landlord has a right to do what he likes with the land, or by taking a Pharisaical line with the most deadly effect. Mr. Baron Dowse was Solicitor General for Ireland when the Act of 1870 was passing through Parliament; and, no doubt, his principal occupation on the Commission will consist in pointing out the boundaries of that very limited measure of land reform, and keeping up the delusion that within its lines the farmers will find a place of refuge. It is notorious that the learned Baron is given over to joking; that he is, perhaps, the most persistent and exquisite joker that ever lived; so that, if the cause of the tenant farmers is to be laughed out of Court, it will not be for want of his assistance. I am sorry to say that there is not even one man on the Commission who commands the confidence of Ireland. I wish to speak with the greatest respect of my hon. Friend the Member for the County Cork (Mr. Shaw); but he has destroyed himself by so posing here as a moderate man, that people are in great doubt now as to what are his views, or whether he has any at all, or, if he has any, whether he is prepared to do anything to give them effect. Sir, that man must, indeed, have a sanguine mind who imagines the occupiers of either England or Ireland will derive any benefit from Royal Commissions, as they have hitherto been constituted, and as their inquiries have hitherto been directed, whether those Commissions be called Agricultural Commissions, or Commissions to inquire into the working of the Land Act of 1870. One would think that it was the system of farming in the United Kingdom that was at fault, and that what we had to do was to improve it, so that the few available acres to be found without the narrow limits of these Islands may yield a return sufficiently to enable us to compete with the boundless extent of the Western Continent. Sir, it is vain to try that. It is not our farming that is at fault: that is not the cause of agricultural distress. What we have to do is to put an end to the landlord's power of exacting what rents he wants; and until that is done the agricultural population will never know what happiness is. That power it is that leaves farms untenanted in England, and that has brought Ireland—in the words of the Prime Minister—to within a measurable distance of civil war. Sir, nothing illustrates more forcibly the worthlessness to the people of these Agricultural Commissions than a glance at the sources from which they derive information. There is, perhaps, no part of Ireland suffering more from landlord oppression at this moment than Kerry; and from Kerry the Agricultural Commission invites Mr. Hussey to give evidence. Mr. Hussey, who has been the chief instrument of destroying in Kerry, and throughout the greater part of the South, everything that made the land system bearable. This gentleman had nothing to say about transplanting, or the rotation of crops. No; the great measure, in his opinion, to be recommended is emigration. The landlords and agents are to root out the people, and the State is then to pay for carting or shipping them away. I am sure the very cats in Kerry will laugh when they hear that Mr. Hussey has been called in to advise upon what had best be done for the tenant farmers. Sir, because I believe that this Commission, as constituted, will principally occupy itself with taking evidence from men sharing the views of Mr. Hussey. I shall vote for the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Longford. It must be in the recollection of the House that during the debates on the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill a letter was read from Mr. Hussey, declaring the passing of that measure would render the collection of rent impossible. To invite the opinions of such men is nothing short of mockery.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was not surprised that the hon. Member for Tralee (the O'Donoghue) objected to the composition of the Commission, seeing that with him the failure of the Land Act was a foregone conclusion. To some minds the conclusion was not so absolutely certain that the Land Act had failed, or that it had not, and it was in solving that question that the Commission was expected to be useful. The speeches attacking the Commission had all been pervaded by a fallacious supposition—namely, that the Government looked to Baron Dowse or the other Members of the Commission for a comprehensive scheme of land reform. If the Government thought fit to bring forward a comprehensive scheme of land reform, they must do so on their own responsibility, and not on that of a Royal Commission, however composed. What they wanted, meanwhile, was facts. For the last four years there had been almost continuous debates on the Irish Land Question. On the one hand, they heard it asserted that no such thing existed in Ireland as security of tenure or compensation for improvements, and that the present system was impoverishing the country. On the other hand, they heard these assertions denied with as much force as they were made. The result was that neither the House nor the Government could arrive at any certain conclusion in the matter. What could be more advisable, under these circumstances, than to ask a set of honest and impartial men to make inquiry on the spot, and to report the facts brought under their notice? That was the object of the Commission, and not, as the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) seemed to suppose, the elaboration of a comprehensive scheme of land reform. It was said the Commission would not command the confidence of the people of Ireland. Well, that was a question which it seemed to him the House would do well to leave to the Government on its own responsibility. No doubt the information to be collected by the Commission would be valuable to the House and to the country at large; but those most interested in it were the Government themselves. No one, surely, could suppose that the Government would deliberately send to inquire into the Land Question in Ireland a body of men who, in their opinion, did not command the confidence of the country. Nothing could be more unsatisfactory than the discussions which constantly arose in that House as to the composition of Committees and Commissions. It seemed to him that a great deal too much confidence was attached to the nomination of gentlemen who were supposed to represent the special opinions or special interests. He did not think those special opinions or special interests ever gained much from the nomination of their avowed advocates. What was wanted for the purpose of an inquiry was influential and sensible persons. Something was said about a Commission of a judicial character. That, however, would involve the appointment of men who had no previous knowledge of the subject, and who would find it difficult to direct their inquiry so as to elicit the information which was really desirable. What the Government had endeavoured to do was to place upon the Commission men who had an intimate knowledge of the Land Question, and whose impartiality, honesty, and judgment could be relied upon. He might remind the House that the Devon Farmers' Commission of 1843-5, whose Report had been, up to the present time, the most authentic source of information on the Land Question in Ireland, was a small Commission, and was by no means constituted in accordance with the ideas which had been expressed that night by hon. Members opposite. It consisted of four Conservatives and one Whig. Nevertheless, the Report of that Commission was universally admitted to be a valuable source of information in all that concerned the Land Question in Ireland. Their inquiry was conducted in a thoroughly impartial and business-like spirit. If the Commission now appointed succeeded in doing half the service which the Devon Commission, in spite of its unrepresentative character had done, his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland would have reason to congratulate himself. His right hon. Friend, he was quite sure, would willingly have met the views of the Irish Members had he seen his way to doing so without impairing the efficiency and working qualities of the Commission. But that was impossible; and he trusted the House would support the Government in the course they had pursued.

Mr. O'DONNELL said, he concurred with the hon. Member for Tralee (the O'Donoghue) in thinking that no necessity for the appointment of the Commission of the present kind existed. The Irish Members were perfectly satisfied as to the deplorable state of affairs in Ireland. If they differed upon certain points, the difference was more verbal than real; and he was quite certain that, had they matters in their own hands, they would very speedily create a better position for the Irish tenant than he had ever yet enjoyed. He sympathized very much with the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy), and generally agreed with his arguments; but, in his (Mr. O'Donnell's) opinion, it would have been better had the hon. Member, instead of the vague Resolution he had brought forward, taken counsel with his Colleagues beforehand, and submitted definite proposals to the Government with reference to the constitution of the Commission. After all, a so-called tenant farmer might or might not be a friend to the farming class. Some of the worst enemies of farmers in Ireland were farmers themselves. For his own part, if he (Mr. O'Donnell) sat down to amend the constitution of the Commission, he should probably amend it away altogether. He believed there were men in Ireland who were quite as honourable, quite as impartial, and quite as able, and who would have carried out the inquiry more thoroughly than those appointed by the Government. At the same time, he did not at all sympathize with the objections raised to the hon. Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Shaw). He had been by no means satisfied with the conduct of the hon. Member for Cork County (Mr. Shaw) in the late Parliament, and if he had to undertake an arduous battle, would prefer to place himself under the standard of the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell). But there was at present no question of fighting an hostile Administration; and he believed that the hon. Member for the County of Cork, being in favour of fixity of tenure, fair rents, freedom of sale, and arbitration between landlord and tenant, would fairly represent a vast majority of the tenant farmers of Ireland. The hon. Member, however, was a little wanting in backbone; and, with all respect to him, he (Mr. O'Donnell) thought it would be well to give him another Colleague friendly to the farming class; say, one of the sturdy farmers of Ulster. His own position in the matter was this—He was not called upon by Party allegiance to support the hon. Member for Longford in what might appear to be a censure upon the Government. He did not consider the present Administration to be a hostile one to Ireland, or even a doubtful one. He would never trust his estimate of public men in future if he proved to be mistaken in his belief that the Prime Minister, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, the right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Birmingham, and other Members of the Cabinet were sincerely desirous of putting an end to the miseries of the Irish tenantry; and he believed he might say that hundreds of English Liberal Members would be prepared to turn out a Liberal Administration which played fast-and-loose with the dearest hopes of the Irish people. On the whole, while not believing much in the necessity for the Commission, he was, at the same time, convinced that the Government were actuated by the best intentions; and, therefore, the most logical course was to remain neutral. The Government had undertaken on their responsibility to deal with the Irish Land Question, and he could not venture to oppose them; but he would reserve to himself perfect freedom of action in the future.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR regretted that the speech which hon. Members had just heard from the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) had not been made at an hour when it would have found its way into the Press. The noble Marquess had told them the Government did not expect a large scheme of reform from the Commission. He hoped the Irish Members would take note of the fact, and also those hon. Gentlemen who represented English constituencies in the Radical interest. The noble Marquess was unpledged to any large scheme of reform in the Land Question, and it could not be too well understood that his functions were to minimize all efforts in that direction. He spoke of the Commission as impartial and judicial. Was he oblivious of the fact that it was composed of well-known partizans, and that the tenant farmers would find in it not a Bench of Judges, but a whole Bar of Counsel arrayed against them? That was the idea in the mind of the noble Marquess—that the Commission was just, impartial, and judicial in its character. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland claimed to have acted in this matter with good intentions. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had not the slightest doubt that the intentions of the right hon. Gentleman were good; and if his good intentions were only helped by a little knowledge, he had no doubt that he would have acted very wisely. But the fact was, he did not suppose the right hon. Gentleman knew what he was doing when he appointed that Commission. Could they imagine any better means of raising dissatisfaction amongst the Irish people and fore-dooming this Commission to failure, and fore-dooming the legislation which would be based upon it also, than the course the right hon. Gentleman had taken? The right hon. Gentleman had mentioned the fact that only one Member of the Commission was a Conservative. But of the two enemies of the Bill, the Liberal and the Tory, the most bitter enemy was the Liberal; the bitterest enemies to the Bill were Liberals, and the most fatal clause of the Irish Land Act came from the Liberals, who were supposed to be its friends. With regard to the O'Connor Don, for whom, personally, he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) felt the deepest respect as a Gentleman, who was an honour to his country, he thought he was, upon this question, one of the most bitter enemies they had, and a great deal worse than Mr. Kavanagh. As to Baron Dowse, it was he who consented to the Amendment of the Irish Land Act of 1870, which took away the Irish Custom from Ulster. It was Mr. Baron Dowse who allowed the word "customs" to be substituted for "custom," and that allowed the real Ulster Custom to be reduced to a nullity; while, if it had been retained, it would have produced untold benefit to the people of Ulster. He thought, therefore, the people of Ulster had a good right to regard Mr. Baron Dowse as the most bitter enemy of the Ulster Custom. Lord Bessborough had been spoken of in terms of praise which he fully deserved; but in what way had he spent a considerable part of his life? He had been the agent of Lord Fitzwilliam, an absentee landlord who drew about £70,000 a-year from the Irish people. With regard to the hon. Member for the County Cork (Mr. Shaw), they had a good deal of confidence in him; but, as he ventured to say, a remark respecting him had been quoted by the hon. Member for Longford that he represented low watermark in this matter, instead of high water. Accordingly, in choosing this Commission, which the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) said was to come to an impartial and judicial conclusion, the Government, he would not say deliberately, but in the fulness of its ignorance, had selected for the Members of the Commission the bitterest enemy of the Irish tenant farmers. If they looked at the effect that that Commission was to take upon the legislation, it would be seen that the Commission would have a most important effect upon it. He was sure that the minds of the Government were a perfect blank upon the Irish Land Question; indeed, he thought that the mind of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland was a perfect blank upon most questions affecting Ireland. Who were the witnesses that would be examined upon the subject? They were people who, from a consciousness of the oppression through which they had passed, were, in some respects, the most timorous witnesses in the world. He should like the right hon. Gentleman to have seen the way that some of his constituents recognized him (Mr. T. P.

Mr. O'Donnell

O'Connor) on the day of the polling, when under the eye of their landlords. If the right hon. Gentleman had sat for an Irish constituency—he did not know whether or not he would have been elected—he would have seen the different behaviour of the tenants when under the eye of their landlords, and when they felt themselves free. When he visited those men at their houses, they received him in the most open-hearted manner, and showed that their sympathies were fully with him as he was fighting their battle; but, on the day of the polling, when the agents of the landlords were present, they passed him without so much as a nod, for they were conscious that if the agents of their landlords saw them give him any sort of welcome they would have lost their holdings. Those were the people who would have to give evidence before this Commission. The Land Question was a matter of life and death to the Irish people, and upon the legislation which the Government would bring in upon this matter the fate of the Irish people depended. The fate of the Bill would depend upon the evidence which this Commission would receive, and that evidence would depend upon the character of the Commission. Therefore it was that he would press upon his hon. Friends not to be led away by the answer which they had received from the Treasury Bench. That Commission had been constituted by the Government originally in ignorance, and it was now defended by obstinacy.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that he considered the appointment of the hon. Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Shaw) upon that Commission to be an excellent appointment. He was returned by an overwhelming majority of his constituents, and there was very strong reason for appointing him. With regard to the O'Connor Don, they all knew that he was a man of great ability, and of the highest repute in his county as a very good landlord. Of the other three gentlemen he knew nothing whatever; but he certainly agreed with the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) for this reason—that the part of his case in which he said there ought to be one or two tenant farmers put upon the Commission had not been answered by the Government. He (Major Nolan) did not, for his part, quarrel with any one of the present appointments; but he did think that they ought to be supplemented by one or two tenant farmers.

MR. DENIS O'CONOR said, that he was anxious to say a word or two upon this subject. The hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy), in referring to his Relative the O'Connor Don, had said that he had distinguished himself as an avowed opponent of that scheme of land reform upon which the people of Ireland had set their hearts, and the hon. Member for Galway Borough (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) went a little further in his remarks upon the O'Connor Don, and spoke of him as the enemy of the cause of the tenant farmer. He (Mr. Denis O'Connor) was anxious to know upon what occasion the O'Connor Don had ever opposed land reforms upon which the Irish people had set their hearts. During the 20 years that he was a Member of that House, he (Mr. Denis O'Connor) ventured to say that on every occasion on which the interests of the tenant farmers were under consideration, the O'Connor Don was always an advocate for them, except on the single occasion of Mr. Butt's Bill. He opposed Mr. Butt's Bill; but that was scarcely a land reform upon which the Irish people had set their hearts. The hon. Member for Galway Borough went on to describe the hon. Member for County Cork (Mr. Shaw) as being at low-water mark upon the question of land reform, and stated that the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) represented high-water mark. The hon. Member representing low-water mark had, however, supported the Bill of Mr. Butt, while the hon. Member for the City of Cork, who, it was said, stood at high-water mark, had denounced the Bill of Mr. Butt in the strongest terms, and it was for opposing that very Bill, which had been condemned by the hon. Member for the City of Cork, that the O'Connor Don was now denounced. At the large land meetings in the West of Ireland, language much stronger than that used by the O'Connor Don was made use of with regard to Mr. Butt's Bill. Therefore, he thought it was most unfair to say that because the O'Connor Don opposed Mr. Butt's Bill he was opposed to the views of the tenant farmers of Ireland. They knew that the movement of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was one in favour of purchasing the land of the landlords and making the tenants the owners. That view was put forward by the O'Connor Don in the same speech in which he opposed Mr. Butt's Bill, and he said that that was the principle on which the Irish Land Question ought to be settled. Therefore, to put him forward in that House as an enemy of the tenants, cause—as being a man likely to do injury to the tenant farmers of Ireland—was to put him in a most unfair light, and to go contrary to what everyone who knew him would say was the fact. Again, he was a Member of the Committee appointed on the "Bright Clauses" of the Land Act; and he would appeal to hon. Members who had served with the O'Connor Don upon that Committee, as to whether or not he was one who raised his voice in favour of the cause of the tenant farmer. On that point he had shown himself to be a friend of the tenant farmer, and it was most unfair to speak of him in the way in which he had been spoken of that night. Although he made these remarks in favour of his hon. Friend and Relative, he himself was strongly in favour of the Motion of the hon. Member for Longford. The people of Ireland had, in consequence of the speeches which had been made, misrepresenting the views of the O'Connor Don, a feeling that the tenant farmer class of Ireland was not represented on this Commission. That being so, there was not one Member besides the hon. Member for County Cork (Mr. Shaw) who would be, in their judgment, a Representative of the tenant farmer. It was said that the hon. Member for the County Cork was a landlord, and did not represent the views of the tenant class; but, on the other hand, he had been returned to speak for the tenant farmers, and in that sense was their Representative. The O'Connor Don had not been returned as a Representative of the views of the tenant farmers, or anyone else; but he had been put upon the Commission as one who had a thorough knowledge of the Land Question, and he could not, therefore, in any sense be said to be a Representative of the tenant farmers of Ireland. He agreed with the hon. Member in thinking that this Commission, whether it did good or harm, was still a matter of considerable importance, and that it should be constituted in a manner which would give satisfaction to the great bulk of the people of Ireland. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington), referring to the Devon Commission, said that although there were no tenant farmer Representatives upon it, yet it collected a great deal of valuable evidence, and did good service to the tenant farmers' cause. But he would remind the noble Lord that the circumstances of the present day were very different from what they were then. What they had to look to was, whether this Commission had been appointed in the usual way that Commissions of the House were appointed. In that point of view, it would be found that the Commission, as to the great bulk of its Members, represented only one class. For that reason, he was most anxious that some Representative of the tenant farmers should be placed upon the Commission. He might say that the O'Connor Don was very anxious that that should be done, as he believed also was the hon. Member for the County Cork. He had not had any communication with the other Members of the Commission; but he had no doubt but that they would be highly delighted with the presence upon their board of Representatives of the tenant farmers. They would feel that it would be a great advantage to have someone who would command the confidence of the tenant farmers of Ireland upon the Commission, and who would aid them in deciding upon the proper course to be taken. Under those circumstances, he regretted very much the determination to which the Government had come, and so strongly did he feel upon the matter, that he should vote with his hon. Friend the Member for Longford.

MR. CALLAN said, that the Motion of the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) would receive his support; but he was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington), had not adduced some good reason for the appointment of the Commission at all. Last year, the late Government appointed a Royal Commission to sit in Ireland to inquire into the Land Question. They were about to proceed to Ireland soon after the House rose to pursue their inquiries; and he very much regretted that that Royal Commission, which included many Members of that House, were not asked to extend the scope of their inquiry. Had they done so, it would have given great satisfaction, for it was a Commission upon which the tenant farmers of England and Ireland were placed, and their opinions upon the subject would have had much more effect in framing and carrying a larger measure of tenant right for Ireland than a Commission like this. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had referred to what he called representatives of the low-water mark. He (Mr. Callan) should like to know what high-water mark was on this subject? Knowing the opinions of the tenant farmers as he did, he had no hesitation in saying that the hon. Member for the County Cork (Mr. Shaw) represented the highest water-mark of the intelligent opinion of the tenant farmers in Ireland—namely, fixity of tenure at fair rents. For the reasons he had given, he should vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Longford. He thought there was no good cause for the appointment of the Commission; but as it was already in existence, there could be no doubt that Representatives of the tenant farmers ought to be placed upon it.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, that he did not wish to detain the House long from a division upon the subject; but he must join his hon. Friend the Member for the Borough of Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) in expressing his surprise at the speech delivered by the noble Lord the temporary Leader of the House (the Marquess of Hartington). The speech of the noble Lord was in direct antagonism to the opinions that had been expressed both by the Prime Minister, and also by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. On the distinct understanding that the Government was obliged to bring in a large scheme of land reform for Ireland, one excuse put forward was that they must wait a Session; but no mention was to be found of any measure in the Queen's Speech, and the reason for that was stated to be that the Government had only recently come into Office, and the question was too large to be dealt with in a comprehensive manner at that time, and that they would have to deal with it later. The hon. Member for the County Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) had advocated his Motion in so clear, and convincing, and logical a manner, that he (Mr. O'Connor Power), in common with the Seconder of the Motion, thought that it was not necessary that he should say anything further in its defence. He really expected that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would acknowledge the convincing argument brought forward in the speech of his hon. Friend. He must say that the defence made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland for the constitution of the Commission was, in his (Mr. O'Connor Power's) judgment, a very weak defence, and that his arguments were most inconclusive. The point he dwelt upon was this—the Government appointed the Gentlemen without regard to the fact that they were landlords. But the Government ought to have considered that. The fact of there being landlords, and exclusively landlords, upon that Commission, affected most materially the confidence which the people of Ireland would extend to the Commission. Reference was also made to the great value of having Mr. Baron Dowse as an eminent legal authority upon the Commission. It would have been better from that point of view that one of the County Court Judges, instead of a Judge of the Superior Court, should have been made a Member of the Commission. The County Court Judge was the person appointed under the Land Act for carrying out its machinery. He was the central figure in the Land Act, and was most likely to be best acquainted with its provisions. It was not a legal authority of the character of Mr. Baron Dowse that had been called upon to take a leading part in the work of this Commission, but a Gentleman who, as the hon. Member for the Borough of Galway had shown, had forfeited the confidence of the tenant farmers in consequence of the assistance that he gave in passing the Land Act of 1870. There was just one point in the speech of the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton) which he would ask leave to notice. He was very much surprised to find a sturdy Ulster man condemning the action of the Government, and yet supporting them in it. The hon. Member seemed to think that, since the measure which had been introduced by the Government had been rejected in "another place," they should give up everything. Any one who knew the history of that "other place" would remember the number of times that its Members had retracted their opinions upon great questions. He could tell the hon. Member that if there was any feeling towards surrender in the North of Ireland upon the Land Question, that that would not be reciprocated in the political action of the tenant farmers in the South and West of Ireland. He was sure that the defeat that this cause had received could not but be of a temporary character, and that the Irish people had sufficient intelligence and determination, and looking to English constituents, as well as Irish, they had sufficient power, to bring the haughtiest of their oppressors to their knees. He, for one, would be inclined to accept any counsel except that of abject surrender, with the feeling that the result of the course which had been adopted in a "certain place" would be only to postpone, and not to prevent the tenant farmers obtaining justice in the matter of land reform. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for India (the Marquess of Hartington) said the Commission was necessary, owing to the conflicting testimony laid before the House in the discussions upon the Land Question during the past four or five years; some hon. Gentlemen protesting that the tenant had no security, and that he was the victim of gross injustice, while others denied that statement, and brought a counter allegation against the tenant farmers. The noble Lord wanted to get facts, and how did he set about it? By appointing a Commission composed entirely of the Representatives of one side, the other side being entirely ignored. No doubt, it was not the business of a Commission to frame a scheme of land reform; but it was, unquestionably, their business to get at the facts. Now, the tenant farmers of Ireland, knowing the composition of the Commission, would be very slow to come before them, and, so to speak, to recognize their official position and endorse their proceedings. From the correspondence he had received within the past 24 hours he had reason to believe that in the West of Ireland the Commission was generally regarded as a mere sham, and that, in the opinion of the people, the best thing the Irish Members could do would be to have as little to do with it as possible. It was unfortunate for the hon. Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Shaw) that he had a seat on that Commission, for he would not only have to answer for his own sins, but for those of his fellow-Commissioners. He trusted his hon. Friend the Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) would find a large amount of support in the division he was about to take. He, for his part, would have much pleasure in following him into the Lobby.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 49; Noes 123: Majority 74.—(Div. List, No. 94.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SPIRITS BILL.—[BILL 210.]

(Lord Frederick Cavendish, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General.)

CONSIDERATION, AS AMENDED.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. WARTON asked whether the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish) would be willing to insert the Amendments he (Mr. Warton) had brought forward?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH, in reply, said, this was merely a Consolidating Bill, and that it had been found impossible to make the change in the law which the hon. and learned Member desired.

Amendments made.

Bill to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

DRAINAGE BOARDS (IRELAND) (ADDITIONAL POWERS) BILL.

(Mr. John Holmes, Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

[BILL 290.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN inquired what the object of the Bill was?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW), in reply, said, that some drainage works in the neighbourhood of the City of Limerick had been constructed within too small an area, and that the Bill was to confer powers for extending them.

Mr. O'Connor Power

Bill considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

EXPIRING LAWS CONTINUANCE BILL.

(Mr. John Holms, Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

[BILL 297.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

MR. J. G. TALBOT expressed his regret that the Government should have introduced into the Bill so important a subject as the renewal of the Ballot Act. There was a strong feeling on that side of the House that that was a question which deserved more consideration than could be given to it in that form.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he saw no valid objection why the Bill should not have been included.

MR. WARTON observed, that one of the many nights wasted over the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill would have been occupied much more profitably in considering the Ballot Act, which was a subject of very great importance, and had been mentioned in the Queen's Speech. The conduct of the Government in regard to the Ballot Act had been, he must say, most ridiculous. It reminded him of the story of the blacksmith's son, who attempted vainly to make a horse shoe, then a horse-shoe nail, and who ultimately congratulated himself on being able, at least, to make the hot iron hiss in water. The House had been promised an opportunity of discussing the Ballot Act, and he thought it ought to have it.

Second Reading deferred till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

RAILWAY CONSTRUCTION FACILITIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Major Nolan, Mr. Mitchell Henry, Captain O'Shea.)

[BILL 293.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On the Motion of Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY, the following new clauses were read a second time and added to the Bill:—

After Clause 2, insert the following Clause:—

"Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Railways Construction Facilities Act (twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth Victoria, chapter one hundred and twenty one, and the regulations scheduled thereto, the advertisements of the application may be made at any time, and may state that objections or representations must be made within twenty one days from the date of such advertisement, and any objection or representation not made within such period of twenty one days shall be deemed not to have been made within the period limited by the said Act."

After Clause 3, insert the following Clause:—

"All the provisions of the Railways Construction Facilities Act (twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth Victoria, chapter one hundred and twenty one), shall apply except when inconsistent with the provisions of this Act."

House resumed.

Bill reported.

MAJOR NOLAN asked that, as the Session was so far advanced, the next stage of the Bill should be taken then.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered,"—(Major Nolan,)—put, and agreed to.

Bill, as amended, considered; to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LAND (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER (NO. 4) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. JOHN HOLMS, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order under "The Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Act, 1863," and the Acts amending the same, ordered to be brought in by Mr. JOHN HOLMS and Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 301.]

LAW OF EJECTMENT (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Major NOLAN, Bill to amend the Law of Ejectment in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Major NOLAN, Mr. A. M. SULLIVAN, and Mr. O'CONNOR POWER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 302.]

House adjourned at a quarter after Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 6th August, 1880.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading— Exchequer Bonds and Bills*.

Second Reading—Kinsale Harbour* (178).

Second Reading — Committee negatived — Inland Revenue* (177).

Committee—Artizans and Labourers Dwellings (Scotland) Provisional Order (Leith) (155).

Third Reading—Tramways Orders Confirmation (No. 2)* (134); Courts of Justice Building Act (1865) Amendment* (182); Merchant Shipping (Fees and Expenses)* (165), and passed.

Royal Assent—Taxes Management [43 & 44 Vict. c. 19]; Epping Forest [43 & 44 Vict. c. cxxx]; Metropolis Improvement Schemes Modification Provisional Order [43 & 44 Vict. c. cxxxi]; Local Government Provisional Orders (Eastbourne, &c.) [43 & 44 Vict. c. cxxxii]; Inclosure Provisional Order (Llanfair Hills) [43 & 44 Vict. c. cxxxiii].

ARTIZANS AND LABOURERS DWELLINGS (SCOTLAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER (LEITH) BILL.—(No. 155.)

(The Viscount Enfield.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

THE EARL OF FIFE moved, after Clause 1, page 1, to insert the following clause:—

“Upon acquiring but before altering the character of any lands for the purposes of this Act which are held of the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town Council of Edinburgh (hereinafter called the Corporation of Edinburgh) as superiors thereof, notice shall be given by the Town Council of Leith to the said Corporation of Edinburgh, as superiors aforesaid, that such lands have been so acquired, and thereupon the said Corporation of Edinburgh shall exercise the right to call upon the Town Council of Leith to redeem the feu duties and casualties of superiority due or to become due to them in respect of such lands so acquired under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, as altered and amended by the Artizans and Labourers Dwellings Improvement (Scotland) Acts, 1875 and 1880, and on the terms of redemption, in so far as regards the amount of compensation, provided by the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, with reference to the redemption of casualties by vassals and the annual value of the said lands (when it forms the basis of the redemption price) shall be held to be the annual value thereof as appearing on the valuation roll in force at the period of the acquisition or such lands.”

Clause agreed to.

Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Monday next.

REPORTING IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS —REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE.—RESOLUTIONS.

EARL BEAUCHAMP, in rising to call attention to the Second Report of the Select Committee on Reporting, and to move—

“1. That the newspaper reporters should be placed on each side of the Peers' gallery under the two centre windows, the gallery now used by reporters being appropriated in lieu of the accommodation thus taken.

“2. That Mr. Hansard be authorized to take an accurate report with his own shorthand writers, to be circulated according to the plan and on the terms proposed by him.

“3. That Mr. Hansard's reporter be permitted to occupy a small movable table on the floor of the House,” said: My Lords, the Motion which I propose to move embodies the result of the deliberations of the Committee which your Lordships appointed in the course of the present Session. Your Lordships will remember that, in a former Report, that Committee recommended certain experiments. Two of those experiments were accepted and tried, and you declined to accede to the daring proposition contained in the third. The result of those two experiments was certainly such as to induce us to abandon all idea that any advantage would be derived from pursuing them further. The Resolutions which I now have to submit to your Lordships are of an entirely different class and character. It was suggested in the course of the debate which then took place, by the noble Duke the Lord Privy Seal (the Duke of Argyll), that the reporters might be placed in the middle of the Galleries on either side of the House. That proposition had received some consideration; but the difficulties connected with it appeared to be so great that the Committee had not entertained it with favour. The notice it received in this House, however, induced the Committee to turn their attention again to the subject, and to endeavour to ascertain how far such a plan would be reasonable. It was found that some of the objections entertained really disappeared when tested by practice. It is difficult to gain an opinion on this point from a body of men of such diverse character and opinions as the various classes of reporters; but I think I may say that the proposition was received with favour by them. I wish your Lordships to understand what does not appear at first sight in the consideration of this question; that the objects for which our proceedings are watched, and the objects with which reports are taken, are very various in their character. The daily London Press, and some of the Provincial Press, desire to have a full and accurate report of all that takes place in your Lordships' House. On the other hand, there are other newspapers which are content with reporting, more or less fully, all the more important speeches in your Lordships' House. Again, there are newspapers and telegraph agencies which merely content themselves with recording the answers to important questions, and there is one agency which restricts its operations more especially to subjects which will interest foreign countries. When we talk of newspaper reporters having the use of the Gallery, it must be remembered that those who sit in that Gallery have not all the same objects, and that what suits one class of reporters is not required to the same extent by others, and the operation and mode of proceeding vary in several very important particulars. My Lords, in order that the public may be informed of what takes place in this House, there are two necessary requirements; one is, that the report should be speedily in the hands of the public; and the other is, that what takes place should be accurately reported. These two conditions—speed and accuracy of reporting—to some considerable extent conflict with each other. It is comparatively easy to do what is done in some foreign Assemblies—to have an official reporter take down word for word all that is said, transcribing that report at more or less leisure, either that night or the next morning. In the French Assembly, the official report is produced next day with considerable accuracy, and at considerable length; but at the sacrifice of that quality of speed to which I have referred. It is quite impossible, if you are to have an official and accurate report of all that takes place, that that report should be taken under such conditions as to enable the ordinary newspaper reporters to make use of it for publication the next morning. We next had it clearly in evidence that whatever arrangements might be made for taking an official and accurate report of what passes, many, if not all, the newspaper reporters in the Gallery would decline, for various reasons, to avail themselves of that report. Therefore, if we do provide an official report, we have not provided those facilities which the newspaper reporters require, and it is in reference more particularly to the requirements of the newspaper reporters that the 1st Resolution which I submit is framed. That Resolution is—

“That the newspaper reporters should be placed on each side of the Peers' gallery under the two centre windows, the gallery now used by reporters being appropriated in lieu of the accommodation thus taken.”

I do not know whether your Lordships have given attention to the plans accompanying the Report of the Committee, or to the enlarged plan which has been in the Library. They show very clearly what is desired to be done. It is proposed that the seats in front of the two central windows should be allotted to newspaper reporters, and communication between the two Galleries can be carried on so speedily that no serious difficulty would arise in the reporters going from one side to the other, while upon the more important journals two reporters would probably be employed, one stationed on the one side of the House, and the other on the other. The communication between the two sides will not be so difficult as apprehended; and, therefore, that branch of the objections may be banished from your Lordships' consideration. The space which it is now proposed to take will be compensated by the Gallery now occupied by the reporters, and accommodation equal, in fact, and in some respects superior, to that now enjoyed by the distinguished occupants of the Gallery on either side will be given in the Reporters' Gallery. I do not know that I need explain all the plans on the subject. The Corps Diplomatique will have seats reserved on either side of the House, and the greater part of the seats now occupied by ladies will continue to be enjoyed by them; and in the Reporters' Gallery they will find ample accommodation of a superior quality to that proposed to be taken from them. I have pointed out the different objects which various classes of reporters require; and, no doubt, if the proposed alteration be made in the Gallery, we may hope for better reports than have been lately given. But, my Lords, the question has been raised of the defective arrangement of the House. I do not think the blame of that rests entirely there. I think it is quite within your Lordships' power, by maintaining greater order, to secure that the buzz of conversation at the Bar, and round the Throne, might be very much diminished. I do not know this of my personal knowledge; but, in conversation, I am informed that some years ago some Members were appointed to exercise some supervision over various matters of Order. I am quite sure that if noble Lords were appointed to that office now, they would find ample opportunity for exercising their energies in the disorderly elements congregated on both sides of the House. I do not think sufficient care is exercised in the admission of persons who are not entitled to admission. I have seen persons on the Throne who were not entitled to be there, and I believe it is matter of notoriety that persons do find their way to the Bar in a similar manner. If either the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees, or some other Member of this House, will turn his attention to maintaining Order, and to enforcing the Rules you have laid down, I think that some decided amelioration would follow, and the speeches in this House would be more carefully followed and more generally heard. At the same time, I am also bound to say there are noble Lords who inform me that they have seen, during interesting speeches, some Members of the Reporters' Gallery paying very little attention to what goes on. That is a matter which I do not presume to enter into; but, certainly, that remark has been made, and I am bound to say that it must be taken for what it is worth. So much for the 1st Resolution. As to the 2nd Resolution, I may say that there is some typographical alteration. I proposed the Resolution in the following words:—

"That Mr. Hansard be authorized to employ his own shorthand writer to take an accurate report to be circulated according to the plan and on the terms proposed by him."

Mr. Hansard has given great attention to this question both in regard to the House of Commons and the House of Lords; and I may remind your Lordships that the House of Commons has complained very much of the defects in reporting their proceedings, and measures were taken on the proposition of the noble Lord who moved this Committee (Lord Sudeley), when he was a

Earl Beauchamp

Member of the House of Commons. That Committee made a Report which was adopted, and they have now a system of reporting in that House. The proposition which they made was very much assisted by the advice and evidence and recommendations of Mr. Hansard, and they were adopted in reference to the House of Commons. It is due to him to mention that he brings to bear on this subject a long experience of the improvements suggested by the House of Commons, and which have been found to work exceedingly well. His propositions were four in number. The differences were not very great; but the one which recommended itself to the Committee is the 3rd proposition which will be found in the Appendix, page 91. The plan proposed by Mr. Hansard in that scheme is a full report of each night's debate, unrevised, to be delivered to Peers, Members, and at the Public Offices, at 11 o'clock the following morning. Should the debate be continued beyond 9 P.M. the publication to be deferred to 5 P.M. Proofs of each speech to be laid upon the Table of the revising room at the House of Lords at 11 o'clock in the morning after debate, and to be collected at 8 o'clock the same evening. The cost for 2,000 copies is estimated at £4,700. My Lords, I think the advantage of that scheme will be obvious. I have already pointed out the different objects that are pursued by those who occupy the Reporters' Gallery. The object proposed by Mr. Hansard is entirely of a different character. Instead of providing a report suited merely to those who read, he will report what actually takes place. We have had it in evidence before the Committee that various newspaper reporters apply themselves to reporting the proceedings upon particular subjects suited to their various readers. For instance, the Irish Press takes more interest in reporting more fully debates on Irish affairs; whilst Scotch papers, in the same manner, give a more complete account of the affairs of Scotland; and so with regard to other portions of the public Press. But Mr. Hansard would, of course, be influenced by no such motives. He would record what took place, and would free the remarks of your Lordships from that redundant verbiage which occurs in all speeches. There are very few speeches which would bear to be taken down and printed as spoken; but, at the same time, that would be a very simple process of revision, preserving the exact language of the speech in the written report. The discretion with which Mr. Hansard has exercised his powers in that respect in the House of Commons shows that we shall be very safe in leaving that matter in his hands. In this manner we really gain the advantage of an official system of reporting, without its responsibility. We gain also the advantage of speed, which is scarcely attained by any system under which the debates have to be revised and published under the authority of your Lordships. I do not know that I need say more with regard to this proposal of Mr. Hansard's; but, with reference to my 3rd Resolution, I may, perhaps, be allowed to urge very strongly that if we are to have such a Report as is proposed by Mr. Hansard, it will be very desirable indeed that the reporter should be placed near the Speaker. There is very great difference with regard to the audibility and resonance of voice with various Members. Some are heard easily; others with difficulty; and it would be certainly almost impossible, however great the advantages of the new system over that which at present obtains, for Mr. Hansard to take an accurate report unless he has a place on the floor of the House in a central position, so that he may hear what takes place without difficulty. There is a great deal of very curious and interesting evidence in the Report with reference to the ease with which the reporter reports when he can easily hear, and the facility with which he then transcribes his notes, compared with the work thrown on the reporter who has considerable difficulty in hearing, and who has to "botch up" the speech. That involves more time than if he had the utmost facilities in hearing what was said without any strain of his hearing. Your Lordships must understand, of course, that reporting is one of the most complicated operations of the mind. You have first to hear; you have then to judge; you have, necessarily, to some extent, to condense as you write down; and, at the same time, while you are condensing, you have to listen to what is going on. That is one of the most difficult possible operations to perform correctly. I think, therefore, if we desire to obtain fairly accurate reports, we ought to give those facilities which a small table on the floor would give. Various suggestions were made as to the position of the table. One plan suggested was that it might be behind the clerks; another, behind the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees. Either of those plans might be arranged with advantage; and, certainly, as regards the Cross Benches, I think no inconvenience would follow if they were put down against the canopy which divides the House from the Bar. Additional places would be given without interfering with, or inconveniencing, noble Lords, and we should obtain space for the table beneath the Galleries; or, on the other hand, a table might be provided for the reporter behind the Wool-sack. I think that is a point your Lordships may leave to the Committee, for we are anxious not to overburden our Report. I think I have now touched upon the principal matters mentioned in the Report. I think the plan proposed will give the greatest amount of information to the public, both as regards reporters and the official report, which we propose shall be distributed among the Members. Therefore, I beg leave to move your Lordships to accede to the Resolution on the Table.

Moved to resolve,

"That the newspaper reporters be placed on each side of the Peers' gallery under the two centre windows, the gallery now used by reporters being appropriated in lieu of the accommodation thus taken."—(The Earl Beauchamp.)

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: Your Lordships have now had two Reports from the Committee. The 1st Report was to advance the Gallery and to make arrangements at that end of the House. That has been tried, and it has been found to be unsuccessful.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: The Committee recommended it as an experiment.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: Quite so; the Committee recommended it as an experiment, and they say the experiment has failed. Well, then, the Committee made a 2nd Report, and in that they travel very wide from the first subject, because they enter upon a totally different question—whether there could not be an official, or what they called a semi-official, report. That is a totally different thing from the question of the reporters being able to hear in this House. With regard to the 1st Resolution, as to the reports, it is proposed to put the reporters, as I understand, on the two sides of the House in the centre of the Galleries. Well, my Lords, I believe that would be a great advantage for the purpose of hearing. I do not understand exactly how the reporters are to go from one side to the other; it is said they can do that in a short time. I do not know whether they are to go across, or whether they are to go round, or whether they would be shot across to the other side. How, when a reporter has finished taking the speech of a Minister, is he to be sent across to hear the Opposition? I do not understand the plan. In other respects, the arrangement will be a good one. Then there is another proposition—that we should have an official or semi-official report. My own opinion is, that it would be very unwise to attempt anything of that kind. I think the general opinion has always been against making ourselves responsible for an exact official report. We know that in this Assembly, as in others, there are many desultory conversations; questions are thrown backwards and forwards like shuttlecocks, and it would be very inconvenient to have every little word that is uttered put down with precision. Often, the accurate report has its objections. I should pity the Minister who was bound down exactly to his words. Words used in the heat of passion ought not to be brought up against them. I know cases where Ministers have said—"I throw Hansard aside altogether." I believe Hansard often is a great inconvenience. The official report would be, I think, a very undesirable thing, and I think we had better rely on the newspapers giving a fair report of the conversations that pass in this House. I believe that to go beyond that would be unwise. I shall, therefore, support the 1st Resolution, so far as I am concerned; but when we come to the 2nd and 3rd, I should be for postponing them to some future time. The only evidence upon which they rest, so far as I can see, is the evidence of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), who has pointed out that he has made speeches in this House and has been misinterpreted. Well, everybody can say that. But he could have sent to the paper, as other Ministers have done, the next day, a short note which is always inserted. I believe that an error has been made, and that would be a far safer course than attempting to bring in what is quite new, an official report, required to be published next day. A Minister could go down, I understand, to read over his speech and improve, or alter it, or put down what he thought he might have said. I would recommend the House to agree only to the 1st Resolution.

LORD DENMAN said, that the Resolutions ought not to be carried in so thin a House. He (Lord Denman) deprecated the notion that responsibility attached either there, or across the sea, to reports of newspapers. Her Majesty granted full liberty of speech in Parliament; but that did not authorize anyone to report libels. Mr. Hansard had wisely omitted words spoken at Queen Caroline's trial; but his noble and lamented Relative had in his own hand written, in his copy of Hansard's Debates, the words "Thou slanderer"—applied to the then Heir Presumptive (afterwards William IV.), who forgave the expression. Facts and figures had, in the debate on the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill, been pronounced fallacious, and there were few "downright facts." The best reports deserved little more notice than the reports of Dr. Johnson, which were his own from memory. He (Lord Denman) found, in the evidence before the Select Committee, that the back of the Strangers' Gallery was a better place for hearing than the Reporters' Gallery. On one occasion when he vindicated the late Lord St. Leonards from an imputation of injustice, he being anxious for a private report to show to the old man, who thought himself injured, engaged a gentleman from Mr. Cherrers, a reporter of special cases in the different Courts, to furnish a report, and gave him a ticket for the Strangers' Gallery; but the shorthand writer was refused admission to the Reporters' Gallery; and, when he went into the Strangers' Gallery, was told that he could not be allowed to use a pencil. He (Lord Denman) would like to test that regulation with a view to the future. He had great respect for reporters; but as their attention was divided between the mechanical attempt at reporting the words and attention to the subject being debated, he was reminded of his noble father's opinion, that he would rather rely on an advocate for a legal report than trust to the accuracy of a shorthand writer. There was this objection to official reports—that if you corrected any one part, all that you did not touch was taken to be correct. There was no such difficulty attending the correction of Hansard. Mr. Hansard never put in his reports anything but what was said; and if there was any inaccuracy and it was pointed out, the correction was duly attended to. Their Lordships should remember that it was at present a Breach of Privilege to report anything that was said in their Lordships' House; and, therefore, to authorize Mr. Hansard to take reports of their debates was a change of a very important character indeed. He would also observe that the alteration proposed in the 2nd and 3rd Resolutions was not merely an experiment, but was of a permanent character. He thought the Resolutions should have been proposed separately; but if they were pressed, he should move the Previous Question.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES): My Lords, I disagree with the Report brought before us, and the Resolution we are called upon to adopt. In the first place, I object to bringing the reporters into the House. The Gallery is part of the House, and the centre part of it is specially reserved for Members of your Lordships' House. Lately, ladies have been allowed in it, and I am sure that every person who attended in this House on Tuesday must be satisfied that the House is not able to afford seats for all Peers who attended on that occasion, and should another case, such as a Queen's trial or Hastings' trial arise, as it would be no longer possible to transfer it to Westminster Hall, it would be impossible to find room for the Peers without their occupying places in the Gallery. Now, I say, we cannot possibly give up that part of the House to any other persons at all; and, therefore, we ought not to allow those portions of the Gallery to be taken from us, as they would be if given to the reporters. We could not transfer them when once they were put there to anywhere else. It would be highly inexpedient on so short a consideration, with so limited an attendance, to come to a conclusion to bring any other person than ourselves into the body of the House, which would be the practical effect of the proposed alteration. With regard to the question of reporting, I must say I do think there has been a great deal more said against the manner in which the speeches are reported than it deserves. Upon the whole, I think we are very fairly reported. There is one thing I regret—that those who suffer with regard to the interruption from noise in the House are too fond of attributing it to those who are seated on the steps of the Throne or below the Bar. I am sorry to say the great interruption arises from the manner in which we, or many of us, converse among ourselves, in a great deal too loud a voice while a debate is going on, and a Peer is speaking. If more quiet was kept on our own Benches it would be far easier to take an accurate report. With regard to what is proposed by Mr. Hansard, I think his reports are very valuable, far more valuable than they would be if done in the way proposed by this Report. The way we get them now is—that he has the advantage of newspaper reports which his own reporters take. ["No, no!"] Whatever way it is done, he draws up actually a very fair and accurate report of what takes place; and any speech of any importance is, I believe, always sent to the noble Lord who delivers it, to correct in any manner he thinks desirable. That is a very different thing from what we are asked to agree to now. We are asked to revise, the same evening, the speeches we have made on that evening, and the revised report is to go out with that correction. And it is to be what is called semi, or demi-official reporting. I think it will not be desirable in that way to have any such report. I think the reports, as a whole, are very fairly and honestly given to the public; and, though I do not know what is the plan in the House of Commons, we hear that they have some report of this sort. But I will undertake to say that 999 out of every 1,000 of the people who read the debates never read anything but what is in the newspaper of the day; and it is only when you want to refer to some particular matter, time, and place, that you go to Hansard for another, and generally more accurate, report. I think that is now obtained by what he gives us, and that we should do much better to be content with that, and not go further, particularly as I see, in the conclusion of the Report, the lowest item he gives of his understand that my noble Friend, who generally takes upon himself the task of summing up the whole debate, should be dissatisfied with the whole of his remarks not being found in the next day's newspapers. That is just the time the reporters do use that judgment which the people appreciate. This, certainly, could not be the case in a semi-official report, where every word of every speech is taken down. There is one point raised by the noble Earl which is of importance. Some of the best debates I have heard in this House have been in Committee. I have hardly ever seen those Committees at all adequately reported. For instance, the most experienced and able men speak for five or six hours in these Committees upon points of detail which interest the country extremely, and next day you see five lines representing what the few principal speakers have said. I think that is a point which I should like considered. With regard to the semi-official report, there is one point that it entails a large charge. Our expenses exceed our revenue; we have to deal with the Treasury, and, as a Member of the Government, I could hardly vote for this charge without knowing what the negotiations between the Treasury and the officers have been on the subject. But I have not the slightest doubt that if these Resolutions are put I can vote for the change with regard to our Reporters' Gallery.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE: My Lords, the last time I took the liberty to make some remarks on this matter, I chiefly regretted that the Report laid on the Table was very brief, and your Lordships had not had much opportunity for investigating the questions that appeared. But this question is now brought forward in a very thin House, and the Report has not been handed to us more than two days ago. I take a great interest in this matter, yet having been engaged on a Committee I have had no opportunity to read the evidence until this morning. I think this question ought not to be dealt with in an off-hand manner. The noble Earl the Chairman of Committees, whose position in this House is unequalled, has stated most decidedly his strong objection to the Report and advice of the Committee. I do not think there is any disrespect in your Lordships' differing with the Report of any Committee. The Committee has been, no doubt, deeply engaged in the matter, and have done their duty to the very best of their ability; but if it is to be laid down that when a Report is presented to your Lordships' House, that we are not to be permitted to give our distinct objections to the various propositions laid before us, because of the efforts of the Committee to carry out that which we desire, that is no argument why the matter should not be thoroughly investigated. I cannot help thinking that this question of reporting, which was a hobby of the noble Lord's (Lord Sudeley) while in the House of Commons, and which he has introduced into this House, has a great deal less in it than is supposed. I have sat in Parliament for 16 years, and whenever I venture to make any remarks, I always find, if they are worth reporting, they are reported by the gentlemen in the Gallery, and I think some noble Lords in this House are far more fairly treated than the importance of their remarks deserves. The report is simply for the public welfare, and whenever any matters of importance are discussed, you will find ample information is handed forth to the public the next morning. Now, another thing, I think perhaps one of our greatest defects is that, although we may learn a great deal, we do not know properly how to express in speech our peculiar thoughts, whether in the pulpit, or in public places. Anybody who has been connected with public life knows the trouble speaking is to a great many people. I have always remarked, I think invariably, that those people who have the greatest difficulty of enunciation are the most profuse in their observations. I often remark, in this place, as well as in the House of Commons, that noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen, when troubling the audiences which they are addressing, convey their thoughts to them in a manner so difficult of comprehension and of meaning, that very often those people whom they are addressing cannot understand them, much less the reporters in the Gallery. Taking into consideration these facts, I think this House ought to consider deeply before they allow any interference in the structure of this House as contemplated by the Report of the Committee. Whether this House has been constructed with the best acoustic properties I cannot say. Probably, from what we are told, it is not well constructed. But that the architectural proportions of this House, and that the beauty of it, which any of your Lordships who care about architectural structure must admit is great, should be spoiled for the sake of the idea or wish of a certain section of your Lordships' House, that their speeches should be better reported, is not a matter to which I could give my consent. A little architectural antic was tried the other day, by which a box was thrown out from the Reporters' Gallery. It was so hideous that the First Commissioner of Works came in, and told me it was impossible such a thing could continue. If you are going to place the reporters on each side, you will take away considerable room from the Peeresses or Peers who use the Gallery. If you make the other innovation which is proposed—namely, to put a reporter among your Lordships, it seems to me that one of the greatest restrictions that this House and the other House have always maintained will be at once broken through, and that you will have no reason at all, after admitting one reporter to sit in any portion of the House, for refusing another. The Times has most important reports, probably as good, if not better, than Mr. Hansard's. Why should not the reporter of The Times go on the Cross Benches, or the Editor of The Scotsman, who is always anxious to have the best report for the people of the North. Why should not he ask for his reporters to sit behind the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack? The same with regard to country papers. The moment you break through one of the strongest and best rules—that of having only Members of your Lordships' House on its Benches—you will make such an innovation as you will have probably great difficulty afterwards in restraining. Considering how short a Notice we have had of these Resolutions, and how small the House is that is discussing the question, it would be a generous act of my noble Friend (Earl Beauchamp) and his Colleagues on the Committee to withdraw the other Resolutions, and on the meeting of Parliament next year to place them before the House, and take the opinion of the House upon them.

Earl Granville

LORD ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, in the first speech I made I was very nervous, and I spoke very low; but all I said was reported in The Times newspaper.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I cannot agree with the noble Earl (the Earl of Hardwicke) that the proposals contained in the Report would involve any disfigurement of the architectural beauties of this House, and I may remind the noble Earl of Lord Bacon's saying, that a house is made to live in, and not to look at, and that it must fulfil the primary object for which it is intended, and I apprehend that is the accommodation of ourselves. The question is, whether our observations should go forth to the public accurately reported or not, and if that does not concern ourselves, I do not know what does. It concerns us more than anybody else, for if we are to make observations which, because they are not heard, are not published, our observations would lose half their utility. I should not have risen but for an observation which fell from the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees with regard to the admission of Strangers who have no right to be admitted to the steps of the Throne. I think it is possible he may have had his attention directed to four very distinguished Gentlemen whose admission I procured myself, and I should be very sorry that any blame should fall upon the Deputy Usher of the Black Rod for giving them admission. Three of them were distinguished Members of the Canadian Ministry, and the fourth was the Speaker of the Canadian Senate. I mention this lest anyone should think the Deputy Usher of the Black Rod to blame for that; but I have seen other persons there who had not the same claim as these distinguished persons. With regard to what was said about conversation in the House among ourselves, although I admit that my noble Friend (Earl Beauchamp) is quite right to complain of it, and I am afraid I sometimes offend myself, I must point out that in great debates the principal disturbance comes from near the Throne. Even when the House is perfectly attentive and anxious to hear the speaker, there is such a noise round the Throne, especially after a Peer has sat down and happened to make a speech which attracted attention, that I am convinced that the reporters are sometimes totally unable to hear the first part of what is said by the speaker who follows. With regard to the reports, I observe that the noble Marquess who gave evidence before the Committee (the Marquess of Salisbury) alludes to the reporting of important statements which he had sometimes made as Secretary of State. It has not happened to me to make such important statements as the noble Marquess has made; but when I held the Office of Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and especially in former times, I have had to make statements which, owing to their not being heard, were so misreported as to cause extreme inconvenience. I remember once, a great many years ago, as Under Secretary I had to answer a Question put to me. I forget the exact subject; but it was with respect to some matter in the East, and the point of my remark was that some particular person who had been accused of a great crime had not committed it. In all the newspapers next day it was reported that Her Majesty's Government had received information that the person in question had committed an atrocious murder. I need not say that in so serious a matter it was necessary to take steps to correct the error. No doubt, this arose from my speaking indistinctly; but you cannot be always sure to speak distinctly, because all have not the power to do so, and it is only reasonable, therefore, we should bring reporters so near that they may if they choose hear us. I think it is very well worth while to try this experiment. If it does not answer we can withdraw it. With regard to the other point, I agree with my noble Friend. I have grave doubts about the official reports. I agree on the whole, though we may not see our remarks so fully reported as we desire, yet that the reporters do exercise a very wise discretion. For my part, I am really surprised at the tact with which they discover which are the really important speeches, and I do not think that they are guided—and that is where they show so much discretion—merely by the speakers or by their position. They can discriminate when a speech is made, whether it contains observations which it will be worth while reporting. I am extremely glad my noble Friend (Earl Granville) calls attention to the sparseness of reports in Committee. A great deal of information which ought to be published is thereby lost. It is very discouraging, when one has taken great trouble to explain a very difficult point, to find not a word of that information appear next morning, especially when one has charge of an important Bill, and finds that it is of great consequence that particular explanation of clauses and Amendments made should be fully reported. I must say I have experienced, having had the charge of rather complicated Bills myself, great inconvenience from the want of such reports. I have had addressed to me all sorts of inquiries about a clause, all of which would be saved if reporters would kindly in Committee give a little better report. I must apologize for troubling the House; but I really think this proposal as regards the 1st Resolution is worthy to be adopted.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, the reports of the debates of Monday and Tuesday last showed that there were no physical impossibilities to reporting from the Reporters' Gallery. He was astonished at the excellence of those reports, and he had heard most of the speeches on those two nights. He had noticed, however, that the reporters on that occasion were much younger men than usual. It was impossible for older men to hear as well as younger ones. He was very much opposed to the introduction of a reporter into the House, not only on account of what he would hear, but also of what he would see.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: My Lords, with regard to what has taken place, I will not ask your Lordships to divide on the 2nd and 3rd Resolutions; I think the matter has not been sufficiently ventilated. But with regard to the 1st, I think that has met with so much favour that I shall be disposed to take the sense of the House on that point. I will correct one observation of the noble Earl (Earl Granville). The Surveyor of the Office of Works estimates the cost of alterations at £1,500; but I think the advantage to the House will make it a very wise outlay. The sum is very small; but I do not think there should be any misconception. The Resolution has been very carefully drawn, because there was some discussion as to the Galleries, and we were not quite certain as to the proper way of expressing ourselves, the Gallery now used by the reporters being appropriated in lieu of the accommodation they take, supposing this Resolution to be agreed to.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES): You cannot put Peers below the Bar.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: I think it is quite competent for you to say that that part of the House is above the Bar.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES): My Lords, it is not quite regular; but I hope you will hear me, because this is very important. The centre portion of the Galleries, even when ladies are admitted into them, are reserved for Peers, and it never has been otherwise, although ladies have been allowed to sit there; and what I say is this—and it was proved by what took place on Monday and Tuesday—that there are not, when there is a full attendance of Peers, sufficient seats for them in the body of the House; and if you take away the Galleries from the Press, you will find, some time or other, very great inconvenience in conducting the Business of the House. Peers could not use the present Reporters' Gallery, in which they would be placed below the Bar, and consequently out of the House.

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM: My Lords, the propositions made by the noble Earl (Earl Beauchamp) are so radical at this part of the Session that I am glad to hear that the 2nd and 3rd Resolutions are withdrawn, and I hope the noble Earl will withdraw all three until there is a more numerous attendance. I must say I have suffered inconvenience from not finding a seat in your Lordships' House, and I should think the proposition that a portion of this House—a portion of the Gallery which is in the House—should be taken for reporters is a very unsatisfactory one. It is true that that portion of the Gallery is given up to ladies; but the numbers of the House have increased, and it appears to me an inconsistent proposition to diminish the space available. I must say, my Lords, with regard to reporting speeches, there does not seem to me to be much reason to complain; I have always observed that reports have been, on the whole, very satisfactory. With regard to what the noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) said as to proceedings in Committee, they are carried on amid such conversation that often, if reporters were in the side Galleries, they would very likely not hear what was said. I believe there are other expedients which would be more satisfactory. You might have seats behind the Bar, or in the Gallery next to the House of Commons' seats, or behind the Woolsack. Surely, some arrangements might be made; but I do not think this is the time to introduce this change.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, I quite understand the objections of the two noble Earls (the Chairman of Committees and the Earl of Hardwicke), because they object to every kind of change. They should have objected to the Committee altogether. If anything at all is to be done, it is almost impossible to suggest any other plan than the one before you. An erection has been tried at that end of the House, which was termed a nest. That nest has disappeared, and the swallows with it. I suppose your Lordships will not propose to erect anything over the Throne; and, therefore, if you will not have seats at either end, and if they are to be changed, they must be changed to the sides. I perfectly well understand that my noble Friend at the Table objects to this change as to all changes. He says to your Lordships that you are taking away seats which belong to the Peers; I quite admit that we are proposing, to a certain extent, to deprive the Peers of possible accommodation. But I should like to ask, when have Peers occupied those seats? So far as my experience goes, those two Galleries have been locked up for private friends. I see ladies enter it on particular occasions, but I have never seen Peers there; and even on Tuesday last, when Peers complained they could not get seats, I did not see them try to thrust ladies out of a Gallery where they had no business to be. Therefore, the grievance is a theoretical one; and if there are any Peers who desire to sit there on one of those exceptional debates, which, after all, are not very many, I do not think it will interfere with their convenience if they sit where the reporters now are. The Committee bestowed much time and attention on this Motion, the complaints with regard to insufficient reporting have been very general, and I certainly hope your Lordships will adopt my noble Friend's 1st Resolution. With regard to the remark that it would be possible to do away with this inconvenience by speakers simply going to the Table, I only point out that the noble Lord has not read the evidence; because it was said several times that of all the places to make a speech the Table was the most inconvenient, for the singularly excellent reason that the noble Lord always speaks across the Table to those who are sitting exactly in front of him, and not to the reporters. Your Lordships will recollect the other night that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) was reminded by my noble Friend that he was not attempting to convince us, but somebody else. He said, in reply, he had attended before this Committee, and that he was speaking up to the Gallery, in an attitude where he was well heard.

EARL STANHOPE: My Lords, I do not wish to prolong this discussion; but, as a Member of the Committee, I must bear testimony to the excellence of the plan proposed. It is, I believe, the only possible way to allow the reporters to hear the speeches made. It is not that what private Members say is of importance; but now and then what the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs says is heard with very great difficulty; and if a misrepresentation goes out it is a serious matter. Therefore, I hope this proposal will be accepted, and that the 1st Resolution will be carried.

LORD WAVENEY: I should like to ask, whether an alternative could not be found? Ours is the only Assembly where the debate is carried on on right lines. We have no point to which discussion is habitually addressed. That is a very important point indeed, and is avoided in the House of Commons by the habit of addressing the Speaker. We have not the habit of addressing the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, which might avoid the difficulty, notwithstanding the position of the reporters. I say also that it is a question of mechanics. I observe from the evidence of those who have had very large experience of reporting that in the case of a noble Earl speaking from the Woolsack he was heard much better in the rear seats than in the front seats. This would therefore show that the line of sound may pass over the Reporters' Gallery. What have we now before us? We are going deliberately to substitute for one imperfect centre of address, which I consider the Gallery to be, a double one; we shall speak from side to side, and thereby multiply difficulties. Something has been said with regard to the architectural effect, and I have a desire to preserve the beauty of the House. But it does seem to me that it will require no great exertion of architectural skill to provide a tribune for the reporters which would be raised on one side or other of the House. A habit of addressing the reporters would gradually arise in that way, and would avoid the great difficulty and inconvenience of the continued passage of reporters from side to side. The only alternative would be that the papers should have one reporter on each side. That might not be desirable, and I cannot therefore but suggest to the noble Earl (Earl Beauchamp) whether it is not worth while to consider whether he would not substitute one single point for discussion. One remark made by the noble Earl is as to the reports we have received; I quite agree that they are very fairly made, and the selection made is very reasonable of those points most desirable for the people to know. I understood him to say that if we increased their power of hearing we should have better selections from reporting. But if I read the evidence correctly, The Times' reporter said his condensation is made from the shorthand report, and not from the transcript into the long hand; and I should regret that the condensation was made currente calamo. But I cannot agree with the proposition to separate the Galleries. I do not know whether it will be consistent that I should propose for the words "on each side," to substitute "on one side of the Peers." It would give that mechanical advantage which we shall not enjoy in having two Galleries.

On Question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 25; Not-Contents 14: Majority 11.

CONTENTS.

Selborne, L. (L. Chancellor.)	Kimberley, E.
	Manvers, E.
	Morley, E.
Somerset, D.	Northbrook, E.
	Spencer, E.
Beauchamp, E.	Stanhope, E.
[Teller.]	Sherbrooke, V.
Camperdown, E.
Fortescue, E.	Boyle, L. (E. Ark and Ormy.)
Granville, E.

The Earl of Camperdown

Brabourne, L.	Monson, L.
Braye, L.	O'Hagan, L.
Clinton, L.	Skene, L. (E. Fife.)
Kearry, L. (E. Dunraven and Mount-Earl.)	Stanley of Alderley, L.
Monck, L. (V. Monck.)	Sudeley, L. [Teller.]
	Wolverton, L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Feverham, E.	Denman, L.
Hardwicke, E. [Teller.]	Ellenborough, L.
Redesdale, E. [Teller.]	Hammond, L.
	Harlech, L.
Hawarden, V.	Rowton, L.
	Stratheden and Campbell, L.
Alington, L.	Waveney, L.
Aveland, L.
Colchester, L.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 6th August, 1880.

The House met at Two of the clock.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Assaults on Young Persons * [304]; Bastardy Orders * [305].
Committee—Report—Employers' Liability (re-comm.) [209-303]; Elementary Education * [264].
Report—Elementary Education Provisional Orders Confirmation (Cardiff, &c.) * [268]; General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Provisional Order (Forfar Gas) * [283].
Third Reading—Spirits * [210]; Drainage Boards (Ireland) (Additional Powers) * [290]; Metropolitan Board of Works (Money) * [272]; Railway Construction Facilities Act (1864) Amendment [New Title] * [293], and passed.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Ordered, That Copies of the Shorthand Writers' Notes, not already printed, of all Judgments of the Election Judges on Petitions against the return of Members to this House since the last General Election be printed.—(Sir R. Assheton Cross.)

QUESTIONS.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS (IRELAND) ACT —APPLICATION OF LOANS.

Mr. DILLON had the following Question addressed to the Chief Secretary for Ireland on the Paper, but was not present to ask it:—Whether, as a matter of fact, money borrowed under the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act is not being used on more than one estate in Ireland to pay arrears of rent; and, whether this is not being done by a system of deductions from the "nominal" rate of wages paid to tenants employed on relief works; and, if so, whether the Government will take any steps to check such misappropriation of public money?

MR. MOLLOY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will request the Local Government Board to order all landlords who have received money through the power conferred on them under the Relief of Distress Act to furnish the boards of guardians of the several scheduled unions in the townland in which such money was to have been expended, or has been expended, with a statement of the number of men employed and their place of abode, the quantity of land held (if any), the wages paid, and the full amount received by each of the borrowers of such money, in order that the guardians of such scheduled districts may know how far the distress has been relieved?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, as these two Questions are very similar, it will be convenient if I answer them together. I believe that in some cases wages have been paid in the form of remission of rent—that is, the rent has been made a set-off against wages in settlements between landlords and their labourers. I do not believe, however, that it has been done in many cases, and, so far as I can learn, it has been done with the consent of the tenant labourer. I do not approve of the practice; but the Government has no legal power to interfere. I will try to get the information referred to in the Question of the hon. Member for King's County (Mr. Molloy); but I have no power to order the landlords to furnish any such statement.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he will lay on the Table a Return of the names of the Irish landlords of whose reprehensible conduct the Government had notice?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, the practice referred to is, no doubt, open to abuse, and ought to be discouraged; but where there is a thorough understanding between the landlord and the tenant, and where there is no objection on the part of the tenant, I do not think it is fair for the hon. and learned Gentleman to describe the practice as a reprehensible one. With regard to a Return, it would be difficult for us to find out all the cases in which this was done, and I cannot undertake to give a Return.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: At the instance of several friends, I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that several of the landlords of Ireland are receiving their rents from tenants who are unable to live except from charity, and whether he does not consider it reprehensible that they should receive these rents not only from charity, but from State funds?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I do not think I am called on to answer so important a Question offhand, especially when I can give no legal force to my opinion. I trust landlords generally will very carefully consider what their duties are, and if they do not fulfil those duties, I can only say I deeply regret the fact. I hope the remarks which I now make will very much discourage that practice.

NAVY—NAVIGATING OFFICERS.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the Admiralty will take into consideration the case of the old Navigating Officers of the Navy now surviving, a copy of which has been placed in his hands?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Sir, a statement on behalf of the old navigating officers was placed in my hands a few days ago. I can only say at present that attentive consideration will be given to it, as to many other claims of a similar nature, when the Estimates for the coming year are under preparation.

JAPAN—INTERFERENCE WITH CHEMICAL TRADES.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have taken any steps to put an end to the interference, on the part of the Japanese Government, in the drug and chemical trades, which was the subject of a memorial, signed by several influential firms, to Lord Salisbury in August last?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: A copy of the memorial was sent to Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in Japan, with instructions to take such action as might be necessary for the protection of importers of drugs in case there should be proper grounds for the intervention of Her Majesty's Government.

TREATY OF BERLIN—THE CONFERENCE—THE COLLECTIVE NOTE.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is a fact that Her Majesty's Government have entered into agreements or have commenced negotiations for agreements with any of the European Powers, having for their object a concerted or separate display of force against the Government of Turkey for the purpose of inducing that Government to conform to the decisions of the Conference of Berlin as conveyed in the Collective Note; whether similar negotiations have been carried on by Her Majesty's Government for a similar purpose as regards the cession of territory to Montenegro; and, whether the Papers which are to be laid upon the Table will give any information as to the progress of those negotiations, or as to the contents of those agreements; if not, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to furnish the House with full information on these matters before the close of the present Session, and to make to the House a statement of their policy, in order that that policy may receive due consideration before the House separates for the Recess.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Papers will be laid on the Table, very shortly, containing the Collective Note, and the reply of the Porte thereto. The Six Powers are in constant communication as to the further steps to be taken by them together, and I cannot give information as to the nature of these communications at this moment. A Collective Note was presented to the Porte during the present week on the Montenegrin Frontier question, giving the Porte the alternative of two schemes for the settlement of that question. I have every reason to hope that such a settlement will be speedily reached, and it would not be right in me to discuss what measures might be taken by the Powers on the improbable hypothesis that the Porte will decline both alternatives. Her Majesty's Government will place information on these subjects in the possession of Parliament, either by statement or by the presentation of Papers, before Parliament rises.

Mr. W. E. Forster

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Are negotiations still going on?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes.

MR. BOURKE: I should also like to ask whether the Conference Papers will soon be presented to Parliament?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, they were presented yesterday. Delay has been caused by the printing of the maps, which can only be printed at the rate of 200 a-day, and which were photozincographed at Southampton. There will be 100 maps in the Vote Office in the course of the day; but copies cannot be distributed till Monday.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: May I ask the hon. Gentleman another Question about foreign affairs? I wish to know whether there is any truth in the report in some of this morning's papers that Her Majesty's Government have withdrawn the request they made to the Greek Government in favour of inaction on the part of that Power, and whether, in consequence of that, an order for mobilizing the Greek Army has been issued?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: It would be better that the hon. Gentleman should give Notice of a Question of this character.

INDIA (FINANCE, &c.)—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

MR. BIRLEY asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether, having regard to the general anxiety on the subject of Indian Finances and the indefinite assertions which have been published of grave errors in the accounts, he will not reconsider his proposal to postpone the Financial Statement, and submit it to the House on some day during the ensuing week?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I cannot say more than I said yesterday on this subject; but I hope on Monday it will be possible to fix a day for the Indian Financial Statement.

AFFAIRS IN TURKEY—THE INDIAN MAHOMEDANS.

AFGHANISTAN—THE MILITARY POSITION.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been called to a letter from a Mahometan gentleman of Calcutta, named Abdulfazl M. Abdur-Rahman, which appeared in the "Daily Telegraph" of Friday, July 30th, from which the following are extracts:—

"I read to-day the reply of the Porte to the Collective Note of July 15th. Perhaps your readers may care to know the view the 60,000,000 of Indian Mohammedans take of the present crisis in Turkey. It seems to them that the outcome of the strong pressure that is being brought to bear upon the Porte by Her Majesty's Government, and by the so-called European concert, would tend not only to weakening, but eventually breaking up of the Ottoman Empire. Well, Sir, this is an aspect of affairs which the Indian Mohammedans cannot very well look at with satisfaction and confidence.

"During the dreadful Russo-Turkish war the Indian Mohammedans not only evinced their great sympathy with the Sultan and his Imperial Majesty's subjects, their co-religionists in Turkey, but they gave expression to their feelings by holding public meetings in different parts of India, with a view to help their brethren in distress in Turkey.

"They presented addresses to the Queen from different parts of India, expressing to Her their gratitude for the moral support vouchsafed to the Porte, and praying for material help to their Caliph in case of need. What has been the result of this outburst of national Mohammedan sympathy and feeling I do not wish to dwell upon.

"The present Government may ignore, for reasons of their own, the deep and strong feelings of the Indian Mohammedans in regard to the ultimate destiny of the Ottoman Empire, but I, as an Indian Mohammedan, venture respectfully to impress upon them that perhaps some day or other they will have reason to regret their policy in the East."

And, whether, in view of the feeling excited among the Mussulmans of India by their anti-Turkish policy, they will abandon the attempt to coerce the Porte into ceding to other states portions of Ottoman territory. Perhaps the noble Marquess will allow me to ask him at the same time whether there is any truth in the report which appears in the paper this afternoon, that the British Forces have been ordered to withdraw from Cabul in a week or some shorter time?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, my attention has not been called to the letter, except by the Question of the hon. Member. I have no information as to any special excitement at the present moment among the Mahomedans of India. I have no doubt whatever they are watching with great anxiety and interest the progress of events in the East of Europe. I take exception to the description of the policy of Her Majesty's Government contained in the Question, which is described as an "anti-Turkish policy." Her Majesty's Government are of opinion, whether rightly or wrongly, that the policy they are pursuing is in the interest of the Turkish Government itself, as well as in that of the security of Europe. But, without making any further observations on that point, I have only to say that I cannot think it would conduce to the security of our dominion in India if Her Majesty's Government were to alter the policy which, on general grounds, they consider the best in the interests of Europe and of England, on account of a statement, utterly unauthenticated, of the supposed opinions of Mahomedans in India.

In reply to the last Question of the hon. Member, I will read a telegram which was received yesterday evening from the Viceroy:—

"Following from Cabul, August 4:—The Candahar Division marches from Cabul on Saturday, and the remainder of the army for Gandamak on Tuesday or Wednesday. The city and neighbouring districts are quiet, although exaggerated reports of the success of Ayooob near Candahar circulate. Ameer is still at Akserae assisting in the provision of transport for our troops. General Gough's brigade has returned to Sherpur."

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the noble Lord, Whether he would afford facilities for bringing on his Motion with regard to Turkish affairs, which had been shelved on three successive occasions by means to which he would not further allude. He should have thought that with the debating strength on the Treasury Bench and the serried ranks behind it—"Order!"—

MR. SPEAKER pointed out that the hon. Member was out of Order in making a speech while putting a Question.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON thought it would be more convenient if the hon. Member would postpone his Question until Monday, when he might be in a position to state more fully the intentions of the Government with regard to the progress of Business.

The Marquess of Hartington

STATE OF IRELAND.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention had been called to statements in some of the morning papers to the effect that the Government had decided on despatching troops to Ireland; and, whether it was true, as stated in The Daily News, that the Government feared a rising in Ireland in consequence of the rejection by the House of Lords of the Compensation for Disturbance Bill?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I have seen the statement in The Daily News, and I beg to say that any statement that the Government fear a rising in Ireland is entirely without foundation. I, however, regret to say that outrages have been committed upon individuals in Mayo and other parts of Connaught, and, as a consequence, a feeling of insecurity has arisen in those districts. It has, therefore, been thought necessary to order small detachments of troops to those districts in order to give confidence to the well-disposed inhabitants, and to discourage those who are evil-disposed. The gap is being filled up by the transfer of a battalion of Marines to Cork.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked whether it is the intention of the Government to employ any military in carrying out the work of eviction, or whether the work, in cases where the Government may deem it necessary to enforce the law, will be left entirely to the Royal Irish Constabulary?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I hope and expect that the aid of the military will not be wanted for any purpose. I must add that I do not expect that it will be employed to assist in any evictions, and I should exceedingly regret such a necessity. I can only repeat that the ground on which we have thought it necessary to quarter this small detachment is not on account of any special resistance to evictions, but on account of the outrages which have taken place to individuals, and of the danger which individuals seem to be in, and the consequent sense of insecurity felt in the districts I have mentioned. It is in order to give confidence to the well-disposed, and discouragement to the ill-disposed, that we have thought it necessary to order a small detachment of troops to the different towns in the localities concerned.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked what Bill the Government proposed to take at the Morning Sitting to-morrow?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, as I stated last night, we propose to take the Post Office Money Orders Bill, the Merchant Shipping (Grain Cargoes) Bill, the Census Bill, and the Elementary Education Bill. It may, however, be for the convenience of the House to take the Employers' Liability Bill to-morrow in case only a small and unimportant portion of that measure be disposed of to-day. ["Oh, oh!"] Of course, we should not propose to take the Bill at a Morning Sitting to-morrow if the proposal does not meet with the general consent of the House.

MR. PARNELL asked the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India, Whether he would afford him facilities for discussing the following Motion, which stood on the Notice Book in his name:—

"To call attention to the Parliamentary relations existing between England and Ireland, and to move—'That, in the opinion of this House, the rejection of the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill by the House of Lords, adds one more to the many overwhelming proofs afforded since the Union of the necessity for such a radical change in these relations as will permit legislative effect in future to the voice of the vast majority of the electors of Ireland, constitutionally expressed.'"

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I regret very much that any cause should prevent or delay the hon. Member in raising the discussion which he may consider necessary upon the Parliamentary relations between Great Britain and Ireland, as they are affected by the recent decision of the House of Lords on the Compensation for Disturbance Bill; but I am of opinion that the Government are in the first instance responsible to the House for the progress of the measures which they have introduced, and for the other Business of which they have charge. In the present state of that Business I regret to say that I do not see any probability of being able to offer to the hon. Member an early day for the consideration of his Motion.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY (re-committed)
BILL—[BILL 209.]

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Brassey.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 5th August.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 4 (Limit of time for recovery of compensation).

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 31, to leave out the words "six weeks," in order to insert the words "three months."—(Mr. Dodson.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'six weeks' stand part of the Clause."

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, that if Her Majesty's Government adhered to the Amendment they had proposed he should certainly support them; but before doing so, he would invite their attention to the whole scope of the clause, in order to consider whether it was necessary to guard and fence around, by any kind of restriction, the right which the Bill assumed was to be given to the workmen. Let them consider for a moment with what view they were making these restrictions. The whole history of restriction of this description arose in this way. He believed the earliest of them had reference to the actions against Justices, officers of the Customs, and persons charged with the execution of a public duty. It sometimes arose that by some slip or error a Justice of the Peace or a Custom House officer did something which amounted, in point of law, to trespass; and then, in the then state of the law, any person could take advantage of the irregularity, and be able to bring an action and recover his costs. By a circuitous and cumbrous piece of legislation an Act of Parliament was passed requiring the plaintiff to give notice, in order that a tender might be made. One provision was that 2*d.* paid into Court should be a full answer to an action of that sort; but the whole object was to control that particular class of actions, and to require the plaintiff to forfeit costs if the trial really came off. The state of things with which they were dealing now was very different. They were making provisions for the case of a workman who had suffered a real injury. If the workman had suffered no real injury, and the damage ultimately assessed should turn out to be so trifling and insignificant as to show that the action ought never to have been brought at all, then, in the present state of the law, there was a complete control over the costs. Therefore, that which gave rise to this state of things had passed away and gone by. It appeared, therefore, to him that the draftsman, in the present instance, had gone back to an old, cumbrous, and inconvenient form of legislation which was wholly unnecessary. There was, however, another view of the case. Let the Committee consider the effect of this provision upon a really honest sufferer. According to his experience, these notices of action were merely traps and pitfalls to the honest sufferers; whereas the dishonest sufferer would employ some pettifogger, who was just the man who would never fall into such a blunder. Very frequently the last thing which occurred to the man who had really suffered an injury was the notion of going to law, and, as a rule, he never went to law until he was compelled by dire necessity. Then, unless he gave notice of action within six weeks, or, according to the present Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, three months, he would find himself too late. It seemed to him (Sir Hardinge Giffard) that legislation of this kind would operate exactly in a wrong direction. A dishonest person bringing an action would never fall into such a pitfall; whereas the man who had really sustained an injury would be very likely to do so. The employer who would be responsible to make compensation was a man who, to a certain extent, would be cognizant of, and would have the means of ascertaining, by evidence, what had been the history of the person who had been injured. At the present moment, such a stringent provision was not applied in the outside world, even in the case where the relations of employer and employed did not exist. For instance, in the case where a man dismissed his coachman, he would have no opportunity of finding out any or what accidents that coachman might have caused, or the extent of injury inflicted by him in any particular case; but, at any time subsequently, a person injured could bring this action against the master of the coachman, although the coachman himself might have been dismissed a year or two before. In the case dealt with under the present Bill the employer must have much better means of information. He must, for instance, know whether such an act took place or not; because, in all probability, the injured person would not be the only individual in the master's employment. But it was in reference to a workman under such circumstances, and to him alone, that it was proposed to introduce this legislation. It certainly seemed to him that they were proposing to give, with one hand, a right to compensation, and that they were very much disposed to take it away with the other; and there was a possibility that the provision they proposed to make would give rise to the very litigation they were anxious, if possible, to prevent. Accidents of the kind that were dealt with in the Bill were just the class of accidents that persons interested in conducting legal proceedings should be perfectly alive to. There was a probability, when such an accident occurred, one of this class of practitioners would go to the injured man at once, and say—"Let me act for you, because if you have no one to look after your interests, and you do not serve your notice of action in time, you will be out of Court. You have no time for consideration in the case. You are suffering from an accident, and you must determine at once whether you will bring an action for compensation or not." It certainly appeared to him that the provision would foster litigation; and instead of leading to correspondence with the employer, and an equitable arrangement, would do great injury to the class of persons they were anxious to serve. He did not assume that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodson) would accept every suggestion that was made to him; but if, after this suggestion, the right hon. Gentleman adhered to his Amendment he should certainly support it, on the ground that it would be a very considerable improvement of the clause as it stood.

Sir Hardinge Giffard

MR. DODSON said, he would state in a few words, in answer to the hon. and learned Gentleman, why this clause was inserted. In the first place, he might say that the clause was taken, as it stood in the Bill, bodily from the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald), who would certainly not be suspected of designing to introduce a clause adverse to the interests of the working classes. The Government had adopted it into the Bill because they thought it was a clause which, in its operation, would not bear unfairly upon the workmen, and which, at the same time, would only be just and reasonable to the employers. There were actions against employers which arose out of the negligence of one man towards another; and it was only fair to the employer that he should have notice given to him within a reasonably short time, so that he should be able to make a full inquiry while the matter was fresh, and there should be no surprise, as there might be if a case was to go on behind his back, and he was to have no notice of it until a considerable time had elapsed. He thought the Committee would feel that it was possible for the employer to be placed in a disadvantageous and unfair position, in which it would be impossible or difficult for him to ascertain the real facts. That was the object with which the clause was adopted. But the Government thought, on further consideration, that this requirement of notice of injury to be given within six weeks was too short a time to enable a man to ascertain the nature and extent of his injury; and, therefore, they thought it would be only fair to adopt the Amendment proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), and to substitute three months for six weeks. He did not understand the hon. and learned Gentleman to object to the extension of the period within which notice of action should be given. It was the limitation of period within which actions were to be brought under Lord Campbell's Act.

MR. J. W. PEASE remarked, that there was also a practical difficulty which had not been touched by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite. Perhaps his right hon. Friend would be content to leave this clause out, if provision were made for giving a comparatively short notice of injury. An Amendment to that effect had already been placed on the Paper by his hon. Friend the Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood), who proposed that notice of injury should be given within 14 days. It was important that notice of injury should be given as soon as possible, and it was desirable to give sufficient time, and no more than sufficient time, for a man to make up his mind whether he was injured or not. Such notice should be given within 14 or 20 days, and then leave the man to bring his action whenever he liked, the employer having thus been made aware of the claim. In the mining population, with which he was acquainted, there were numbers of young men who were necessarily of a migratory class. They worked for a week or a fortnight in one colliery, and then went for a fortnight to another, especially in such times as these when work was uncertain; and in the course of a few weeks one of these young men, with no family ties, would often be working in three or four places. Therefore, it seemed to be necessary that, before a man left the employment in which he had sustained an injury, he should, at the very least, be required to give notice of the injury. He could not conceive that there was anything wrong in this, or that it could be regarded in any way as a curtailment of the privileges of the workmen. Whenever a man thought himself to be hurt he should afford the employer an opportunity of investigating the case with the least possible delay. Two or three weeks would give the man an opportunity of sending notice, and his employer the opportunity of sending for the doctor, and of obtaining the best possible advice as to the nature of his injuries. He hoped, therefore, that the Government would accept the proposal of the hon. Member for Hull. The time for bringing the action might be left almost unlimited; but the notice of injury should be short.

MR. HERMON thought that notice of injury could not be given too quickly to the employer; but he should be very sorry to see the time for bringing an action limited to six weeks. The Amendment now proposed for extending the period to three months was, he thought, an alteration for the better. It must be borne in mind that when a notice of action was given it had a tendency to stop all negotiations for an amicable arrangement, and only stirred up ill-feeling. In the absence of a notice of action the injured man and his employer might often come to terms without the necessity of resorting to an action at all. For this reason, he thought it would be an advantage to extend the period named in the Bill for notice of action, particularly as there was always in these cases a desire on the part of the employer to negotiate and come to terms.

MR. NORWOOD said, he had an Amendment on the Paper which had already been explained by his hon. Friend the Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease). He was quite indifferent as to the time for bringing an action; but he certainly thought they ought to require that notice of injury should be given within 14 days. Hon. Members, in discussing the Bill, had principally in their minds the serious accidents which occurred in mines and upon railways. But in mines and on railways, when accidents occurred, they were generally of a very serious nature indeed, and in such cases the employers had ample notice of them; from common report, and from public sentiment, they were made acquainted with the nature and extent of the injuries inflicted. But in connection with other businesses a vast number of accidents occurred which were of a comparatively trivial nature. Men slightly injured a hand or maimed a leg by some article falling upon them; and it would be most unjust, when such injuries, involving compensation, were sustained, if they were not at once brought to the knowledge of the employer. If the Committee accepted his Amendment, or something to the same effect, he would be quite willing to extend the period for bringing the action.

MR. BARNES thought it was very important that the time in which the notice of injury could be given should be limited to 14 days, so that all the circumstances of the accident could be taken into consideration.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF remarked, that a man might have received such serious injury in an accident that within three months he could not take the proper steps to give notice of action; and why, therefore, should he be debarred from receiving compensation? There were accidents in mines and on railways in consequence of which men were laid up for months and totally unable to take the steps required by this clause. The Government, therefore, ought to seriously consider this matter, so that the persons very badly injured should not be debarred from compensation. Unless care were taken it would be only those trivially injured who would be able to receive compensation.

Mr. Hermon

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, that it seemed to him that the proposal now made by the Government was, upon the whole, a reasonable one, for three months in which notice should be given was certainly a short enough period. Many hon. Members, who had made remarks upon the Amendment, had assumed that accidents did not occur which resulted in death or in any serious injury. In case of death it was necessary that time should be afforded for consideration as to who was to give notice of action. It might be some time before the relatives of the deceased workman could understand their position, and some time especially before they could understand who had the right to bring the action. It, therefore, appeared to him that three months was not too long a time in which to allow the notice of action to be given. There was, no doubt, a great deal of force in what the hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) had stated, because it was not quite clear that the clause was at all justifiable. Much could be said in favour of the clause, and equally good arguments might be advanced against it. In his opinion, the strongest argument in favour of the limitation was the danger lest a workman, when discharged, might be induced by someone or other to bring an action against his late employer without sufficient cause. To guard against such an event the limitation was justifiable.

MR. BROADHURST thought, with several others, that the clause might very well be omitted; but in order not to appear to depart from the principle of the Bill, he would say that the proposal now made with regard to the notice of the injury was very reasonable in itself, although he thought that 14 days was too little time to allow in which the notice of injury could be given. They ought to have six weeks allowed, or, at the very least, a month. But, apart from that, he believed that in all well-regulated works — and there were large employers of labour in the House who would be able to correct him if he were wrong — it was the custom for the manager to report all the accidents to his employer, together with the circumstances surrounding the accidents. It would, however, be only fair that six weeks be allowed in which to give notice of the injury; because it might occur that a workman sustained some injury to his brain, and that he was totally incapacitated from giving legal notice for a considerable time. If a month even were allowed for the notice, and unlimited time given for the actual bringing of the action, a very reasonable concession would be made.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, that although he felt the force of the observations of the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease), he was rather favourable to notices of action instead of notices of injury. Very great care would have to be taken in giving a notice of injury; otherwise, at the trial, it would be open to many technical objections. If the nature of the injury had to be stated, the plaintiff would often fail from not having stated it accurately; and, moreover, in many cases the full extent of the injury might not develop itself till after notice given. Anyone conversant with railway accidents must be aware of this. If notice of injury was to be given, it should simply be a notice that A B had been injured. When once an employer had a notice of action served upon him it would be his own fault if he did not make inquiries, if it were only to effect a compromise in the matter as soon as possible. The object of the clause was to give an employer full notice, at an early period, that a person had been injured, and that it was possible proceedings would be taken. Upon the whole, then, he rather inclined to the suggestion of serving notices of action, instead of notices of injuries, unless the notice of injury was in a very general form.

MR. HOPWOOD could not agree with the hon. Member (Sir Henry Holland) that notices of injury would be open to more technical objections than notices of action. He apprehended that nothing would be required but a statement in general terms of the injury. The time suggested—14 days—in which notice of injury should be given, appeared to him far too little. There were many accidents the effects of which a man might not feel for some days, and yet he would be justified in applying for compensation if it could be proved that the accident had been brought about by negligence on the part of the employer. He knew of cases in which injuries were not developed within 14 days, or even within six weeks; and, therefore, he thought that ample time ought to be afforded. He approved of the suggestion that notice should be given of the injury instead of the action.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON agreed with the suggestion of his hon. Friend opposite (Sir Henry Holland), that it would be better to give notice of injury instead of notice of action. He thought it was due to the employer that he should have the earliest possible notice of the injury which might be the subject of claim; but it would be wrong to restrict the notice to the short time suggested by the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood). His hon. Friend seemed to have confined his attention to injuries sustained in accidents in mines in which the consequences were direct and palpable. But there were injuries sustained in railway accidents which did not develop themselves in 14 days, or even in six weeks. He, like his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Hopwood), was cognizant of such instances. He had known cases in which persons had received a shock in a railway accident. They had been a little shaken, and in two or three days they were, to all appearances, quite well; but in a few months the injuries received had developed and sometimes resulted in death. Having regard to such cases as those, he thought the time ought to be prolonged beyond 14 days. He trusted the Government would consent to the proposed alteration in respect to the notices, in which case six weeks would be a fair time, an unlimited time afterwards being given in which to bring the action.

MR. NORWOOD said, that his reason for fixing upon 14 days was that in many large establishments the pay was fortnightly, and he thought it would not be unreasonable to provide that the notices should be given on pay day. The period ought not to be too extended, because men were constantly changing from one employment to another, and because the employer might be unable to get evidence after the lapse of a long time, and might not be able to form an opinion whether a compromise ought to be effected. He would be very happy to adopt any period which the Committee might think fit. For instance, he would be quite willing to accept a month, in lieu of 14 days.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, it was perfectly easy to suggest cases of hardships in any event. It must be admitted that there were exceptional cases in which a workman receiving injuries would be debarred from compensation if the time in which he could give notice were too limited; but the Committee must recollect, also, that if they allowed too long an interval between the accident and the giving of the notice they might do an injustice to the master. Their object ought to be, in legislation, to do the least possible injustice to anybody, and he hoped the Government would consent to substitute "six weeks" for "14 days."

MR. DODSON said, he had listened with great attention to the discussion which had just taken place; and he gathered that the feeling of the Committee, on the whole, was to prefer that notices of injury should be given instead of notices of action. He was willing, therefore, to defer to that feeling, and would propose that the first part of the clause should read—

"An action for the recovery under this Act of compensation for an injury shall not be maintainable unless notice that injury has been sustained is given within six weeks."

He felt that he must adhere to the six weeks.

MR. WARTON thought it extremely inconvenient to have kaleidoscopic legislation. They had an Amendment proposed last night, by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodson), in such a way as to show that he wanted to force it through the Committee between 25 minutes past 11 o'clock and 29 minutes past. The right hon. Gentleman had now changed his mind, and he (Mr. Warton) objected to such sudden changes and alterations. Let them try to do one thing at a time, and then, perhaps, they might do it well. He understood that the Question before the Committee was the substitution of the words "three months" for "six weeks," and upon that point he was anxious to address hon. Gentlemen. This was one of the most important questions in the Bill; and, in the first place, he desired to say, with the utmost deference to the hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard), that he felt bound to dissent from something he had addressed to the Committee. If this were a Party question he would follow the hon. and learned Member implicitly; but it was not a Party question, and he must be allowed to say that he did not quite agree with the hon. and learned Member's history of the law with regard to the notices of action. The history was perfectly correct, so far as it went; but it did not come down quite late enough. The hon. and learned Gentleman stated that notices of action were only given in the case of Custom House officers, magistrates, and others in a like position. But he (Mr. Warton) must direct the attention of the Committee to the late Larceny Act, by which notices of action were provided for not only in the case of masters and servants or employers and employés, as they were now denominated, but in the case of the public. If one man accused another of felony, the accused was entitled to a notice of action. The principle of notice of action was more extensive than had been laid down by the hon. and learned Gentleman. The question now under discussion was one of justice. All practical employers of labour, all those who knew what business really was—whether they be shipowners, mineowners, or anything else—knew perfectly well that it was desirable that, as soon as possible, an employer should have the means and opportunity of finding out what really had taken place; and therefore, in his opinion, three months was a very long time in which to allow the service of notice upon the master. In three months all traces of the accident might be removed; the witness might have left the locality; and thus the employer would be quite unable to make the necessary inquiries. It must not be assumed that in all cases an employer knew everything that had happened. A man might receive an injury to his foot, at first say nothing about it; but, eventually, make a claim for compensation. He regarded this as a very serious matter, and was inclined to think that a month would be a reasonable time to allow. As the Government preferred six weeks he would not attempt to oppose them; but he would say that the frequent changes made by the Government showed great weakness on their part. A month would be quite long enough to allow, and would be fair alike to employer and employed. He was afraid the Government had a sort of fear that they would not be keeping a kind of bargain with the workmen. Let them get rid of all class considerations and take a broad view of the matter. Let them take, for instance, two men who were not master and servant. Was it not fair that some notice should be given? Was it not fair that the defendant in general should have some notice of the proceedings to be taken against him? He quite agreed with the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland), whose observations the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon) did not seem to comprehend, that a notice of action was what should be given, as notices of injury would, unquestionably, involve great technical objections. The earlier the notice of action was given, the longer would be the time in which a compromise might be arrived at. In the interest of the employer, and in the interest of justice between man and man, it was not fair that the evidence should be kept back. It was not fair that an opportunity should not be given to the defendant to meet his case.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) appealed to the Committee, if they wanted to make any progress, to come to some determination upon this question. He assured hon. Gentlemen that the Government had no desire to change or shift about; but the very obvious object of the discussion in the House was to ascertain the views of hon. Gentlemen. If the Government intended to blindly adhere to the Bill as originally drafted, they had better say that the Bill should be carried without discussion. He trusted the Committee would be spared observations such as they had heard from the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton), that the Government showed a desire to be convinced by argument. They had consented to the suggestion that there should be a notice given that an injury had been sustained, and they would avoid the difficulty of requiring that a technical description of the injury should be given. If they did that, and allowed six weeks in which the notice might be given, they would, he believed, best follow the sense of the Committee.

MR. CRAIG: I think it is necessary that some remarks should be made by a practical man with regard to this matter. Accidents occurring in mines are sometimes of a very slight character; and if there is no notice whatever given to the employer of the injury, all traces of the accident may disappear, even within a fortnight. Now, there are some substantial differences between notice of action and notice of injury; and I quite agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman on the other side (Sir Hardinge Giffard) that an injured person might be placed at a most serious disadvantage by having his notice of action limited to three, or even six, months. But the employer might also be placed at a serious disadvantage by having notice of injury suspended even for a fortnight. The Mines Regulation Act requires owners, agents, or managers, to give notice to the Inspector, within 24 hours, of any death or serious bodily injury occurring in their mines. I have ascertained that in North Staffordshire the notices of injury of a serious character are something like 10 non-fatal to one fatal accident; while the non-fatal accidents actually occurring are in the proportion of 60 to one. A great number of those injuries are very slight; and, therefore, an employer might have no knowledge whatever of such having taken place. A person receiving a slight injury might go away elsewhere, and might bring his action without the employer being able to take any efficient steps to defend himself. I think notice of injury might be given within 24 hours, as required by the Mines Regulation Act. At all events, I think a fortnight is long enough, if, indeed, not too long. I do hope the Government will certainly not extend the time for notice of injury beyond 14 days. If they do, I can quite see that difficulties will arise, and employers will be placed at a most serious disadvantage; because the person intrusted with supervision, who, it may be alleged, has, by his negligence, occasioned the injury, might have left the employment, and even the neighbourhood, where the accident occurred.

SIR HENRY JACKSON had no objection to raise to the Government proposal, for it was fair and reasonable and proper that there should be a clause of this kind. It must be remembered that they were proposing a new liability altogether, the operation of which no one could foresee. They were bringing into play cases in which the presumption was that the number of accidents would be very large, and that the people to suffer by them would be of the migratory class. Looking at the thing from a practical point of view, the original proposal of the Government was a very fair and reasonable solution of the question. When the Government introduced their Bill, they all presumed that they would stand by their own propositions. Objections had been taken, and the Government had yielded. He would not quarrel with the decision with respect to the six weeks. Somebody must determine the point. The principle of the clause, however, was the limitation of the action, and the notice of the injury was, of course, included. He did not understand how the clause was going to run.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR FARRER HERSCHELL): The words will be "notice that injury has been sustained," instead of "notice of such action."

MR. THOMPSON wished to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that these men to whom the accidents occurred very seldom had any money in hand, and when they were injured they applied to one of two parties—either to their employer when their wages were payable, or to some benevolent society to which they belonged. If there was a possibility of an action hanging over an employer, the benevolent society would naturally say—"We will give this man nothing, because in a short time he will have a right of action against someone. We should be merely wasting our money." In the interest, therefore, of the workman, it was necessary that he should be compelled—either he or his family—to give notice on the next pay-day as to the course it was intended to adopt. If the man's reason were affected, then came to his assistance one of the great principles of English equity, which gave relief to the afflicted by extending the time in matters of this kind, and which would be administered by the County Courts. But in nine cases out of 10 these actions would be for small amounts. He held in his hand a paper from a benevolent relief fund, showing what they had done. Last year, it appeared, they had relieved persons, the subjects of accidents, to the number of 12,000. In 9,000 cases they had paid 15s. each, or something like it. Surely, the Committee were not going to allow such trivial cases as these to hang over the owners of property for two or three months. The thing would be entirely forgotten if such a length of time were allowed, for employers and their managers had something else to do than occupy their minds with such small matters. The living and healthy had to be taken care of, as well as the injured, and owners of mines and other great works would have their time unnecessarily taken up if notice of an injury were put off, and if they were required to bear in remembrance the details of any slight accident for many weeks after it happened. He hoped the Committee would adhere to the original clause.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD wished to know whether the Government intended that the notice of injury should be in writing, or should be given by word of mouth; because if it were to be given in writing, the words "in writing" should be inserted. He mentioned this now, because he wished it to be considered before the Amendment was put.

MR. DODSON said, that as it was necessary that notice of injury should be given to the employer, machinery should be provided for that notice; and it was, therefore, proposed to bring up a short clause dealing with the matter at a later stage.

An hon. MEMBER said, it was necessary to limit the time at which notice of injury should be given. He would give, as an illustration, a case which had come within his own observation. In 1854 a lamentable accident, through the bursting of a reservoir, occurred in Sheffield, by which 200 or 300 people were drowned. The Water Company, to whom the reservoir belonged, were urged to at once employ all the valuers in town to go round and see what the damage was. They did not take the advice pressed on them. They allowed time to go by, and the Directors ultimately came to the conclusion that, instead of the damages being limited to £150,000, or £200,000, they amounted to nearly £400,000. They all knew how easily men were induced to follow a bad example that might be set before them. Therefore, he would compel everyone in case of accident, whether on a railway or anywhere else, to give notice without loss of time. They might depend upon it that the more rapidly a workman gave notice of an injury the better it would be for himself and the whole of the community. He hoped the Committee would support the Amendment for the limitation of time.

Sir Henry Jackson

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. DODSON said, he proposed to omit the words "such action will be brought," in order to insert the words "injury has been sustained."

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, lines 30 and 31, to leave out the words "such action will be brought," and insert "injury has been sustained."—(Mr. Dodson.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, that in the Bill the limit of time within which an action might be brought was six months; but he proposed to alter it to 12 months. He would not take up the time of the Committee by saying more than that it was a very novel thing to introduce a limitation of action different from the ordinary limitation. He agreed with a great deal that had been said on the other side with regard to introducing a new limitation; but, in order to meet the thing half-way, it seemed to him it would be reasonable to let the workman have 12 months instead of six to bring his action.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "six," and insert "twelve."—(Mr. Morgan Lloyd.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. INDERWICK said, he had an Amendment on the Paper to this clause; but if the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill was inclined to accept the principle of it, he would leave to him the terms in which it should be drawn. Under the 1st clause of the Bill the relatives of a workman who was killed in the course of his employment were entitled to compensation. By Lord Campbell's Act it was provided that if any person was killed through the negligence of another person, whether it was criminal negligence or otherwise, an action might be brought within 12 months by the executors of the deceased person. There could only be one action brought, and the compensation given, if any, was distributed amongst the relatives specified—the mother or father, the husband or wife, or children of the deceased person. The Act provided machinery by which this distribution was made, and the amount of compensation settled. And it provided that an action was to be brought within a limited time of the death of the person. Now, the present Bill gave a right to the relatives of the deceased workman to claim compensation; but it did not provide such machinery for obtaining that compensation as, in his opinion, was right and desirable, in the interest either of the persons claiming compensation or of those against whom the claim for compensation was made. The words he proposed to add to the clause were these—

"Provided always, That, where the injury results in death, any such action shall be brought in the name of the executor or administrator of the person deceased, and may be brought at any time within twelve calendar months after the death of such person, and such action shall be tried, and the compensation dealt with in accordance with the provisions of the Act ninth and tenth Victoria, chapter ninety-three, so far as the provisions are not inconsistent with this Act."

The result of this would be that, where a workman lost his life through the negligence of some person having superintendence, according to the terms of the Act there must, first of all, be an executor or administrator appointed before an action could be brought. It must be brought within 12 months of the death of the workman, and the compensation would be distributed according to the provisions of Lord Campbell's Act amongst those declared in that Act to be entitled to it. The only point upon which he thought there could be any substantial difficulty was that which limited the period within which actions could be brought. He had made the limit "twelve calendar months after the death of such person," and he had selected that time because it was the time fixed in Lord Campbell's Act. It was necessary that the period over which notice of injury could be given should be somewhat longer than it was at present, as it might be necessary to appoint legal personal representatives. It stood to reason that after a man's death sufficient time should be allowed for the necessary legal process; but, still, he did not stand on 12 months. He would be willing to accept any time that the Committee might think reasonable. It had been suggested to him, by the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill, that six months would be a reasonable time within which an action could be brought; and if that was considered reasonable, he was willing to accept such limit. He would not trouble the Committee to discuss the matter at greater length, and he would only say that the question was one which he thought should be carefully considered. He had brought his proposal forward for the purpose of assisting the carrying out of the objects of the Bill, and for the purpose of benefiting both parties—both the employer and the workman.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, there was a very good reason why he could not accept the proposal, and it was this. The provisions of the Bill would apply equally to England and Scotland, and Lord Campbell's Act did not apply to Scotland. The spirit of the clause the Government were disposed to accept, because it certainly seemed reasonable that where an action was brought in respect of a man's death a sufficient amount of time should be given to the representatives to take out letters of administration. If the hon. and learned Gentleman would withdraw his Amendment, and allow these words to be added to the end of Clause 4:—"or, in case of death, within six months from the time of death," the difficulty would be met. They certainly considered six months a more reasonable time than 12.

MR. INDERWICK said, he was willing to accept the suggestion. He thought, however, it would be desirable that some words should be added giving the County Court Judge, or on whomsoever the duty devolved, the power of distributing the compensation.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): There is a limitation as to time.

MR. INDERWICK: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman bring in the words?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): We have got the clause amended.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, at the end of clause, to add—"or, in the case of death, within six months of the time of death."
—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Mr. Inderwick

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Trial of actions).

MR. HOPWOOD moved, in page 2, line 34, after "workman," to insert "or his personal representatives."

MR. DODSON said, he was prepared virtually to agree to the Amendment; but if the words suggested were inserted, a consequential Amendment would have to be made in the 1st clause. He proposed to obtain the object the hon. and learned Member had in view by omitting the words "by a workman;" and the clause would then read—

"Every action for the recovery of compensation under this Act shall be brought in a county court, but may be removed into a superior court in like manner as an action commenced in a county court may by law be removed."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. HOPWOOD moved, in page 2, line 35, to leave out "shall," and insert "may."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) hoped the Committee would not agree to the Amendment. The object of the clause, as it stood, was that litigation should be as little costly as possible; and looking at this fact, and at the fact that these actions were only for small amounts of compensation, it would be well to avoid the costs of going into Superior Courts. Ample power to move the case into a Superior Court would be given in more important cases.

DR. WEBSTER said, that before the matter was fully disposed of, he wished to submit a point which he thought of some importance. If the clause stood in its original form with a paragraph giving to workmen suing under it unlimited power of appeal in Scotland, it would be all very right; but while, in the first paragraph of the clause, there was full and unlimited power of appeal to the Court of Session in all cases, that by the Amendment would be limited and fettered in the case of Scotland. For the first time restrictions in the way of appeal in a great many cases would be introduced. He had an Amendment on the Paper to obviate this evil; and if he did not succeed in his attempt to get the subsequent sub-section, in regard to Scotland, omitted, the power of appeal would be limited and barred by the operation of the Amendments. The effect of the Amendment would be that in Scotland, where cases must be tried before the Sheriff's Court without a jury, a workman would be deprived of the power of having his case tried by a jury.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that if the hon. Member would look at Clause 5, he would find that there was some power of removal to the Court of Session in Scotland.

DR. WEBSTER said, that was quite delusive, and he would afterwards attempt to show it would be unfair to the workman. It would not be effectual.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. THOMPSON said, it was desirable to cheapen the legal proceedings under this Bill, and he had an Amendment on the Paper to that effect, although he did not think it would be of much use to move it. He thought some plan ought to be adopted whereby the expense of these cases would be very much diminished. His Amendment was as follows:—In page 2, line 35, after "court," to leave out to the end of Clause, and insert—

"Of the district where the injury was caused, and on the hearing of the said action no counsel or attorney shall be heard for either party, except by leave of the judge of the said court, obtained by notice in writing signed by the party requiring such counsel or attorney and delivered to the said judge, by post or otherwise, two clear days before the hearing of the said cause; and in no case shall more than one counsel where counsel is required, nor more than one attorney, without counsel, where an attorney is required, be heard on either side. Any workman, however, claiming compensation under this Act, in case he does not employ counsel or attorney, may be assisted at the hearing of the said action, upon giving such notice to the said judge as aforesaid, by any secretary or other officer of any one trades or miners' union or benefit society to which he belongs. In no case shall any costs for any matter under this Act be allowed to either party, and no proceeding under this Act shall be removed to any superior court."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he himself proposed, in line 36, after the word "court," to insert the words "on the application either of the plaintiff or the defendant;" and after the words "in like manner," to insert the words "on the same conditions." His object was to make it quite clear that either party might be able to move the case to a Superior Court.

Amendment (Mr. Thompson), by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HERMON: With regard to the hon. Member's Amendment—

THE CHAIRMAN: He did not move it.

MR. HERMON: I thought he had done so. You sometimes ask hon. Members to speak up, so that we may know what is going on. The Amendment of the hon. Member is most important, particularly the latter part of it. ["Order, order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment has not been moved; it is withdrawn.

MR. HERMON: I rise to Order. I think this Amendment is a very important one, and I wish to ask you whether it is not in my power to move an Amendment similar to it? The fact is, if you take the Amendment of the Solicitor General it will put me out of court, because he deals with the clause a line further on. I shall be entirely out of court if I am not now allowed to move. I quite understood, from the hon. Member addressing you so long, that he was endeavouring to explain the Amendment on the Paper. I was not at all prepared for the hon. Member declining to press his Amendment after his remarks.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am sorry the hon. Member did not hear the remarks, and did not know that the proposer of the Amendment declined to move it. Finding that the Amendment was not proposed, I called on the Solicitor General to move his. Therefore, the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hermon) is not in Order in bringing up this question.

MR. GORST: May I ask, as a matter of Order, whether the Solicitor General's Amendment is already put from the Chair?

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Amendment, in page 2, line 36, after the word "court," to insert the words "by either plaintiff or defendant," — (Mr. Solicitor General),—put, and agreed to.

MR. NEWDEGATE then rose.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order! There is no Question yet before the Committee.

MR. GORST: I propose to move—

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no Question.

MR. GORST: I propose to move an Amendment to the 1st sub-section.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL): I propose, in the same clause, after the words "like manner," to insert "and upon the same conditions."

Amendment, in page 2, line 36, after "manner," insert "and upon the same conditions,"—(Mr. Solicitor General,)—put, and agreed to.

MR. GORST said, that in order to put the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hermon) in Order, he would move the addition of the following Proviso to the 1st sub-section—

"Any workman, however, claiming compensation under this Act, in case he does not employ counsel or attorney, may be assisted at the hearing of the said action, upon giving such notice to the said judge as aforesaid, by any secretary or other officer of any one trades or miners' union or benefit society to which he belongs. In no case shall any costs for any matter under this Act be allowed to either party, and no proceeding under this Act shall be removed to any superior court."

MR. HERMON said, he was afraid that actions of this kind were frequently brought expressly with a view to costs, the result being that the money went into the hands of the attorney instead of the plaintiff. He hoped, therefore, that the words just read would be adopted.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) entirely sympathized with the object in view; but thought the Government had shown, by the clause they had inserted, that they had every desire to prevent litigation, and to keep the money, as far as possible, out of the attorneys' hands. This was one great reason why they had desired that these actions should be brought in the County Court in the first instance, and, as much as they possibly could, be kept there. They were not a great source of remuneration for the attorneys as compared with what they would be in the Superior Courts. Even if the cases were kept in the County Courts, there might be more costs than they would desire going into the lawyers' hands; but, at the same time, he thought it would not be right to give a right of action such as was proposed, and to allow the working man who brought it assistance that was not professional. He could not, therefore, accept the Amendment.

MR. HERMON said, he thought it might be left to the discretion of the Judge to allow what costs he considered proper.

MR. W. HOLMS thought it desirable that the workman should be allowed to employ an attorney if he wished to do so. He regarded the Amendment as a very good one, and should give it his hearty support if it went to a division.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, so far, the discussion had been almost wholly confined to the question of costs; but he understood that the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had adopted the whole of the matter in the paragraph beginning with the words "any workman." There was, he thought, a good deal in that paragraph, because there might be many a poor workman who could not afford to employ a solicitor or counsel; and there was no reason why he should not avail himself of the assistance of some intelligent person, such as the secretary of the trades union to which he might belong. There certainly could be nothing that was at all objectionable in such a procedure. Consequently, he thought it would be desirable to adopt that part of the Amendment, and thus to allow the workman to have the assistance of some person better qualified than himself to act as his advocate.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) strongly objected to a proposal which would introduce into these cases a class of persons who would be in no way under the control of the Court, who would not be amenable to the ordinary professional rules, and whose action would have a tendency to foster litigation, which they would conduct without any legal knowledge or any of the advantages of professional judgment or experience.

MR. GORST did not share in the objection taken by the hon. and learned Attorney General, because, in the case that had been put, the assistance needed by the suitor would be rendered by an officer of the trades union to which the plaintiff himself belonged. There was one part of the Amendment which the Attorney General seemed to have overlooked—namely, the proviso that in no case should costs be allowed. That being so, he should like to know how the officer of a trades union would be able to make a trade out of giving his assistance to those members of the society with which he was connected who had claims of this kind to put forward? It seemed to him that the Amendment was one which deserved the very serious consideration of the Government. He did not wish to press it on the acceptance of the Government at that moment if they wished to have further time to consider it. But he certainly did not see why a poor man claiming compensation for injury should be compelled to pay the cost of professional assistance where there was not the least necessity for it. If he did not want professional aid, why on earth should they not allow the officer of his trades union to act for him?

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) seemed to think that that part of the Amendment which would deprive the so-called advocate of costs, would prevent a trade being driven in that way. The hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to have entirely forgotten that where a claim was made there was something to be recovered, and that it might be a part of the bargain that some portion of the damages should be given to the person acting as the plaintiff's advocate. He believed that the most pestilent class to be found anywhere were those persons who, though not lawyers themselves, haunted the Courts of Justice for the purpose of obtaining employment in the assumed character of professional advisers. They were under no professional responsibility, they had no professional etiquette; and the result was that they merely fostered litigation to such an extent, that it would be almost impossible to keep them down if an Amendment of this sort were to be passed for the purpose of giving them encouragement.

MR BRADLAUGH said, there were many thousands of workmen who did belong to trades unions at all, and who would, consequently, not be provided for by the Amendment.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF thought the Amendment was based on the principal characteristic of Diana of the Ephesians. What had been said by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) was entitled to great weight; but, at the same time, he did not see why, when workmen were members of a particular trades union, they should not have the assistance of an experienced man belonging to the same society.

MR. HERMON said, he was anxious to save the time of the Committee; and of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would consider whether a clause somewhat of the character of the Amendment could be brought up in Committee, he should be satisfied. He perceived plainly that the Amendment had been cut in two by misadventure, and the result was that it did not meet what he wished to see carried out.

MR. DODSON was afraid he could not hold out any hope in the direction desired by the hon. Member. It was for the hon. Gentleman to take what course he deemed most fitting.

MR HERMON said, as the Amendment did not carry out his meaning he was willing to withdraw it, and would bring it up again on the Report.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT was glad to hear that the Amendment was reserved for the Report. Having long held office as a County Court Judge, he was willing to bear his testimony to the extreme undesirability of opening those Courts to non-professional men. He had seen in the Marylebone County Court the mischief that resulted from such a system. The persons who set themselves up in the character of advocates, without any knowledge of the rules of evidence, and without having any of the qualifications of legal men, were of no real assistance to the litigants; and those who employed them were, in reality, their own enemies, and were more heavily mulcted in expenses than if they had been represented by barristers or attorneys.

MR. HICKS thought they ought not to exclude the working man from the right of employing an assistant; but he would suggest that the opinion of the Judge should be obtained as to the necessity of such assistant.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he would move the omission of the sub-section, for the purpose of putting himself in Order, so that he might be able to put a question to Her Majesty's Government, or, rather, to the Attorney General. He had, yesterday, alluded to a case which recently occurred—namely, the Risca colliery explosion—in which there had been a sacrifice of 120 lives. He had added that the compensation in that case, as it was not owing to the negligence of the men themselves, would amount to £28,000. He was speaking then on the authority of Mr. Minton, one of his constituents, who was well acquainted with these matters; but, unfortunately, he had committed a lapsus lingue, for which he had to apologize. Mr. Minton informed him the damages in the case he had mentioned would only amount to £24,000, and not to £28,000. However, in any case of this sort, in which a large number of lives were sacrificed, now that the Committee had decided that three years' wages were to be paid by the owners of the mine in the case of insufficient proof that an employé had occasioned the accident, it was evident that the amount of compensation, or penalty, upon the owner would be very large. In that case, in addition to loss of property by the destruction of the workings in the mine, there would be a loss which, in all probability, would amount to something like £30,000. That would be equivalent to ruin in many cases. And what he wanted to know was whether, by the clause appointing assessors, the Court to be constituted under the Bill when it became an Act, or any Superior Court, in assessing the compensation which would be in the nature of damages, would have power to take the equity of the case into consideration, and so to proportion the mixed compensation and penalty as to meet the circumstances of the case? He hoped that he had made the Committee understand what he meant. Was it the intention of Her Majesty's Ministers that three years' wages to the representatives of miners who had lost their lives should, under all circumstances, where negligence had been proved, however slight, and the accident was attributable to the carelessness of the men themselves, be exacted from the owner of the mine, or was there to be an equitable power to reduce that amount on considering the whole circumstances of the case?

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, he should like to call the attention of the Attorney General to the form of the subsection. He gathered that it was the general opinion of the Committee that they should not add to the expense of trials of this description. If that were so, he could not understand what the object could be of appointing two assessors. They had already established the principle upon which compensation was to be assessed, not that three years' wages should be, of necessity, the compensation awarded, but that that should be the maximum. The duty of inquiring into the case and assessing the damages was thrown upon the County Court, and he could not conceive what object they could gain by having two assessors. If they had assessors at all they must add to the expense; and if there were two of them, each might take a different view; and, in that event, the person who would be called upon to decide in the end would really have to decide between the assessors themselves. Therefore, there was no object to be gained by appointing assessors at all.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had not altogether understood the effect of the principle of the compensation which had been adopted. That principle was, that three years' wages should form the maximum of the amount given under the order of the Judge and upon the finding of the jury. In answer to the remarks of his hon. and learned Friend opposite (Sir Hardinge Giffard), he wished to point out that his hon. and learned Friend overlooked the position which the County Court now held in relation to assessors. By the Act of 1876, Section 5, in any action or proceeding in the County Court, the Judge could, if he thought fit, on an application being made to him, summon to his assistance men of skill and experience to act as assessors, and assist him in arriving at a decision. As, therefore, the power of appointing assessors already existed, it was thought better that this provision should be inserted in the Bill; because, by the following section, power was given to make special rules and regulations, in order to show the form of duties which these particular assessors would have to discharge. The Judge would have power to nominate some skilled person, or employer, or a workman representing the interests of the plaintiff, or an engineer, to give theoretical advice. As that power already existed under the general provisions of the Act of 1876, it was thought better to insert in the Bill a special power of appointing assessors, with special rules and regulations prescribing the particular duties of such assessors. Perhaps it would be well to limit the appointment of assessors to cases where there was no jury. They could not allow the opinion of any assessors to clash with the finding of fact by the jury. He would, at a subsequent stage, move an Amendment to that effect.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, he was not aware that the power referred to already existed in the County Court; but he thought the Attorney General had not sufficiently understood the suggestion he had made. The power given to a County Court Judge, by the Act of 1876, was simply to appoint assessors; but the Attorney General had overlooked the point that the assessors were to be confined in their authority to a certain amount of compensation. It was not, therefore, any question that could arise as to the existence of the liability. There was nothing of that sort, and the assessors were not to be called upon to inform the mind of the County Court Judge upon technical matters with which he was not familiar. The power to appoint assessors was confined to the point he had already made. It would appear that when they had ascertained the principle on which the amount of compensation was to be assessed, then it would be competent for the Judge to call in two assessors to his assistance. He regarded that as a cumbrous form of procedure, that they should appoint two assessors.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire propose to withdraw his Amendment?

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he did. He had only moved it for a distinct purpose, which had been gained. He wished, however, to be sure that he understood the hon. and learned Gentleman that three years' wages would be the maximum amount of compensation?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): Yes, that is so.

MR. NEWDEGATE: And the Court, whether it was the County Court or the Superior Court, could exercise an equitable jurisdiction, according to the circumstances of each case, in reducing the amount of that compensation?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) thought there was considerable force in the remarks which had fallen from his hon. and learned Friend opposite (Sir Hardinge Giffard), and he would, therefore, endeavour to make the clause more general in its terms.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) moved, in page 2, line 38, after the words "county court," to insert the words "before the judge without a jury."

MR. HINDE PALMER would protest against that Amendment, if it was the intention of the hon. and learned Attorney General to make it a compulsory order to a County Court Judge to depart from the ordinary way of trying an action, and positively compel him to try one without a jury.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): No, no! That is an entire misapprehension.

MR. HINDE PALMER thought he had gathered from the Attorney General that that was his object.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) would explain that the object of the Amendment was to confine the appointment of assessors to cases which a Judge tried himself, without a jury being summoned. When there was a jury, it would be the duty of the jury to find the amount of compensation; and that duty was superseded by the assessors only in cases where a jury was not summoned.

MR. WARTON asked the hon. and learned Gentleman if he would prefix the words "when tried before a Judge?"

MR. MORGAN LLOYD wished to call attention to the wording of the clause. As it now stood, it read—

"Upon the trial of any such action in a county court, one or more assessors may be appointed for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of compensation."

The words "upon the trial" implied that a trial of the action was going on, and the right to appoint assessors could not be exercised before the trial, which would be inconvenient. If that was not the intention, there ought to be some alteration in the wording of the clause. It was certainly his reading of it. "Upon the trial of any such action in a county court, one or more assessors may be appointed." He thought that could only mean appointed by the Judge after the trial had been commenced. If it did not mean that, he certainly did not know the meaning of the words.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the word "upon" was the usual legal term. In regard to trial, all these appointments would be subject to the usual legal rules.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, that, last night, it was stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) that the more this matter was looked at, the more it would be felt that, in the long run, the only practical and satisfactory solution was that the doctrine of common employment should be swept away altogether. He was very much inclined to agree with the right hon. Gentleman that that was the conclusion to which the attention of the Committee ought to be directed. But he was quite aware that it was too far to expect them to go at the present moment; and, therefore, it was his intention, by the Amendment he was about to propose, to bring back that doctrine of common employment to the principles of common sense. The doctrine of common employment had arisen simply by the dictum of the Judges. It had been laid down by the Judges as a mere technical rule of law, affording a plea in bar of any further proceedings. What he suggested by his Amendment was this—that that should no longer be the case; but that, whenever the defence of common employment was set up, the Judge should leave that as a question to be decided by a jury. In his own mind, he felt strongly convinced that this was the proper way to regard the matter; because the question whether two persons in a certain manufactory, or in a mine, were actually engaged in common employment was not a legal phrase to be used as a plea in bar, but a fact to be tried by men of experience and common sense, who would decide whether the injured man, and the man who occasioned the injury, were or were not, as a matter of fact, engaged in a common employment. It seemed to him that this was a mode of getting out of the difficulty set up by the judicial decisions. In adopting the doctrine of common employment, it was desirable that they should leave it to men of common sense, upon a jury, as a matter of fact, to decide whether it was common employment. By that means they would get over the difficulty, without expressly and entirely abolishing the plea of common employment.

THE CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman explain how his Amendment differs from the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. S. Morley), which was negatived?

MR. HINDE PALMER, said, he did not understand that his Amendment at all affected the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol. It was a question of procedure in the County Court under the 2nd sub-section. He would explain, in a moment, how it did not affect the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol. That Amendment was equivalent to getting rid of common employment altogether. His (Mr. Hinde Palmer's) Amendment was that the question of common employment should be left to a jury to decide, and it struck him that that was an entirely different proposition. It might involve, to some extent, the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman; but in itself it was a distinct proposition, entirely independent of the proposition formerly submitted to the Committee. He agreed that, under the doctrine of common employment, there was a difficulty involved which was met both in the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol and in that which he was about to submit. If they said that two workmen, although employed in two totally different branches of the same work, were, therefore, to be treated as if they were engaged in a common employment; if they adopted that view, they were likely to do much injustice, as had been suggested by the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease). In the case of miners there might be men working in separate localities, but still under physical circumstances and risks, which would render them engaged substantially in a common employment. The question, therefore, was one of mere fact, which any jury ought to be able to determine; and it was entirely beyond the province of the Judge to construct out of it a mere legal technicality, operating as a plea in bar to nearly every action for compensation. The decision in such a question of fact should be the province of the jury; and it should be prevented from being used in future as a mere technical bar to proceedings on the part of the injured persons. He admitted that the question was surrounded with difficulty, and he submitted the Amendment in the shape of a sub-section to the clause which was now under the consideration of the Committee.

Mr. Morgan Lloyd

Amendment moved, in page 2, after line 40, to insert the following sub-section:—

“(3.) In every case in which the employer shall allege in his defence to an action for compensation that the plaintiff was engaged in a common employment with the person by whom the injury was caused, the judge shall submit the question of such common employment as a matter of fact to the jury; and if the action is tried without a jury, the judge shall decide such question as a matter of fact according to the special circumstances of each case, and the defence of ‘common employment’ shall not hereafter apply to any person engaged in a branch or department of employment separate and distinct from that in which the plaintiff was engaged unless it shall be otherwise specially determined as a matter of fact as aforesaid.”—
(Mr. Hinde Palmer.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

MR. DODSON said, the Chairman had asked a question of the hon. and learned Member—namely, how far the Amendment differed from that of the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. S. Morley), which had already been negatived by the Committee? At first, he (Mr. Dodson) himself was inclined to think that it was the same question; but as the hon. and learned Member proceeded to explain his Motion, he began to see the difference which the hon. and learned Member drew between them. It appeared to him that the difference was that the hon. Member for Bristol proposed virtually to abolish common employment. [MR. S. MORLEY: No, no!] The hon. Member, at any rate, proposed to give it to a very limited extent. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Lincoln just went beyond that, and differed from it in a very curious particular, for it left the doctrine of common employment in this position—that it was to rest with the will and pleasure of the particular jury in each particular case whether the doctrine of common employment should or should not be pleaded. He did not think that he need occupy the time of the Committee in discussing that point, and he would say at once, on behalf of the Government, that he was not prepared to accept the Amendment.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL thought it must be admitted that if it was not the same Amendment as that of the hon. Member for Bristol, at all events, it was first cousin to it. He asked the Committee to consider now, or at some future period, if it would not be practical to adopt something like the principle which was to be adopted with regard to railway servants. Railway servants were an important class, and they were very apt to make themselves powerful in great electoral centres. As the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodson) must himself be aware, there were important constituencies where both sides were very much affected by the representations of railway servants. In several matters of principle adopted in regard to railway servants, he agreed with the hon. and learned Member who moved the Amendment, that if they could not go the length of abolishing common employment altogether, the only thing they could arrive at, as a tolerable resting place, was that which the hon. and learned Member described as reducing common employment to what he called common sense. The hon. and learned Member suggested that it should be a matter of fact, and not a question of law, what was common employment; and that if certain men were working together, as a matter of fact, the doctrine of common employment should be applied to them; but if, as a matter of fact, they were not working together, then the doctrine of common employment should not be held. It seemed to him that that would determine the matter fairly. The original basis upon which the doctrine of common employment was founded he understood to be, that if half-a-dozen men were working together, and one of them opened his safety-lamp, it should be considered that the others, who permitted him to conduct himself in so reckless and careless a manner, were themselves contributory to the negligence. Now, it seemed to him that to confine the common employment doctrine to such cases was according to common sense; and as the Government had, to a certain extent, admitted the principle, it might be advisable to introduce it into the present Bill. If the Government did not consent to it now, he earnestly hoped that they would consider it before the Report was brought up, when the question of granting to other servants what was granted to railway servants was to be considered.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON thought the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill had not put the right construction on this Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman said that what the Amendment proposed to do was to leave the question of law to the decision of the jury. Now, the Amendment did nothing of the kind. With all submission, he thought that all the Amendment left to a jury was the question of fact as to what was common employment; but it left it subject to the discretion of the Judge. The latter part of the Amendment declared the law, and altered it to one of fact on precisely the same lines as the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Bristol the other day. He saw no difference between the two. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol met a class of cases which the hon. Member pointed out to the Committee, and which were not governed by any of the other provisions of the Bill. He (Mr. Serjeant Simon) had pointed out the particular case of a platelayer who happened to be run over by a train while engaged in laying down rails; and he thought the doctrine of common employment was carried to an absurd extent when it was said that both the engine-driver and the man who was laying down rails were engaged in a common object. He had pointed out the absurd lengths to which this doctrine was carried; and some of them, no doubt, the provisions of the 1st section did meet. Others they did not meet, and it was to meet these cases that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol was directed. It was also to meet this class of cases that the present Amendment was proposed, and it was also intended to meet another class of cases where men were engaged in different departments under the same employment. He wished to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill to this—that the Amendment would be of no effect at all if it left the question of fact as to common employment to a jury without some special direction upon the subject, because the Judge would have to tell the jury what the law was now—namely, that persons engaged under the same employer were persons in common employment. The section proposed to change this state of the law; and, if adopted, the Judge would be bound to tell the jury that the doctrine of common employment no longer applied in cases where the persons employed were engaged in different departments, although under the same employer. That was the object of the Amendment; and if the right hon. Gentleman would turn his attention to it, in conjunction with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, he would see that he (Mr. Serjeant Simon) was correct in his construction. And if that was the correct construction, there was no doubt that, as far as the operation of the law would go, it would be in the direction of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol.

MR. BRYCE said, they were in a fair way of having the whole discussion over again which they had already had upon the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol. Although he agreed with the hon. Member for Bristol and the hon. and learned Member behind him (Mr. Hinde Palmer), he felt it was perfectly impossible to give a vote until he knew what the clause was which the Government were going to propose, or assent to upon Report. He would, therefore, appeal to his hon. and learned Friend to withdraw the Amendment.

MR. HINDE PALMER quite perceived the force of the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce), and thought it would, perhaps, be the best course to see what the clause was which the Government proposed to bring up, and to see to what class of persons it would be applied. He reserved to himself the right of proposing to amend the Government clause in any way he thought proper. With the permission of the Committee he would, therefore, withdraw the Amendment for the present.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, that he himself had placed on the Paper a clause to restrain the doctrine of common employment in reference to the case of railway servants. As the matter now stood, the hon. Member for Bristol had withdrawn his proposal, on the Government undertaking, on the Report, to bring up a clause adapting the Amendment to the case of railway servants.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM thought it would be much more regular to negative the Amendment than to allow it to be withdrawn. The first portion of the Amendment directed that the doctrine of common employment, as far as it was dealt with by the Bill, should be left to the decision of the jury, under the direction of the Judge. But the more important part of the Amendment was literally the same Amendment as that of the hon. Member for Bristol, which the Committee had already rejected by a large majority. He should, therefore, object to the Amendment being withdrawn. It was not convenient that the Committee should take further steps in that direction.

Sir George Campbell

MR. HINDE PALMER thought there should be a clear understanding as to the position in which they were. As he understood the matter, the Government were only now to consider whether or not they would on the Report bring up a clause relating to railway servants. ["No, no!"] Was he to understand that the Government intended to bring up such a clause? ["No, no!"] Then he would withdraw his Amendment, on the understanding that if such a clause was not proposed by the Government, or by the hon. Member for Bristol, he would himself bring up a clause on the Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

DR. WEBSTER moved, in page 3, line 12, to leave out "In Scotland," to end of paragraph, line 18. The sub-section he proposed to omit introduced an entirely new code and a different mode of procedure in dealing with actions brought under this Act in Scotland from those observed in all other actions. It gave, in the first place, power to the Lord Ordinary to refuse the appeal altogether if he should think the case was not a proper one for the consideration of the Court of Session; and it was only if the Lord Ordinary did think the case a proper one in his discretion that a suit under the Act could be removed to the Superior Court. Even if he did agree to the appeal, he had right to clog it with restrictions as to the payment of expenses, finding caution, or such other terms as he or the division of the Court should think fit. He asked the Committee to look at the present state of the law of Scotland in regard to these matters. Down to 1868, when the Legislature dealt with the whole question of procedure in the Court of Session, including that of appeal from the Inferior Courts, it was required that security should be found before any appeal could be entertained. But, in 1868, the Legislature dealt with the whole subject of appeals to the Court of Session, and deliberately did away with the provision compelling security to be found; and now it was competent in every case of appeal from an Inferior Court to the Court of Session to bring the appeal without any restriction as to finding security in regard to the payment of expenses or otherwise. This did not rest altogether on his own authority. He should be sorry to ask the Committee to take it on that ground alone; but it rested on the very best authority—namely, that of the Scotch Bar in the Report of the Committee of the Faculty of Advocates, which he held in his hand. The proposals in the Bill as to workmen finding caution for the payment of expenses were characterized as retrograde in character, having now been abolished in all other cases. He had to ask the Committee, therefore, to consider if it was right that this provision should now be introduced, for the first time, in this particular class of cases, when the Bill was brought in not as any matter of grace or favour to the employed, but expressly as a matter of right and justice to them? It seemed that the advantages which the first part of the Bill gave to the workmen were being curtailed by one restrictive Amendment after another. The effect in Scotland would be peculiarly unfavourable. In the first place, it gave a restrictive power to the Court to refuse to look at an appeal at all; and if they did, they could refuse it unless security or caution was found; and the necessity of finding caution would debar many workmen from bringing a case to appeal at all. But, further, look at the effect of this sub-section on jury trial. In the County Courts of England either party might insist on trial by jury; but that was not the case in the Sheriff Courts in Scotland, and this sub-section went to deprive artizans of their option of trial by jury. He submitted, therefore, to the Committee that the view expressed by the Committee of the Faculty of Advocates in regard to the retrograde character of this legislation was fully borne out by the circumstances of the case. The Faculty of Advocates, besides this main objection, stated that the wording of the clause was defective, and that the reference to the 74th section of the Act of 1868—the Act relating to the Court of Session—was inappropriate, because Clause 74 of that Act applied solely to the removal of one very special action—namely, one from the Sheriff's Court to the Court of Session in consequence of its affinity to, or, technically, its contingency with, another action already pending there. Therefore, they were of opinion that the reference was inappropriately introduced into the present clause. He confessed that no one reading the 74th section of the 1868 Act could see any application it had to the provisions of the present Bill. On the whole, he saw no reason why the cases which would arise under the Bill should be exceptionally dealt with, and unfavourably to working men; and he, therefore, hoped that the Committee would accept his Amendment and omit the sub-section. He thought that, if only for the sake of avoiding the risk of unnecessary litigation, it would be well to adopt his Amendment.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he could not help thinking that his hon. and learned Friend's observations had a good deal proceeded upon a misapprehension of what the clause was intended to do. If they were to leave this out, so far from assisting the workmen, they would really be doing them an injustice. They would be telling them to go to the Sheriff's Court, and forbidding them to go into a Superior Court, however much the workmen desired to do so. He thought that his hon. and learned Friend had confounded two things—the power of appeal, and the power to remove the cause for trial from one Court to another. He constantly talked about the power of appeal not being limited by the necessity of giving security. That might be so, when this provision of the Bill left the power of appeal intact. It left a man power to go to the Court of Session by way of appeal, and from there to the House of Lords. The Bill did not, in any way, touch the power of appeal. It gave power in any action brought in the Sheriff's Court to remove it, if the Superior Court should think fit, into the Court of Session. That was the object of the clause, and he believed it had been properly carried out. At all events, it had been drawn upon the advice of the learned Lord Advocate. The intention of the clause was to do to Scotland what they had done to England. The Government had applied to the Lord Advocate to give them the proper words to carry out that intention, and the clause was proposed with his sanction. He did not think that the slightest injustice was perpetrated by the clause, or that it required any alteration. At the same time, he would confer with the Lord Advocate on the subject before the Report.

Dr. Webster

MR. HOPWOOD said, that he would suggest to his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General that there was a distinction between the County Court in England and the Sheriff's Court in Scotland, inasmuch as there was no option of trial by jury in the Sheriff's Court. If a man were deprived in England of the option of trial by jury, it was really a matter of serious importance.

DR. WEBSTER said, that in withdrawing his Amendment, in deference to the opinion of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General, he might state that he had proposed it on the distinct authority of the Faculty of Advocates that it was absolutely necessary to carry out the view he had mentioned. Notwithstanding what had been said by his hon. and learned Friend, he still entertained the view which he had expressed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Definitions).

MR. LAMBTON said, that the Amendment he had upon the Paper dealt with the question of the application of this Bill to coal mines. The Government had announced that they would allow the hon. Member for Bristol to bring in a clause dealing with railways, and he thought it would be only fair to deal with mines in the same way. The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had stated that he could not see why some hon. Members wished to draw a distinction between the cases of mines and railways. He would, however, endeavour to show that there was a considerable distinction between them. What he wished to provide was, that a person having superintendence intrusted to him under the terms of the Bill should be one of the persons for whom the employer was responsible under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872, and he thought that would be as much to the advantage of the workmen as to the employers. He apprehended that in the case of well-conducted coal mines there would be 8 per cent of the persons who would come under the definition of the persons having superintendence intrusted to them. That state of things had caused great alarm among coalowners in the North of England. The alarm of the coalowners was extended also to the workers in the mines, for they feared that the contribution of the employers to the Miners' Permanent Relief Fund—namely, about 20 per cent—would be withdrawn if the Bill were passed in its present form. Some hon. Members seemed to think that the coal trade was always a paying concern. He might say that for the last three years many coal-owners had made no profit at all; and if they had this unlimited liability thrown upon them, how could they hope for improvement? The only way left to them would be by reducing the wages of the workmen. He knew a case of two young men who had a capital of £9,000 or £10,000, and who were enabled to borrow as much money as they wished at the present time. But he apprehended that if this liability were thrown upon them there would not be the same facility for borrowing. He did not think, moreover, that with such liability they would be able to repay the money borrowed. If this Bill passed, many persons who owned land, and now worked the mines beneath it, would cease to retain the workings in their own hands. They would, in many cases, hand over the businesses to Coal Companies, and the coal trade would go into other hands. It seemed to him rather strange that a Government, in 1880, seemed disposed to take money from the pockets of the employers, and that a Government, in 1872, should pass a measure to protect the lives of workmen. In 1872 the Coal Mines Regulation Act was passed, and the Government threw the entire responsibility upon the coalowner, his agent, or manager. The Act provided that the owner, agent, or manager should not employ any person in such mines who had been guilty of an offence against the Act. That measure was passed to protect the lives of the workmen, and it treated the owner, or agent, or manager, as responsible; and the Secretary of State had also the appointment of the person in the coal-mining districts to have superintendence and to enforce certain regulations. But the Inspector was bound to point out any infraction of the rules to the owner, agent, or manager, and he was to make a Report to the Secretary of State. The manager appointed under the Act was to have the superintendence over the mine. A man was not to be qualified to be manager of a mine unless he had received a certificate under the Act. They had thus a man appointed by the Secretary of State to look after the mine, and they had managers examined in order to see that they understood their business. That precaution was taken to see that the mines were conducted in the best possible way, and with the greatest safety to the men engaged. If the present Bill was passed, he did not see how the Coal Mines Regulation Act would stand. A mine would be under two different sets of rules. The owner, agent, or manager, would be responsible, and the Secretary of State would have the duty of appointing the Inspector of the mine; and those persons would be responsible for carrying out the regulations under the Act. But, under this Bill, there would be an entirely fresh responsibility thrown upon those persons who were not clothed with responsibility under the Mines Regulation Act. If the Government could make some limit as to the responsibility in the case of coal mines, it would do a great deal of good. He most earnestly appealed to the Government to make some Amendment to the Bill with regard to coal mines. They had consented to do so with regard to railways, and he thought the case was even stronger for making special regulations with regard to mines. In his opinion, the workman in the mine was much more of a co-operative of the employer than a servant. If the present Bill were passed, he believed that many of the smaller mines, and perhaps some of the larger ones, would be closed, for he did not see how owners could stand up against, or could bear, the responsibilities thrown upon them by the Bill. He would, therefore, appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board to limit the responsibility of the employer in mining operations to the persons for whose acts he was made responsible by the Coal Mines Regulation Act of 1872. He begged to move, in page 3, line 25, after "means," to leave out to end of subsection, and insert—

"In reference to a mine, the agent or certificated manager intrusted with the principal management of the mine."

MR. DODSON said, that the hon. Member who had proposed this Amendment had made a very clear and interesting statement of his views as to what ought to be done. But he thought he must have been of a very sanguine nature when he called upon the Government to limit the responsibility of mine-owners to one or two persons nominated in the Coal Mines Regulation Act. He did not interrupt the hon. Member in his speech, although he was not clear that he might not have done so; for his Amendment, proposing to put liability upon one or two particular persons, was one which, in various forms, was discussed previously in the course of the Bill. It was really the same proposition that had been made before, only in different words. The hon. Member had reminded the Committee that the Coal Mines Regulation Act provided for the security of life in mines. The Government were of opinion that there was no difficulty in carrying out this Act in conjunction with a former Act. They had inserted a provision in the Bill that where the rules were laid down by Parliament, subject to the approval of a Government Department, the employer was not to be held responsible for those rules. The hon. Member had said that the Government had agreed to entertain clauses dealing specially with the case of railway servants, and he asked them, for that reason, to accept a clause dealing specially with the case of mines. He would not undertake to say that the Government would accept any clause that was brought up with regard to railway servants. But, in deference to the expression of opinion in Committee, they had consented to consider any clause brought up by the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. S. Morley) dealing with the case of railway servants, who, he had shown, were placed in a position of considerable hardship. It had been shown, in the case of railway servants, that the technical rule with regard to common employment, which was upheld in cases where men were engaged in totally separate duties, led to considerable hardship. That was a totally different question from the proposition submitted to the Committee. It was proposed to make the employer in mines only liable for the negligence of one or two persons in his employment. On the part of the Government he could not agree to entertain such a proposal.

Amendment negatived.

MR. INDERWICK said, that the Amendment he had to propose was of a somewhat similar character to two or three which had already been submitted to the Committee. Most of the hon. Members had formed some opinion upon this subject; but he wished to point out one or two principles upon which he thought they ought to proceed. He proposed that the clause should run in this way—

"The expression, 'person who has superintendence intrusted to him,' means a person whose duty is that of superintendence."

The Bill, as it stood, defined the person who had superintendence intrusted to him as a person whose sole or principal duty was that of superintendence. He maintained that the proper test of a person who should be liable to charge the employer with his negligence was a person who at that time was intrusted with superintendence by the employer; otherwise, workmen might be placed in this position. They might have a man whose sole or principal duty was superintendence, and it might be necessary to remove him for a limited time, for the purpose of carrying out another duty, and another man perfectly competent, who was usually employed in manual labour, might be substituted for a limited time in his place. If that man were guilty of negligence, then, although he would at the time of the negligence be a person actually exercising superintendence, the employer would not be liable. That was not a result which he thought the Government would desire to bring about. He would give an illustration of this which had come under his own notice. The railway by which he had for some time travelled had a junction from which there was a short line. On arriving at the junction a porter, who was ordinarily engaged in manual labour, took charge of the train for a short distance. During that short journey the porter became the person who had the superintendence of the train intrusted to him; and if he was guilty of negligence, causing injury or death to workmen, the Company ought to be liable to pay compensation; but, because the duty of that porter was ordinarily that of manual labour, the Company could not be charged with responsibility for his negligence. He begged to move, in page 3, line 25, to leave out the words "sole or principal."

Mr. Lambton

MR. DODSON said, he could not accept the Amendment proposed by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rye, inasmuch as it would greatly increase the liability which this Bill imposed upon the employer. His hon. and learned Friend had put the case of a man, sometimes engaged in manual labour, and at other times acting as superintendent. He thought that his hon. and learned Friend, in his observations, had forgotten that such a state of things was met by sub-section 2 of the 1st clause, by which it was proposed that an employer should be liable for injuries sustained by—"Reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has superintendence intrusted to him."

In sub-section 3, it was further provided that the employer should be liable—

"By reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer to whose orders or directions the workman at the time of the injury was bound to conform."

Thus, he thought, it would be seen that, while sub-section 2, gave a general liability in respect of the person exercising general responsibility, sub-section 3 extended the liability in respect of the acts of persons temporarily having superintendence. The effect of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member would be to place a man temporarily clothed with authority in the same position as a person in Clause 2, and to make the employer as responsible for the acts of the man invested with temporary authority as for the acts of the person who had general superintendence intrusted to him.

An hon. MEMBER said, that he thought there would be great difficulty in deciding for whose acts the employer was to be responsible if the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman were adopted. He did not think they would find two Judges who would agree whether an employer was to be liable for the acts of any such porter as the hon. and learned Member had mentioned. He thought the Government ought to let employers of labour know what persons it was for whose acts they would be responsible. If that were done, the matter would be very much simplified; whereas, if the Bill were left in this state, very shortly Judges would make reflections upon the weakness of the House in passing an Act in vague and general terms like those in the present Bill. He appealed to the Government, as well in the interest of the workmen as in that of the employers, to state definitely for whose orders employers were to be made liable.

MR. INDERWICK said, that his opinion was that the sub-section mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board did not meet the case he had put; but, if the right hon. Gentleman thought it did, he would leave the matter in his hands, and beg leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, that he would not take up the time of the Committee in discussing his Amendment at any length, because he did not think that there was the slightest chance of the Government consenting to his proposition. He wished, however, to express his opinion that it was desirable that a person who had superintendence should be a man who was not at any time engaged in manual labour. If the Government, however, took upon themselves the responsibility of insisting upon the retention of the words "or principal" in the Bill—if the Government chose to take upon themselves that responsibility—the result would rest with them. He begged to move, in page 3, line 25, to leave out "or principal."

MR. DODSON said, he supposed this Amendment of the hon. Member for Glamorganshire must be read in conjunction with his other Amendment—namely, the insertion of the words "not ordinarily engaged in manual labour." He must oppose this alteration, on the ground that it would greatly restrict the liability, of the employer, and would, practically reduce it to a responsibility for persons whose sole duty was that of superintendence.

MR. J. W. PEASE said, he should like to say a few words upon this Amendment. It was well known that in the case of railway servants a man could be a porter at one time and a station-master at another, and something else shortly afterwards. It seemed to him that the Bill carried the responsibility of the master very much further than it ought to do; for, in the case of a mine, it would make the mineowner responsible for a man who might be engaged for a few moments in settling the position of a piece of timber. As the Bill stood, he certainly concurred in the objection of the hon. Member who had moved the Amendment, that the words in this clause went a great deal too far.

Amendment negatived.

MR. COHEN said, that the Amendment which he proposed to move was in reference to defective superintendence. The Committee would see, on looking at the Bill, that, in the first place, a superintendent was described as a person whose sole or principal duty was that of superintendence, and who was not ordinarily engaged in manual labour. It would be extremely difficult to know whether a man was, or was not, engaged in manual labour. Was it to be said that a pointsman, or a signaller, was not engaged in manual labour? His hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would agree with him that if a clause could be framed which would include in the Bill such a definition of a person engaged in manual labour as would prevent litigation, it would be a good thing. He did not wish to unnecessarily retard the progress of the Bill, and he would, therefore, occupy as short time as possible in moving this Amendment. He wished to say a few words with regard to the principle upon which the Amendment was founded. The doctrine of common employment was stated in the Report of the Committee on Employers' Liability, to have been founded on the consideration that where several persons were employed in doing one common enterprise, one servant could give notice to the other of any defect whereby an accident might arise. That was stated in the Report as being the foundation of the doctrine of common employment. And, so far as it went, it was reason; but what had been complained of was that, by successive decisions, that doctrine had been carried to an extraordinary extent. The question was, whether they were to limit the extent to which the doctrine had been carried, or to preserve it at all? In his opinion, the whole doctrine of common employment was one that ought to be swept away. But if it were preserved, it ought to be reduced to its proper dimensions by the consideration of the principle upon which it was founded. That was what he attempted to do in his Amendment. He had attempted to leave the doctrine in this way. If an injury had been occasioned by the negligence of an individual who had the sole charge of one of the principal machines, like an engine, then inasmuch as the proper working of the engine depended upon the person engaged in working it, and he was subject to no interference by any of his fellow-servants, he was exactly in the same position as an ordinary superintendent. A superintendent was a person who had control over the work that was being done; and, therefore, he submitted to the Committee that, by analogy, they should place every person in the position of superintendent, whose acts were entirely without control of the person injured. If that were not done, the Act would be so defective as to work in an extremely harsh and unjust manner. In the Amendment which he had drawn up he had endeavoured to follow the principle of the Bill, which was that of superintendence, and endeavoured, by analogy, to cover those which he thought would not now be met by the Bill, but which certainly ought to come within it upon principle. If the Bill were not extended to meet extremely harsh cases, which would, undoubtedly, arise, it could not, he had pointed out, be a satisfactory settlement of the law. He thought they ought to reduce the doctrine of common employment, at least to the dimensions of the principle upon which it was founded, and from which it ought never to have been extended. He thought that, in applying it by analogy to altering the superintendence so as to include those over whom the workman had no control, but who had the management of the machines through which the negligence took place, he was proceeding in accordance with the principles he had stated.

Mr. Dodson

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 25, after the word "duty," to insert the words "superintendence or control in relation to the particular work or matter with respect to which he is alleged to have been negligent."—(Mr. Cohen.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that that was an Amendment which he could not accept. The Committee would see that this would extend the liability of the employers very much more than was proposed by the Government in the Bill. In the Bill as it stood the Government proposed two liabilities. The first one was with regard to general superintendence, upon which, if any injury resulted, there would be general liability with respect to the whole work; and the second liability was that the employer was liable for the negligence of persons having particular authority over others in respect to injury sustained under that particular authority. If the Committee would look at the words proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Southwark, they would see that the proposal was to make the employer liable for injury resulting through the negligence of any person who should have superintendence or control in relation to the particular work or matter with respect to which he was alleged to have been negligent. The result was that the general superintendence in the Bill was converted into a particular superintendence under this Amendment. This particular superintendence was to be given to persons although engaged in manual labour. They would then make the employer liable for persons not under his control. That was not the scheme of the Government. In the Bill they endeavoured to limit the liability, first, to general superintendence; and, secondly, to particular superintendence. It might be that on the clause of the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. S. Morley) being brought up, the Government would be able to make a separate provision for costs where there were distinct works being carried on by persons in the same employ, and if they adopted any Amendment in that direction it was as far as they could go.

Mr. HOPWOOD said, that the question raised by this Amendment was one in which workmen were vitally interested, and upon which they had taken consultation. Several Amendments had been proposed, all directed to meet the particular defect of the Bill aimed at by this Amendment. It seemed to him that the reply of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General did not meet the case which had been raised. It appeared to him that the clause defining the person who had superintendence intrusted to him, as a person whose sole or principal duty was that of superintendence, was incomplete, unless it was further stated that the superintendence was in relation to a particular work or matter with respect to which he was alleged to have been negligent. It might be that the Amendment of which he had given Notice to insert a little later in the Bill would meet the case. The question raised was of very great importance to the class interested, and he thought that they ought to go to a division upon the matter.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 49; Noes 185: Majority 136.—(Div. List, No. 95.)

MR. INDERWICK said, that the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), which stood next upon the Paper, was not an Amendment in the sense of being an alteration of the Bill, inasmuch as it merely provided that the words of the clause in the Act of 1875 should be substituted for the proposed reference to the Act. He desired to ask whether, assuming that the hon. Gentleman's Amendment were not carried, and the words of the clause were ordered to stand part of the Bill, he (Mr. Inderwick) would be precluded from proposing his Amendment, which had reference to the same subject, and which, if carried, would substantially alter the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Member, under certain circumstances, would be precluded from putting his Amendment; but I will put it in such a form that he will not be debarred.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, that he had an Amendment upon the Paper which came before even that of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory).

THE CHAIRMAN: I called upon the hon. and learned Gentleman, but he did not respond.

SIR HENRY JACKSON remarked, that unless a subsequent Amendment practically reduce it to a responsibility for persons whose sole duty was that of superintendence.

MR. J. W. PEASE said, he should like to say a few words upon this Amendment. It was well known that in the case of railway servants a man could be a porter at one time and a station-master at another, and something else shortly afterwards. It seemed to him that the Bill carried the responsibility of the master very much further than it ought to do; for, in the case of a mine, it would make the mineowner responsible for a man who might be engaged for a few moments in settling the position of a piece of timber. As the Bill stood, he certainly concurred in the objection of the hon. Member who had moved the Amendment, that the words in this clause went a great deal too far.

Amendment negatived.

MR. COHEN said, that the Amendment which he proposed to move was in reference to defective superintendence. The Committee would see, on looking at the Bill, that, in the first place, a superintendent was described as a person whose sole or principal duty was that of superintendence, and who was not ordinarily engaged in manual labour. It would be extremely difficult to know whether a man was, or was not, engaged in manual labour. Was it to be said that a pointsman, or a signalman, was not engaged in manual labour? His hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would agree with him that if a clause could be framed which would include in the Bill such a definition of a person engaged in manual labour as would prevent litigation, it would be a good thing. He did not wish to unnecessarily retard the progress of the Bill, and he would, therefore, occupy as short time as possible in moving this Amendment. He wished to say a few words with regard to the principle upon which the Amendment was founded. The doctrine of common employment was stated in the Report of the Committee on Employers' Liability, to have been founded on the consideration that where several persons were employed in doing one common enterprise, one servant could give notice to the other of any defect whereby an accident might arise. That was stated in the Report as being the foundation of the doctrine of common employment. And, so far as it went, it was reason; but what had been complained of was that, by successive decisions, that doctrine had been carried to an extraordinary extent. The question was, whether they were to limit the extent to which the doctrine had been carried, or to preserve it at all? In his opinion, the whole doctrine of common employment was one that ought to be swept away. But if it were preserved, it ought to be reduced to its proper dimensions by the consideration of the principle upon which it was founded. That was what he attempted to do in his Amendment. He had attempted to leave the doctrine in this way. If an injury had been occasioned by the negligence of an individual who had the sole charge of one of the principal machines, like an engine, then inasmuch as the proper working of the engine depended upon the person engaged in working it, and he was subject to no interference by any of his fellow-servants, he was exactly in the same position as an ordinary superintendent. A superintendent was a person who had control over the work that was being done; and, therefore, he submitted to the Committee that, by analogy, they should place every person in the position of superintendent, whose acts were entirely without control of the person injured. If that were not done, the Act would be so defective as to work in an extremely harsh and unjust manner. In the Amendment which he had drawn up he had endeavoured to follow the principle of the Bill, which was that of superintendence, and endeavoured, by analogy, to cover those which he thought would not now be met by the Bill, but which certainly ought to come within it upon principle. If the Bill were not extended to meet extremely harsh cases, which would, undoubtedly, arise, it could not, he had pointed out, be a satisfactory settlement of the law. He thought they ought to reduce the doctrine of common employment, at least to the dimensions of the principle upon which it was founded, and from which it ought never to have been extended. He thought that, in applying it by analogy to altering the superintendence so as to include those over whom the workman had no control, but who had the management of the machines through which the negligence took place, he was proceeding in accordance with the principles he had stated.

Mr. Dodson

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 25, after the word "duty," to insert the words "superintendence or control in relation to the particular work or matter with respect to which he is alleged to have been negligent."—(Mr. Cohen.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that that was an Amendment which he could not accept. The Committee would see that this would extend the liability of the employers very much more than was proposed by the Government in the Bill. In the Bill as it stood the Government proposed two liabilities. The first one was with regard to general superintendence, upon which, if any injury resulted, there would be general liability with respect to the whole work; and the second liability was that the employer was liable for the negligence of persons having particular authority over others in respect to injury sustained under that particular authority. If the Committee would look at the words proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Southwark, they would see that the proposal was to make the employer liable for injury resulting through the negligence of any person who should have superintendence or control in relation to the particular work or matter with respect to which he was alleged to have been negligent. The result was that the general superintendence in the Bill was converted into a particular superintendence under this Amendment. This particular superintendence was to be given to persons although engaged in manual labour. They would then make the employer liable for persons not under his control. That was not the scheme of the Government. In the Bill they endeavoured to limit the liability, first, to general superintendence; and, secondly, to particular superintendence. It might be that on the clause of the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. S. Morley) being brought up, the Government would be able to make a separate provision for costs where there were distinct works being carried on by persons in the same employ, and if they adopted any Amendment in that direction it was as far as they could go.

Mr. HOPWOOD said, that the question raised by this Amendment was one in which workmen were vitally interested, and upon which they had taken consultation. Several Amendments had been proposed, all directed to meet the particular defect of the Bill aimed at by this Amendment. It seemed to him that the reply of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General did not meet the case which had been raised. It appeared to him that the clause defining the person who had superintendence intrusted to him, as a person whose sole or principal duty was that of superintendence, was incomplete, unless it was further stated that the superintendence was in relation to a particular work or matter with respect to which he was alleged to have been negligent. It might be that the Amendment of which he had given Notice to insert a little later in the Bill would meet the case. The question raised was of very great importance to the class interested, and he thought that they ought to go to a division upon the matter.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 49; Noes 185: Majority 136.—(Div. List, No. 95.)

MR. INDERWICK said, that the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), which stood next upon the Paper, was not an Amendment in the sense of being an alteration of the Bill, inasmuch as it merely provided that the words of the clause in the Act of 1875 should be substituted for the proposed reference to the Act. He desired to ask whether, assuming that the hon. Gentleman's Amendment were not carried, and the words of the clause were ordered to stand part of the Bill, he (Mr. Inderwick) would be precluded from proposing his Amendment, which had reference to the same subject, and which, if carried, would substantially alter the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Member, under certain circumstances, would be precluded from putting his Amendment; but I will put it in such a form that he will not be debarred.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, that he had an Amendment upon the Paper which came before even that of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory).

THE CHAIRMAN: I called upon the hon. and learned Gentleman, but he did not respond.

SIR HENRY JACKSON remarked, that unless a subsequent Amendment mean appointed by the Judge after the trial had been commenced. If it did not mean that, he certainly did not know the meaning of the words.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the word "upon" was the usual legal term. In regard to trial, all these appointments would be subject to the usual legal rules.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, that, last night, it was stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) that the more this matter was looked at, the more it would be felt that, in the long run, the only practical and satisfactory solution was that the doctrine of common employment should be swept away altogether. He was very much inclined to agree with the right hon. Gentleman that that was the conclusion to which the attention of the Committee ought to be directed. But he was quite aware that it was too far to expect them to go at the present moment; and, therefore, it was his intention, by the Amendment he was about to propose, to bring back that doctrine of common employment to the principles of common sense. The doctrine of common employment had arisen simply by the dictum of the Judges. It had been laid down by the Judges as a mere technical rule of law, affording a plea in bar of any further proceedings. What he suggested by his Amendment was this—that that should no longer be the case; but that, whenever the defence of common employment was set up, the Judge should leave that as a question to be decided by a jury. In his own mind, he felt strongly convinced that this was the proper way to regard the matter; because the question whether two persons in a certain manufactory, or in a mine, were actually engaged in common employment was not a legal phrase to be used as a plea in bar, but a fact to be tried by men of experience and common sense, who would decide whether the injured man, and the man who occasioned the injury, were or were not, as a matter of fact, engaged in a common employment. It seemed to him that this was a mode of getting out of the difficulty set up by the judicial decisions. In adopting the doctrine of common employment, it was desirable that they should leave it to men of common sense, upon a jury, as a matter of fact, to decide whether it was common employment. By that means they would get over the difficulty, without expressly and entirely abolishing the plea of common employment.

THE CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman explain how his Amendment differs from the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. S. Morley), which was negatived?

MR. HINDE PALMER, said, he did not understand that his Amendment at all affected the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol. It was a question of procedure in the County Court under the 2nd sub-section. He would explain, in a moment, how it did not affect the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol. That Amendment was equivalent to getting rid of common employment altogether. His (Mr. Hinde Palmer's) Amendment was that the question of common employment should be left to a jury to decide, and it struck him that that was an entirely different proposition. It might involve, to some extent, the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman; but in itself it was a distinct proposition, entirely independent of the proposition formerly submitted to the Committee. He agreed that, under the doctrine of common employment, there was a difficulty involved which was met both in the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol and in that which he was about to submit. If they said that two workmen, although employed in two totally different branches of the same work, were, therefore, to be treated as if they were engaged in a common employment; if they adopted that view, they were likely to do much injustice, as had been suggested by the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease). In the case of miners there might be men working in separate localities, but still under physical circumstances and risks, which would render them engaged substantially in a common employment. The question, therefore, was one of mere fact, which any jury ought to be able to determine; and it was entirely beyond the province of the Judge to construct out of it a mere legal technicality, operating as a plea in bar to nearly every action for compensation. The decision in such a question of fact should be the province of the jury; and it should be prevented from being used in future as a mere technical bar to proceedings on the part of the injured persons. He admitted that the question was surrounded with difficulty, and he submitted the Amendment in the shape of a sub-section to the clause which was now under the consideration of the Committee.

Mr. Morgan Lloyd

Amendment moved, in page 2, after line 40, to insert the following sub-section:—

“(3.) In every case in which the employer shall allege in his defence to an action for compensation that the plaintiff was engaged in a common employment with the person by whom the injury was caused, the judge shall submit the question of such common employment as a matter of fact to the jury; and if the action is tried without a jury, the judge shall decide such question as a matter of fact according to the special circumstances of each case, and the defence of ‘common employment’ shall not hereafter apply to any person engaged in a branch or department of employment separate and distinct from that in which the plaintiff was engaged unless it shall be otherwise specially determined as a matter of fact as aforesaid.”—
(Mr. Hinde Palmer.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

MR. DODSON said, the Chairman had asked a question of the hon. and learned Member—namely, how far the Amendment differed from that of the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. S. Morley), which had already been negatived by the Committee? At first, he (Mr. Dodson) himself was inclined to think that it was the same question; but as the hon. and learned Member proceeded to explain his Motion, he began to see the difference which the hon. and learned Member drew between them. It appeared to him that the difference was that the hon. Member for Bristol proposed virtually to abolish common employment. [MR. S. MORLEY: No, no!] The hon. Member, at any rate, proposed to give it to a very limited extent. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Lincoln just went beyond that, and differed from it in a very curious particular, for it left the doctrine of common employment in this position—that it was to rest with the will and pleasure of the particular jury in each particular case whether the doctrine of common employment should or should not be pleaded. He did not think that he need occupy the time of the Committee in discussing that point, and he would say at once, on behalf of the Government, that he was not prepared to accept the Amendment.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL thought it must be admitted that if it was not the same Amendment as that of the hon. Member for Bristol, at all events, it was first cousin to it. He asked the Committee to consider now, or at some future period, if it would not be practical to adopt something like the principle which was to be adopted with regard to railway servants. Railway servants were an important class, and they were very apt to make themselves powerful in great electoral centres. As the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodson) must himself be aware, there were important constituencies where both sides were very much affected by the representations of railway servants. In several matters of principle adopted in regard to railway servants, he agreed with the hon. and learned Member who moved the Amendment, that if they could not go the length of abolishing common employment altogether, the only thing they could arrive at, as a tolerable resting place, was that which the hon. and learned Member described as reducing common employment to what he called common sense. The hon. and learned Member suggested that it should be a matter of fact, and not a question of law, what was common employment; and that if certain men were working together, as a matter of fact, the doctrine of common employment should be applied to them; but if, as a matter of fact, they were not working together, then the doctrine of common employment should not be held. It seemed to him that that would determine the matter fairly. The original basis upon which the doctrine of common employment was founded he understood to be, that if half-a-dozen men were working together, and one of them opened his safety-lamp, it should be considered that the others, who permitted him to conduct himself in so reckless and careless a manner, were themselves contributory to the negligence. Now, it seemed to him that to confine the common employment doctrine to such cases was according to common sense; and as the Government had, to a certain extent, admitted the principle, it might be advisable to introduce it into the present Bill. If the Government did not consent to it now, he earnestly hoped that they would consider it before the Report was brought up, when the question of granting to other servants what was granted to railway servants was to be considered.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON thought the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill had not put the right construction on this Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman said that what the Amendment proposed to do was to leave the question of law to the decision of the jury. Now, the Amendment did nothing of the kind. With all submission, he thought that all the Amendment left to a jury was the question of fact as to what was common employment; but it left it subject to the discretion of the Judge. The latter part of the Amendment declared the law, and altered it to one of fact on precisely the same lines as the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Bristol the other day. He saw no difference between the two. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol met a class of cases which the hon. Member pointed out to the Committee, and which were not governed by any of the other provisions of the Bill. He (Mr. Serjeant Simon) had pointed out the particular case of a platelayer who happened to be run over by a train while engaged in laying down rails; and he thought the doctrine of common employment was carried to an absurd extent when it was said that both the engine-driver and the man who was laying down rails were engaged in a common object. He had pointed out the absurd lengths to which this doctrine was carried; and some of them, no doubt, the provisions of the 1st section did meet. Others they did not meet, and it was to meet these cases that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol was directed. It was also to meet this class of cases that the present Amendment was proposed, and it was also intended to meet another class of cases where men were engaged in different departments under the same employment. He wished to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill to this—that the Amendment would be of no effect at all if it left the question of fact as to common employment to a jury without some special direction upon the subject, because the Judge would have to tell the jury what the law was now—namely, that persons engaged under the same employer were persons in common employment. The section proposed to change this state of the law; and, if adopted, the Judge would be bound to tell the jury that the doctrine of common employment no longer applied in cases where the persons employed were engaged in different departments, although under the same employer. That was the object of the Amendment; and if the right hon. Gentleman would turn his attention to it, in conjunction with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, he would see that he (Mr. Serjeant Simon) was correct in his construction. And if that was the correct construction, there was no doubt that, as far as the operation of the law would go, it would be in the direction of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol.

MR. BRYCE said, they were in a fair way of having the whole discussion over again which they had already had upon the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bristol. Although he agreed with the hon. Member for Bristol and the hon. and learned Member behind him (Mr. Hinde Palmer), he felt it was perfectly impossible to give a vote until he knew what the clause was which the Government were going to propose, or assent to upon Report. He would, therefore, appeal to his hon. and learned Friend to withdraw the Amendment.

MR. HINDE PALMER quite perceived the force of the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce), and thought it would, perhaps, be the best course to see what the clause was which the Government proposed to bring up, and to see to what class of persons it would be applied. He reserved to himself the right of proposing to amend the Government clause in any way he thought proper. With the permission of the Committee he would, therefore, withdraw the Amendment for the present.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, that he himself had placed on the Paper a clause to restrain the doctrine of common employment in reference to the case of railway servants. As the matter now stood, the hon. Member for Bristol had withdrawn his proposal, on the Government undertaking, on the Report, to bring up a clause adapting the Amendment to the case of railway servants.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM thought it would be much more regular to negative the Amendment than to allow it to be withdrawn. The first portion of the Amendment directed that the doctrine of common employment, as far as it was dealt with by the Bill, should be left to the decision of the jury, under the direction of the Judge. But the more important part of the Amendment was literally the same Amendment as that of the hon. Member for Bristol, which the Committee had already rejected by a large majority. He should, therefore, object to the Amendment being withdrawn. It was not convenient that the Committee should take further steps in that direction.

Sir George Campbell

MR. HINDE PALMER thought there should be a clear understanding as to the position in which they were. As he understood the matter, the Government were only now to consider whether or not they would on the Report bring up a clause relating to railway servants. ["No, no!"] Was he to understand that the Government intended to bring up such a clause? ["No, no!"] Then he would withdraw his Amendment, on the understanding that if such a clause was not proposed by the Government, or by the hon. Member for Bristol, he would himself bring up a clause on the Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

DR. WEBSTER moved, in page 3, line 12, to leave out "In Scotland," to end of paragraph, line 18. The subsection he proposed to omit introduced an entirely new code and a different mode of procedure in dealing with actions brought under this Act in Scotland from those observed in all other actions. It gave, in the first place, power to the Lord Ordinary to refuse the appeal altogether if he should think the case was not a proper one for the consideration of the Court of Session; and it was only if the Lord Ordinary did think the case a proper one in his discretion that a suit under the Act could be removed to the Superior Court. Even if he did agree to the appeal, he had right to clog it with restrictions as to the payment of expenses, finding caution, or such other terms as he or the division of the Court should think fit. He asked the Committee to look at the present state of the law of Scotland in regard to these matters. Down to 1868, when the Legislature dealt with the whole question of procedure in the Court of Session, including that of appeal from the Inferior Courts, it was required that security should be found before any appeal could be entertained. But, in 1868, the Legislature dealt with the whole subject of appeals to the Court of Session, and deliberately did away with the provision compelling security to be found; and now it was competent in every case of appeal from an Inferior Court to the Court of Session to bring the appeal without any restriction as to finding security in regard to the payment of expenses or otherwise. This did not rest altogether on his own authority. He should be sorry to ask the Committee to take it on that ground alone; but it rested on the very best authority—namely, that of the Scotch Bar in the Report of the Committee of the Faculty of Advocates, which he held in his hand. The proposals in the Bill as to workmen finding caution for the payment of expenses were characterized as retrograde in character, having now been abolished in all other cases. He had to ask the Committee, therefore, to consider if it was right that this provision should now be introduced, for the first time, in this particular class of cases, when the Bill was brought in not as any matter of grace or favour to the employed, but expressly as a matter of right and justice to them? It seemed that the advantages which the first part of the Bill gave to the workmen were being curtailed by one restrictive Amendment after another. The effect in Scotland would be peculiarly unfavourable. In the first place, it gave a restrictive power to the Court to refuse to look at an appeal at all; and if they did, they could refuse it unless security or caution was found; and the necessity of finding caution would debar many workmen from bringing a case to appeal at all. But, further, look at the effect of this sub-section on jury trial. In the County Courts of England either party might insist on trial by jury; but that was not the case in the Sheriff Courts in Scotland, and this sub-section went to deprive artizans of their option of trial by jury. He submitted, therefore, to the Committee that the view expressed by the Committee of the Faculty of Advocates in regard to the retrograde character of this legislation was fully borne out by the circumstances of the case. The Faculty of Advocates, besides this main objection, stated that the wording of the clause was defective, and that the reference to the 74th section of the Act of 1868—the Act relating to the Court of Session—was inappropriate, because Clause 74 of that Act applied solely to the removal of one very special action—namely, one from the Sheriff's Court to the Court of Session in consequence of its affinity to, or, technically, its contingency with, another action already pending there. Therefore, they were of opinion that the reference was inappropriately introduced into the present clause. He confessed that no one reading the 74th section of the 1868 Act could see any application it had to the provisions of the present Bill. On the whole, he saw no reason why the cases which would arise under the Bill should be exceptionally dealt with, and unfavourably to working men; and he, therefore, hoped that the Committee would accept his Amendment and omit the sub-section. He thought that, if only for the sake of avoiding the risk of unnecessary litigation, it would be well to adopt his Amendment.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARREER HERSCHELL) said, he could not help thinking that his hon. and learned Friend's observations had a good deal proceeded upon a misapprehension of what the clause was intended to do. If they were to leave this out, so far from assisting the workmen, they would really be doing them an injustice. They would be telling them to go to the Sheriff's Court, and forbidding them to go into a Superior Court, however much the workmen desired to do so. He thought that his hon. and learned Friend had confounded two things—the power of appeal, and the power to remove the cause for trial from one Court to another. He constantly talked about the power of appeal not being limited by the necessity of giving security. That might be so, when this provision of the Bill left the power of appeal intact. It left a man power to go to the Court of Session by way of appeal, and from there to the House of Lords. The Bill did not, in any way, touch the power of appeal. It gave power in any action brought in the Sheriff's Court to remove it, if the Superior Court should think fit, into the Court of Session. That was the object of the clause, and he believed it had been properly carried out. At all events, it had been drawn upon the advice of the learned Lord Advocate. The intention of the clause was to do to Scotland what they had done to England. The Government had applied to the Lord Advocate to give them the proper words to carry out that intention, and the clause was proposed with his sanction. He did not think that the slightest injustice was perpetrated by the clause, or that it required any alteration. At the same time, he would confer with the Lord Advocate on the subject before the Report.

Dr. Webster

MR. HOPWOOD said, that he would suggest to his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General that there was a distinction between the County Court in England and the Sheriff's Court in Scotland, inasmuch as there was no option of trial by jury in the Sheriff's Court. If a man were deprived in England of the option of trial by jury, it was really a matter of serious importance.

DR. WEBSTER said, that in withdrawing his Amendment, in deference to the opinion of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General, he might state that he had proposed it on the distinct authority of the Faculty of Advocates that it was absolutely necessary to carry out the view he had mentioned. Notwithstanding what had been said by his hon. and learned Friend, he still entertained the view which he had expressed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Definitions).

MR. LAMBTON said, that the Amendment he had upon the Paper dealt with the question of the application of this Bill to coal mines. The Government had announced that they would allow the hon. Member for Bristol to bring in a clause dealing with railways, and he thought it would be only fair to deal with mines in the same way. The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had stated that he could not see why some hon. Members wished to draw a distinction between the cases of mines and railways. He would, however, endeavour to show that there was a considerable distinction between them. What he wished to provide was, that a person having superintendence intrusted to him under the terms of the Bill should be one of the persons for whom the employer was responsible under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872, and he thought that would be as much to the advantage of the workmen as to the employers. He apprehended that in the case of well-conducted coal mines there would be 8 per cent of the persons who would come under the definition of the persons having superintendence intrusted to them. That state of things had caused great alarm among coalowners in the North of England. The alarm of the coalowners was extended also to the workers in the mines, for they feared that the contribution of the employers to the Miners' Permanent Relief Fund—namely, about 20 per cent—would be withdrawn if the Bill were passed in its present form. Some hon. Members seemed to think that the coal trade was always a paying concern. He might say that for the last three years many coal-owners had made no profit at all; and if they had this unlimited liability thrown upon them, how could they hope for improvement? The only way left to them would be by reducing the wages of the workmen. He knew a case of two young men who had a capital of £9,000 or £10,000, and who were enabled to borrow as much money as they wished at the present time. But he apprehended that if this liability were thrown upon them there would not be the same facility for borrowing. He did not think, moreover, that with such liability they would be able to repay the money borrowed. If this Bill passed, many persons who owned land, and now worked the mines beneath it, would cease to retain the workings in their own hands. They would, in many cases, hand over the businesses to Coal Companies, and the coal trade would go into other hands. It seemed to him rather strange that a Government, in 1880, seemed disposed to take money from the pockets of the employers, and that a Government, in 1872, should pass a measure to protect the lives of workmen. In 1872 the Coal Mines Regulation Act was passed, and the Government threw the entire responsibility upon the coalowner, his agent, or manager. The Act provided that the owner, agent, or manager should not employ any person in such mines who had been guilty of an offence against the Act. That measure was passed to protect the lives of the workmen, and it treated the owner, or agent, or manager, as responsible; and the Secretary of State had also the appointment of the person in the coal-mining districts to have superintendence and to enforce certain regulations. But the Inspector was bound to point out any infraction of the rules to the owner, agent, or manager, and he was to make a Report to the Secretary of State. The manager appointed under the Act was to have the superintendence over the mine. A man was not to be qualified to be manager of a mine unless he had received a certificate under the Act. They had thus a man appointed by the Secretary of State to look after the mine, and they had managers examined in order to see that they understood their business. That precaution was taken to see that the mines were conducted in the best possible way, and with the greatest safety to the men engaged. If the present Bill was passed, he did not see how the Coal Mines Regulation Act would stand. A mine would be under two different sets of rules. The owner, agent, or manager, would be responsible, and the Secretary of State would have the duty of appointing the Inspector of the mine; and those persons would be responsible for carrying out the regulations under the Act. But, under this Bill, there would be an entirely fresh responsibility thrown upon those persons who were not clothed with responsibility under the Mines Regulation Act. If the Government could make some limit as to the responsibility in the case of coal mines, it would do a great deal of good. He most earnestly appealed to the Government to make some Amendment to the Bill with regard to coal mines. They had consented to do so with regard to railways, and he thought the case was even stronger for making special regulations with regard to mines. In his opinion, the workman in the mine was much more of a co-operative of the employer than a servant. If the present Bill were passed, he believed that many of the smaller mines, and perhaps some of the larger ones, would be closed, for he did not see how owners could stand up against, or could bear, the responsibilities thrown upon them by the Bill. He would, therefore, appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board to limit the responsibility of the employer in mining operations to the persons for whose acts he was made responsible by the Coal Mines Regulation Act of 1872. He begged to move, in page 3, line 25, after "means," to leave out to end of subsection, and insert—

"In reference to a mine, the agent or certificated manager intrusted with the principal management of the mine."

MR. DODSON said, that the hon. Member who had proposed this Amendment had made a very clear and interesting statement of his views as to what ought to be done. But he thought he must have been of a very sanguine nature when he called upon the Government to limit the responsibility of mine-owners to one or two persons nominated in the Coal Mines Regulation Act. He did not interrupt the hon. Member in his speech, although he was not clear that he might not have done so; for his Amendment, proposing to put liability upon one or two particular persons, was one which, in various forms, was discussed previously in the course of the Bill. It was really the same proposition that had been made before, only in different words. The hon. Member had reminded the Committee that the Coal Mines Regulation Act provided for the security of life in mines. The Government were of opinion that there was no difficulty in carrying out this Act in conjunction with a former Act. They had inserted a provision in the Bill that where the rules were laid down by Parliament, subject to the approval of a Government Department, the employer was not to be held responsible for those rules. The hon. Member had said that the Government had agreed to entertain clauses dealing specially with the case of railway servants, and he asked them, for that reason, to accept a clause dealing specially with the case of mines. He would not undertake to say that the Government would accept any clause that was brought up with regard to railway servants. But, in deference to the expression of opinion in Committee, they had consented to consider any clause brought up by the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. S. Morley) dealing with the case of railway servants, who, he had shown, were placed in a position of considerable hardship. It had been shown, in the case of railway servants, that the technical rule with regard to common employment, which was upheld in cases where men were engaged in totally separate duties, led to considerable hardship. That was a totally different question from the proposition submitted to the Committee. It was proposed to make the employer in mines only liable for the negligence of one or two persons in his employment. On the part of the Government he could not agree to entertain such a proposal.

Amendment negatived.

MR. INDERWICK said, that the Amendment he had to propose was of a somewhat similar character to two or three which had already been submitted to the Committee. Most of the hon. Members had formed some opinion upon this subject; but he wished to point out one or two principles upon which he thought they ought to proceed. He proposed that the clause should run in this way—

"The expression, 'person who has superintendence intrusted to him,' means a person whose duty is that of superintendence."

The Bill, as it stood, defined the person who had superintendence intrusted to him as a person whose sole or principal duty was that of superintendence. He maintained that the proper test of a person who should be liable to charge the employer with his negligence was a person who at that time was intrusted with superintendence by the employer; otherwise, workmen might be placed in this position. They might have a man whose sole or principal duty was superintendence, and it might be necessary to remove him for a limited time, for the purpose of carrying out another duty, and another man perfectly competent, who was usually employed in manual labour, might be substituted for a limited time in his place. If that man were guilty of negligence, then, although he would at the time of the negligence be a person actually exercising superintendence, the employer would not be liable. That was not a result which he thought the Government would desire to bring about. He would give an illustration of this which had come under his own notice. The railway by which he had for some time travelled had a junction from which there was a short line. On arriving at the junction a porter, who was ordinarily engaged in manual labour, took charge of the train for a short distance. During that short journey the porter became the person who had the superintendence of the train intrusted to him; and if he was guilty of negligence, causing injury or death to workmen, the Company ought to be liable to pay compensation; but, because the duty of that porter was ordinarily that of manual labour, the Company could not be charged with responsibility for his negligence. He begged to move, in page 3, line 25, to leave out the words "sole or principal."

Mr. Lambton

MR. DODSON said, he could not accept the Amendment proposed by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rye, inasmuch as it would greatly increase the liability which this Bill imposed upon the employer. His hon. and learned Friend had put the case of a man, sometimes engaged in manual labour, and at other times acting as superintendent. He thought that his hon. and learned Friend, in his observations, had forgotten that such a state of things was met by sub-section 2 of the 1st clause, by which it was proposed that an employer should be liable for injuries sustained by—"Reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has superintendence intrusted to him."

In sub-section 3, it was further provided that the employer should be liable—

"By reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer to whose orders or directions the workman at the time of the injury was bound to conform."

Thus, he thought, it would be seen that, while sub-section 2, gave a general liability in respect of the person exercising general responsibility, sub-section 3 extended the liability in respect of the acts of persons temporarily having superintendence. The effect of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member would be to place a man temporarily clothed with authority in the same position as a person in Clause 2, and to make the employer as responsible for the acts of the man invested with temporary authority as for the acts of the person who had general superintendence intrusted to him.

An hon. MEMBER said, that he thought there would be great difficulty in deciding for whose acts the employer was to be responsible if the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman were adopted. He did not think they would find two Judges who would agree whether an employer was to be liable for the acts of any such porter as the hon. and learned Member had mentioned. He thought the Government ought to let employers of labour know what persons it was for whose acts they would be responsible. If that were done, the matter would be very much simplified; whereas, if the Bill were left in this state, very shortly Judges would make reflections upon the weakness of the House in passing an Act in vague and general terms like those in the present Bill. He appealed to the Government, as well in the interest of the workmen as in that of the employers, to state definitely for whose orders employers were to be made liable.

MR. INDERWICK said, that his opinion was that the sub-section mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board did not meet the case he had put; but, if the right hon. Gentleman thought it did, he would leave the matter in his hands, and beg leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, that he would not take up the time of the Committee in discussing his Amendment at any length, because he did not think that there was the slightest chance of the Government consenting to his proposition. He wished, however, to express his opinion that it was desirable that a person who had superintendence should be a man who was not at any time engaged in manual labour. If the Government, however, took upon themselves the responsibility of insisting upon the retention of the words "or principal" in the Bill—if the Government chose to take upon themselves that responsibility—the result would rest with them. He begged to move, in page 3, line 25, to leave out "or principal."

MR. DODSON said, he supposed this Amendment of the hon. Member for Glamorganshire must be read in conjunction with his other Amendment—namely, the insertion of the words "not ordinarily engaged in manual labour." He must oppose this alteration, on the ground that it would greatly restrict the liability, of the employer, and would, practically reduce it to a responsibility for persons whose sole duty was that of superintendence.

MR. J. W. PEASE said, he should like to say a few words upon this Amendment. It was well known that in the case of railway servants a man could be a porter at one time and a station-master at another, and something else shortly afterwards. It seemed to him that the Bill carried the responsibility of the master very much further than it ought to do; for, in the case of a mine, it would make the mineowner responsible for a man who might be engaged for a few moments in settling the position of a piece of timber. As the Bill stood, he certainly concurred in the objection of the hon. Member who had moved the Amendment, that the words in this clause went a great deal too far.

Amendment negatived.

MR. COHEN said, that the Amendment which he proposed to move was in reference to defective superintendence. The Committee would see, on looking at the Bill, that, in the first place, a superintendent was described as a person whose sole or principal duty was that of superintendence, and who was not ordinarily engaged in manual labour. It would be extremely difficult to know whether a man was, or was not, engaged in manual labour. Was it to be said that a pointsman, or a signalman, was not engaged in manual labour? His hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would agree with him that if a clause could be framed which would include in the Bill such a definition of a person engaged in manual labour as would prevent litigation, it would be a good thing. He did not wish to unnecessarily retard the progress of the Bill, and he would, therefore, occupy as short time as possible in moving this Amendment. He wished to say a few words with regard to the principle upon which the Amendment was founded. The doctrine of common employment was stated in the Report of the Committee on Employers' Liability, to have been founded on the consideration that where several persons were employed in doing one common enterprise, one servant could give notice to the other of any defect whereby an accident might arise. That was stated in the Report as being the foundation of the doctrine of common employment. And, so far as it went, it was reason; but what had been complained of was that, by successive decisions, that doctrine had been carried to an extraordinary extent. The question was, whether they were to limit the extent to which the doctrine had been carried, or to preserve it at all? In his opinion, the whole doctrine of common employment was one that ought to be swept away. But if it were preserved, it ought to be reduced to its proper dimensions by the consideration of the principle upon which it was founded. That was what he attempted to do in his Amendment. He had attempted to leave the doctrine in this way. If an injury had been occasioned by the negligence of an individual who had the sole charge of one of the principal machines, like an engine, then inasmuch as the proper working of the engine depended upon the person engaged in working it, and he was subject to no interference by any of his follow-servants, he was exactly in the same position as an ordinary superintendent. A superintendent was a person who had control over the work that was being done; and, therefore, he submitted to the Committee that, by analogy, they should place every person in the position of superintendent, whose acts were entirely without control of the person injured. If that were not done, the Act would be so defective as to work in an extremely harsh and unjust manner. In the Amendment which he had drawn up he had endeavoured to follow the principle of the Bill, which was that of superintendence, and endeavoured, by analogy, to cover those which he thought would not now be met by the Bill, but which certainly ought to come within it upon principle. If the Bill were not extended to meet extremely harsh cases, which would, undoubtedly, arise, it could not, he had pointed out, be a satisfactory settlement of the law. He thought they out to reduce the doctrine of common employment, at least to the dimensions of the principle upon which it was founded, and from which it ought never to have been extended. He thought that, in applying it by analogy to altering the superintendence so as to include those over whom the workman had no control, but who had the management of the machines through which the negligence took place, he was proceeding in accordance with the principles he had stated.

Mr. Dodson

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 25, after the word "duty," to insert the words "superintendence or control in relation to the particular work or matter with respect to which he is alleged to have been negligent."—(Mr. Cohen.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that that was an Amendment which he could not accept. The Committee would see that this would extend the liability of the employers very much more than was proposed by the Government in the Bill. In the Bill as it stood the Government proposed two liabilities. The first one was with regard to general superintendence, upon which, if any injury resulted, there would be general liability with respect to the whole work; and the second liability was that the employer was liable for the negligence of persons having particular authority over others in respect to injury sustained under that particular authority. If the Committee would look at the words proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Southwark, they would see that the proposal was to make the employer liable for injury resulting through the negligence of any person who should have superintendence or control in relation to the particular work or matter with respect to which he was alleged to have been negligent. The result was that the general superintendence in the Bill was converted into a particular superintendence under this Amendment. This particular superintendence was to be given to persons although engaged in manual labour. They would then make the employer liable for persons not under his control. That was not the scheme of the Government. In the Bill they endeavoured to limit the liability, first, to general superintendence; and, secondly, to particular superintendence. It might be that on the clause of the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. S. Morley) being brought up, the Government would be able to make a separate provision for costs where there were distinct works being carried on by persons in the same employ, and if they adopted any Amendment in that direction it was as far as they could go.

Mr. HOPWOOD said, that the question raised by this Amendment was one in which workmen were vitally interested, and upon which they had taken consultation. Several Amendments had been proposed, all directed to meet the particular defect of the Bill aimed at by this Amendment. It seemed to him that the reply of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General did not meet the case which had been raised. It appeared to him that the clause defining the person who had superintendence intrusted to him, as a person whose sole or principal duty was that of superintendence, was incomplete, unless it was further stated that the superintendence was in relation to a particular work or matter with respect to which he was alleged to have been negligent. It might be that the Amendment of which he had given Notice to insert a little later in the Bill would meet the case. The question raised was of very great importance to the class interested, and he thought that they ought to go to a division upon the matter.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 49; Noes 185: Majority 136.—(Div. List, No. 95.)

Mr. INDERWICK said, that the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), which stood next upon the Paper, was not an Amendment in the sense of being an alteration of the Bill, inasmuch as it merely provided that the words of the clause in the Act of 1875 should be substituted for the proposed reference to the Act. He desired to ask whether, assuming that the hon. Gentleman's Amendment were not carried, and the words of the clause were ordered to stand part of the Bill, he (Mr. Inderwick) would be precluded from proposing his Amendment, which had reference to the same subject, and which, if carried, would substantially alter the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Member, under certain circumstances, would be precluded from putting his Amendment; but I will put it in such a form that he will not be debarred.

Sir HENRY JACKSON said, that he had an Amendment upon the Paper which came before even that of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory).

THE CHAIRMAN: I called upon the hon. and learned Gentleman, but he did not respond.

Sir HENRY JACKSON remarked, that unless a subsequent Amendment had been proposed he apprehended he was still in Order. He desired to move, in page 3, line 26, to leave out "ordinarily," and his reason for doing so was that he did not know what the word meant; he did not know what it meant as a legal phrase. It seemed that the retention of the word in the clause would only add another difficulty in construing the Act. "Ordinarily" might mean once a week, twice a week, or every day. They knew what was meant by "engaged in manual labour;" but he submitted that "ordinarily" would assist no one in understanding the Bill, but would, in fact, only make a complication. The clause would be better without the word, for it would then run "engaged in manual labour, &c."

MR. DODSON observed, that his hon. and learned Friend had stated that he did not see the force of the word "ordinarily." He would endeavour to point out what would be the effect if the word were omitted. The section would then read—

"A person who superintended, meaning a person whose sole or principal duty is to superintend, and who is not engaged in manual labour."

It would be limited entirely to a gentleman who simply walked up and down an establishment, and never did a stroke of work.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GREGORY moved, in page 3, line 30, to leave out from "The" to "applies," inclusive, and insert—

"The expression 'workman' does not include a domestic or menial servant, but, save as aforesaid, means any person who, being a labourer, servant in husbandry, quarryman, artificer, handicraftsman, miner, or otherwise engaged in manual labour, whether under the age of twenty-one years or above that age, has entered into or worked under a contract with an employer, whether the contract be made before or after the passing of this Act, by express or implied oral, or in writing, and be a contract of service or a contract personally to execute any work or labour."

The hon. Gentleman said, that the words he proposed to insert were those contained in the Act of 1875. No one knew better than the Attorney General the inconvenience of having to construe one statute by reference to another.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, it was thought more convenient to give the definition now in the Bill rather by way of reference, for a simple reason which he did not think had occurred to the hon. Member (Mr. Gregory). The Act of 1875 referred to certain classes of persons, and there were two exceptions contained in that Act. The first one was with reference to domestic and menial servants; and the second, and more important exception, was that in reference to seamen. This Bill did not refer to seamen. There were so many Acts having special reference to seafaring men that the Government did not think it necessary to bring seamen within the scope of this Bill. They had, therefore, excepted domestic and menial servants and seamen, as was done in the Act of 1875, by a reference in a general way, instead of by a separate and distinct definition. If the Amendment were adopted, seamen would come under the Bill, and that had not hitherto been the intention of the Committee.

Sir Henry Jackson

SIR HENRY JACKSON did not see why domestic servants, to whom they all owed so much of their comfort, should be exempted from the operation of the Bill. They provided for a person who superintended, and that would include their housekeeper or their butler. If the butler gave the footman an order, and in carrying it out he broke his shin, or if the kitchenmaid were scalded in carrying out the order of the cook, were they not to be compensated? He really would like to know why such a valuable part of the community as domestic servants was to be excluded from the operation of the Bill.

MR. GREGORY did not quite see how seamen would be included if his Amendment were adopted.

MR. DODSON said, there was a clause in the Bill which expressly excluded seamen; and the present clause, as they had framed it, was limited to workmen in mines, on railways, in factories, and so forth.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR did not catch from the Attorney General the reason why domestic servants were to be excluded. The question of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir Henry Jackson) was most legitimate, and the Government might, at all events, answer it.

MR. BRYCE thought it ought to be made clear to what persons the Bill was to apply; and, in his opinion, the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) would be a most valuable one in that direction.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL repeated the question, why domestic servants should be excluded? why was a stigma of this kind to be placed upon thousands of the community? for it certainly was a stigma to say they were people who were not worthy of receiving compensation in case they received injury through the negligence of their employer. What was the special characteristic of the footman or chambermaid which disentitled them to compensation? He asked the Attorney General to inform them what logical reason there was for excluding any particular class from the operation of the Bill. The Government had always said that they would not be a party to exceptional legislation; but they had been so already in the concession they had made to the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. S. Morley) in respect to railway servants, and now they were going to exclude from the benefits of the Bill thousands of people who were as much entitled to compensation for injury as any others.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had been asked why chambermaids should not receive compensation. That was a question which he had some difficulty in answering in the abstract. No Amendment had been moved, and no suggestion had heretofore been made, that domestic servants should come within the scope of the Bill. They had only up to this been dealing with the industrial classes, and they never had included domestic servants in legislation affecting workpeople. The risks they were seeking to protect the working classes against were great and dangerous risks, such as explosions in mines, in which men received lasting injury. They had not yet dealt with domestic life downstairs; that was not brought within the scope of the Bill. ["Why not?"] Why? because domestic servants were working under conditions where the risks they ran were not great, and because they were treated as members of the family they served. Persons who were a great deal engaged in a house were not placed in the danger in which a railway servant was placed; and, therefore, they had not been thought in a position to require the protection of this legislation. If, however, it had been the wish of the Committee that the question should be considered, it should have been mentioned on the second reading, or Notice should have been given of it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR observed, that whenever any hon. Member of the Committee desired to pass legislation which had reference to mines or railways, or any one object in particular, the Government said—"Oh, no! we deal with all industries; our Bill includes farm servants and all workmen; it is not confined to railways and mines." And when they suggested that domestic servants should be included, the Government suddenly discovered that the object of the Bill was to relieve the working classes in what were commonly called dangerous employments. It was partly owing to the fact that domestic servants had no votes that their claims did not get that consideration which was given to the claims of workmen engaged in other pursuits. The Attorney General wondered why they had not discovered sooner that domestic servants were exempted from the Bill. He admitted that it displayed great ignorance on his part, and he was subject to blame. He assured the hon. and learned Gentleman and the Government, however, that had he known of the exclusion before he would have given due Notice of the fact.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, that in order to bring the matter to a point, he would take the liberty to move to leave out the word "means," in order to insert "includes domestic servants," &c.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question before the Committee is whether the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) shall be withdrawn.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, he would move his Amendment as soon as that of his hon. Friend was disposed of.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that it was very proper that this question should be urged upon the Government. There were particular classes of servants in the country who, he supposed, would be excluded from the Bill. For instance, there was the case of a man who helped in the house, and garden, and stable. If he received injury while at work in the house he would not receive compensation; but what would be the effect if he received injury while at work in the garden or stable? The Attorney General seemed to think that the domestic servant ran no risk. He (Lord Randolph Churchill) thought the domestic servant ran very serious risks. Let them take, for instance, the case of an explosion of gas. An employer came home late at night, and when he did not, perhaps, altogether know what he was doing, he blew out the gas. An explosion might result, and the servant receive serious injury. Was he not to receive compensation in a case of that kind? Fires, too, constantly occurred from preventable causes, within the knowledge of the master, in which domestic servants were injured. Many domestic servants had families dependent upon them; and there was no rhyme or reason why, in case of injury through their employers' negligence, they should not receive compensation. ["Divide, divide!"]

MR. GORST said, that the Committee appeared to be extremely impatient; but he wished to point out to them that the welfare of domestic servants was an important matter. The Government evidently considered the subject beneath their notice. That was simply because domestic servants, generally speaking, had no votes. He had often observed that those classes of the community who were not electorally powerful had great difficulty in getting their wants listened to in the House of Commons. He could not see any reason for excluding domestic servants from the operation of the Bill. If the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir Henry Jackson) decided to go to a division he would certainly vote with him. There were many establishments, in which domestic servants were engaged, quite as large as manufactories. Take, for instance, the Charing Cross Hotel. Suppose a servant there was injured by a defect in the lift, caused by the negligence of the manager, it would be very hard that he could not obtain redress; while a man engaged in a factory or a mine could get compensation under similar circumstances. He was quite sure that if domestic servants possessed the same political power as other classes they would have their claims attended to. In this Liberal House of Commons they ought to consider the interests of the people, irrespective of such considerations.

THE CHAIRMAN: It would be more in Order if the hon. Gentleman would move that the expression "workman" should include domestic or menial servants, because the object of the Amendment is to exclude such persons.

Lord Randolph Churchill

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he was quite willing to move that Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to amend the proposed Amendment, by leaving out the word "not," in the first line of the proposed Amendment.—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

MR. BRADLAUGH said, that that would make the wording of the Amendment simply ridiculous; though he did not object that it was on that account inappropriate to the Bench where it had originated.

Amendment, and Amendment to proposed Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. INDERWICK moved, in page 3, lines 30 and 31, to leave out all after "means," and insert—

"Any person other than a domestic or menial servant with regard to whom it would be competent for the employer, but for the provisions of this Act, to allege in his defence to any action for compensation that such person was engaged in a common employment with the person actually causing the injury in respect of which the action is brought."

The hon. and learned Gentleman said, one object of the clause was to exclude domestic and menial servants. He had not been able to satisfy himself that there was any reason why they should be excluded; but he believed it was the general feeling of the Committee that they should be excluded, and he did not wish to put the Committee to the trouble of discussing a foregone conclusion. At the same time, he had never seen any reason for excluding domestic and menial servants, and he believed that there was no such exclusion in the case of Scotland. With regard to this Amendment, he was in this difficulty. He thought that after what had taken place the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill would find it necessary to make some modification of the clause which defined the term "workman," and point out the persons who were entitled to the benefit of the Act. The Government had already admitted their willingness to make some modification in the case of railway servants; but to what extent the modification would be carried out he did not know. In all probability a new clause would be brought up on the Report, and upon that clause the matter might be fully discussed. The Amendment which he proposed, together with the Amendment of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Randolph Churchill), would probably be more conveniently discussed at that time, when the Government had had an opportunity of considering the whole matter. Therefore, with the consent of the Committee, he would not press the Amendment which stood in his name at the present moment. But, before withdrawing the Amendment, he would point out to the Committee the reason why he wished this clause added to the Bill. It was now confined to persons engaged in manual labour, and he wished to have it extended to all persons in the service of an employer. It would not extend the principle upon which the liability of the employer would rest; but it would enable other classes of persons to have the benefit of this legislation. He was quite ready, as he had stated, to postpone the Amendment until the Government brought up their clause.

Amendment negatived.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR moved, in page 3, line 31, after the word "applies," to insert "and domestic or menial servants," in order to give domestic servants the benefits of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Clause, to add the words "and domestic or menial servants."—(Mr. Arthur Balfour.)

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 32; Noes 158: Majority 126.—(Div. List, No. 96.)

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

It being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Chairman reported Progress; Committee to sit again this day.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH stated, for the convenience of the House, that it was proposed to place the Civil Service Estimates on the Paper for Monday. For the convenience of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr.

Walpole), who had charge of the Vote for the British Museum, that Vote would be taken first. Then they would begin with Class I. of the Estimates and take them in order; but they would not take any of the Votes relating to Ireland.

SIR HENRY JACKSON asked whether the Government proposed to go on with what might remain unfinished of the Committee on the Employers' Liability Bill to-morrow?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON understood that it would meet with the concurrence of the great majority of hon. Members that that course should be pursued; but that point could hardly be decided until the Order for the Bill was called on again to-night.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

SLAUGHTER OF IMPORTED CATTLE.

RESOLUTION.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD, in rising to call attention to the restrictions upon the import of Foreign Animals, and to the proceedings of the Privy Council under the provisions of "The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878," as well as to the Orders in Council made by authority of that statute; and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the compulsory slaughter, at the ports of landing, of fat stock from the United States of America, restricts the supply and increases the cost of food, and, having regard to the freedom from disease of the stock-producing States of America, this House deems it desirable that Her Majesty's Government should consider these restrictions with a view to their modification or removal," said, he hoped the House would acquit him of any charge of presumption in bringing forward this question. He was well aware that his only title to deal with a matter of such importance lay in the fact that he represented a large population—that of Salford—which had been disastrously affected by the legislation of the late Government in reference to this subject. But the question was also a very weighty one for the people of this country. On a recent occasion he had accompanied a deputation representing 30 towns, in different parts of England, to the President of the Council on the subject of the restrictive legislation which had arisen on the demand of those engaged in the production of meat in this country. The demand was that all foreign animals should be slaughtered at the port of debarkation; but that was regarded as too intolerable, and was opposed by the Treasury Bench, especially by the right hon. Gentlemen the Members for Sheffield, Bradford, and Derby. He (Mr. Arnold) had some doubts whether they succeeded in their endeavours, and whether the substantial victory did not remain with their opponents. It became law that the import of foreign animals to this country was prohibited from all that part of Europe represented by a line drawn from the port of Genoa to Riga. These were not very important sources of supply; but perhaps it was rather strange to class them in a prohibition of that sort, because portions of the countries they bounded exhibited symptoms of the cattle plague. He admitted that we ought to be extremely careful with regard to any outbreak of cattle plague, and he was far from thinking the legislation of the late Government had been without avail. It certainly gave form to the method of controlling the movement of diseased cattle. Still, at the present time, that legislation had reduced the whole world, as far as the importation of cattle was concerned, to Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Spain, and Portugal. The Duke of Richmond and Gordon was especially responsible for this legislation; and one of the reasons why that legislation was specially advocated was because, as Lord Salisbury, in his own pleasant way, had remarked, the farmers of England could not be certain that they would have the Duke at the Privy Council Office. Throughout this country an opinion prevailed that the Duke of Richmond and Gordon was not thoroughly impartial in this matter; and he could not feel surprised at this when he remembered that his Grace, speaking in December last, said, "I am interested in agriculture and in nothing else." Consequently, his Grace was not a fit person to control the importation of foreign cattle, and it was with a feeling of profound dissatisfaction that the deputation to which he had referred learnt from the present Lord President of the Council that it was his intention to follow the policy laid down by his Predecessor. [Mr. MUNDELLA: No, no!] He was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman say "No, no!" and he hoped he would take the opportunity of explaining his views later on. The Privy Council, in its official character, was one of the most curious and non-descript bodies in the Kingdom. Not long ago, a man who looked like a ship's captain accosted him in Downing Street, and said—"Can you tell me the way to the Education Office?" He pointed to the door of his right hon. Friend's Department, when he noticed a puzzled look on the countenance of the man, who observed—"I am hung up with a cargo of beasts, and they recommend me to go to the Education Office. Is that right?" He replied—"Oh, yes; they deal there with education, cattle, and Indian appeals." This episode illustrated the position in which he stood, for he was referred by the President of the Council to the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, with the assurance that that right hon. Gentleman was entitled to be held free of all responsibility in the matter. In fact, the Lord President was the Council on this subject; and it was not right that this power should be in the hands of a single person, however trustworthy he might be. It ought not to be intrusted to a single country gentleman or to one Member of that august Body which, first of all, and above all, represented the landed interest of this country. He proposed to call attention to the figures of the importation of live animals into this country during the first six months of the present year. It would be seen that these imports were largely increasing. The imports of live animals into this country in the first six months of the last three years had been as follows:—1878, 521,950; 1879, 535,988; and 1880, 648,121. The increase in value was more remarkable than the increase in the numbers, the rise in value being due to the greater number of large animals. The values for the three periods had been £2,923,378, £2,737,069, and £4,720,582. It might be said that this increase was rather in favour of recent legislation; but, to his mind, it was quite the contrary. You could not impose any restrictions on a trade without lessening that trade and diminishing the supply of the article, and he should have scant respect for any hon. Member who advanced a contrary opinion. As the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) had said—

Mr. Arthur Arnold

“Live animals could wait for the market and could follow it, while dead meat was a perishable article, and a forced sale of it generally resulted in a loss.”

Although the dead meat trade had been carried on of late years with considerable advantage, it did not exhibit the same capacity for increase as the trade in live stock. The increase of the import of dead meat for the first six months of the present, as compared with the same period of last year, was 79,223 cwt., and of live stock about four times as much. The difference was obviously due to the difficulty of the distribution of dead meat. It was, perhaps, well the public did not know how dead meat was treated on its way to the inland markets. The superintendent of the dead meat market of Manchester wrote that large quantities of meat had often to be disposed of at a loss of 1*d.* per lb., or to be seized on account of its unwholesome condition. He had recently visited the dead meat market of the Corporation of London, and had been told that it was not at all an extraordinary circumstance for 30 or 50 tons of meat to be seized and condemned as unfit for food; and these quantities represented but a small proportion of the meat which was sold at a loss because it was approaching a condition which would render it liable to seizure. He had been informed that 150 tons of meat had been sold in one day at a nominal price, in order to prevent its complete confiscation. When the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act was passed, the hon. and gallant Member for West Gloucestershire (Colonel Kingscote) declared that its effect would be to increase the flocks and herds of England. That was a very Protectionist kind of argument; but what had been the result? He found it stated, two years after the passing of the Act, in the Report of the Metropolitan Meat Market of Monday last—“We have had to-day the smallest arrival of British cattle on record.” In regard to the meat imported and killed at Deptford, it was always in a flaccid state, unfit for human food. He was informed that it never hardened in this weather, partly in consequence of the bad atmosphere in which it was killed, and partly in consequence of the condition of excitement and worry in which the beasts were caught. Nearly the whole of that least saleable meat went to London and the very large towns, for the reason that all the country markets were supplied with British cattle, dead meat being useless for the country trade. Taking, he might add, the estimate of the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay), that £48,000,000 was the value of the meat represented by the home production in this country, he found that the proportion which the foreign importation of live cattle bore to it was more than 20 per cent; or, more accurately speaking, he would say 25 per cent, for he regarded the estimate of the hon. Member for Forfarshire as being too high. He might further observe that a volume which had been presented to the House that day was full of evidence to show that no disease whatsoever of a contagious character existed among the flocks and herds of the Western States of America. It was indeed stated by Professor Law that he believed the cattle of those States to be as sound as the buffaloes of the plains. There could, in fact, be no doubt as to the excellence of the cattle imported from America, although quite as much could not be said for the sheep. Pleuro-pneumonia was, he was aware, a very serious disease; but he did not know that there was any part of the world more entirely free from it than the Western States of America. He could quote evidence to show that it had made its appearance in only seven States; whereas, if the Reports of the Privy Council were to be relied upon—and he thought they were exaggerated—that disease existed in 63 counties in Great Britain. Out of 76,117 head of cattle, he might add, landed in this country last year from America, it was alleged that only 137 were attacked by pleuro-pneumonia, and from the evidence which showed the suffering to which the cattle were sometimes exposed, it was unreasonable to expect that they would not exhibit some signs of disease. He, however, believed that many of the bullocks which arrived in a diseased condition were not suffering from pneumonia at all, but from the manner in which they were brought over on board ship. He had been under the impression that animals slaughtered and condemned at the ports as diseased were destroyed as unfit for human food; but, to his profound astonishment, he had discovered that the carcasses were sent to the market as food for the people. One of the Inspectors at one of the ports, in answer to an inquiry, had informed him that it was a moot point as to whether diseased animals were unfit for human food, and the doubt was given against the public, the officers of the Privy Council thus actually becoming purveyors of diseased meat. The official Reports showed that such occasional cases of pleuro-pneumonia as did occur in America were strictly limited to the cowsheds of the Eastern States. In regard to any danger from foot-and-mouth disease, no one would contend that it could not be fully resisted by means of quarantine regulations. Could there, he asked, be a grosser wrong to the consumer of meat than that caused by the restrictions that existed upon the importation of sheep from America? The slaughter of sheep at our ports was not necessary for the extinction of the disease, and this opinion was shared by the right hon. Member for Bradford. It appeared to him (Mr. Arnold) little short of a wanton use of authority that, because, in 1879, out of 119,000 live sheep imported from the United States only 33 were suffering from foot-and-mouth disease, compulsory slaughter should be imposed. Referring to Section 4 of the 5th Schedule of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, he said, having regard to the general sanitary condition of the animals coming from the Western States of America, he was of opinion that the rule enforced under the section might advantageously be relaxed. The United States authorities had taken the strongest possible steps against the importation of diseased animals for England. At home the Privy Council allowed the circulation of beeves from county to county; and it was only reasonable, therefore, that the importation of cattle should be more freely allowed than at present. Having stated his objections to the Amendments to his Resolution, and asked the House to believe that his views were those of a very important body of the public, he concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the compulsory slaughter, at the ports of landing, of fat stock from the United States of America, restricts the supply and increases the cost of food, and, having regard to the freedom from disease of the stock-producing States of America, this House deems it desirable that Her Majesty's Government should consider these restrictions with a view to their modification or removal,"—(Mr. Arthur Arnold,) —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. JAMES HOWARD, who had an Amendment on the Paper to leave out all the words after "That" in order to insert—

"It is inexpedient to alter the existing regulations in respect of the import of live animals from the United States of America, until the Government of that Country has adopted effectual means to prevent the spread of contagious epizootic diseases, and the Privy Council has evidence of the United States being so free from contagious diseases as to warrant the importation of live animals therefrom without the present restrictions," said, he had listened with great interest to the address of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold), and could not help wishing that his hon. Friend's practical knowledge had equalled his power of research. The hon. Member had asked the Government to reconsider the existing restrictions placed upon the importation of cattle. Involved in that very modest request were the very gravest interests of the tenant farmers and stock owners of the United Kingdom. He (Mr. James Howard) remembered, when in a former Parliament, another hon. Member asking Government to consider the desirability of adopting a certain course in reference to a very different subject, and he remembered the reply made by the present Prime Minister, who was then at the head of the Government;—he said that he should have to think once, he should have to think twice, he should have to think thrice before he took any such step as that recommended. On the present occasion, he (Mr. James Howard) thought that unless the hon. Member could show better and stronger reasons than he had advanced that night, the Government would think even more than thrice before they acceded to his proposal. To his mind, the hon. Member had utterly failed to prove his case; his first contention was that the existing regulations had had the effect of restricting the supply of animal food; but he had not shown that a single animal had been diverted from our shores. If animals had been diverted from our ports, they must have gone to other markets, and his hon. Friend was bound to show where they had gone. As he had not made any attempt, he (Mr. James Howard) took it that it was found to be impossible. Fat animals were not like iron or manufactured goods—when ready for market, to market they must go—they could not, like dead stock, be held over for an indefinite period, waiting for better prices. The remarks of his hon. Friend upon the action of the Privy Council only showed the necessity for an Agricultural Department of the Government, of which proposal he (Mr. James Howard) was an advocate. The hon. Member had been very severe on the late Lord President of the Council (the Duke of Richmond). He (Mr. James Howard) was not there to defend the Duke of Richmond—he had before then denounced the Duke's legislation upon that and other subjects; but he did not fail to remember it was the Duke of Richmond who so long resisted the imposition of additional restrictions thought necessary by the English stock owners, and it was not until the late hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) retired from the Government, that the Duke of Richmond woke up to the necessity for more effective legislation by carrying out the recommendations of the Select Committee upon Cattle Diseases and Live Stock Importation. To return, however, to the arguments of the hon. Member for Salford, he could not, in support of his Motion, point to a diminishing trade. Indeed, so far as the United States and Canada were concerned, the growth of the trade had been enormous. In support of that assertion, he (Mr. James Howard) would refer to the official tables of imports. From the United States there were imported—

Mr. Arthur Arnold

	Cattle.		Sheep.
1876	392
1877	11,000	13,000
1878	68,000	43,000
1879	76,000	119,000

Those figures did not look like a diminishing trade. From Canada in the same periods the numbers were—

	Cattle.		Sheep.
1876	2,557	1,862
1877	7,649	10,275
1878	17,989	40,132
1879	25,185	73,913

A gentleman largely engaged in the foreign cattle trade wrote to him yesterday as follows:—

“The imports of live oxen from the United States into London in the month of July this year was 11,113, against 5,921 head in July last year. This does not look like a trade suffering from restriction. Again, the import from Canada in July this year was 1,960, against 1,367 last year, showing a large increase in the import from the United States (for slaughter) as compared with the import from Canada, not for slaughter. Last week, the import into London from the United States was 3,098 head; this week, up to this (Thursday) morning, from Monday, over 3,500.”

Further, if the supply, as he had shown, had not been diminished, he failed to understand how it could be contended that the cost of meat had been augmented. Was the House to be guided by well-ascertained facts and principles, or to depend upon the unsupported testimony of butchers, importers, and other interested parties? Economic laws were not to be set aside by the assertions of ignorant or interested parties. Unless the supply of an article were curtailed, how, he would ask, could the price be enhanced? If his hon. Friend could have shown that the removal of the existing restrictions would have the effect of increasing the breeding capabilities of the States, he would have proved his whole case; but he was too wise to attempt anything of the kind. People who knew little or nothing about agricultural affairs talk about the unlimited supply of cattle from America. They forgot that meat was not like coal or iron—it could not be dug out of the bowels of the earth, nor could the supply of cattle be extended at will, like the growth of corn or of cotton. Unless animals could be brought into the world without the agency of fathers and mothers, it must be obvious that the increased power of any country to supply us with meat would be very gradual, and could only follow a natural course of expansion. He had endeavoured to show that his hon. Friend had not proved either of his contentions, that the existing regulations had diminished the supply of animals, or enhanced the price of meat. He would now go a step farther, and maintain that he had not shown that the restrictions could be relaxed with safety to our own herds and flocks. His hon. Friend had said that a voyage over the Atlantic acted as a sort of quarantine; but he forgot that the germs of pleuro-pneumonia sometimes took two, three, or even four months to develop; and as to the smaller number of diseased animals which reached our shores, it must be remembered that one diseased animal was sufficient to infect the cattle of a whole country, even as one spark might set fire to a whole city. Turning from the subject of importation, he would refer to the state of things which existed in America. The British Consul at Philadelphia, in a letter to the Foreign Office, dated January 20 last, stated that that fatal and contagious malady—pleuro-pneumonia—was daily awakening increased attention among stock-raisers and dairymen throughout the country; that the demand for a national intervention in lieu of State or local regulations for the extirpation of the disease was growing, and that the prompt attention of the Congress of the United States was called for. Again, in the American Live Stock Journal—which certainly was not published in the interests of the British farmer—he found the following extract, which appeared in The Mark Lane Express last month:—

“Now, what is the situation in the United States? Our veterinary authorities agree in asserting that contagious pleuro-pneumonia exists in several of our States near the Atlantic coast, and we are in no condition to deny this assertion. This being accepted as true, what assurance have we that any of our States, now confessedly free from the contagion, will remain so for another week? What law, rule, or regulation is there in existence to prevent anyone who chooses from buying cattle in these infected districts, and taking them to Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Kansas, or Colorado? This has been done repeatedly within the past few years, and that the contagion has not already been scattered broadcast all over the Western States seems little less than a miraculous interposition of Providence. We have positively no assurance, no protection, and the disease is liable at any day to be transported to each and every one of the States now happily exempt.”

Mr. James Howard

Again, it did not appear that Home Rule, in respect of cattle diseases, had proved more successful in America than it had done in Ireland, for according to the Report of the British Consul—

“Three of the States infected with pleuro-pneumonia had shown no disposition whatever to act for the extirpation of this highly contagious disease, and unless the United States passed a general law for its suppression it could not be eradicated from the country.”

Probably the United States Government were about to be roused from their apathy on the question, for he learned yesterday that a Commissioner from Washington had arrived in this country during the present week to inquire into our internal regulations on the subject of cattle diseases. He held that it would be quite time enough for the Government to consider the proposal of his hon. Friend when that Commissioner had returned and reported to the United States, and when Congress had taken effective steps in the matter. According to a “Message of the President of the United States,” a copy of which he held in his hand, it appeared that there were many other contagious diseases besides pleuro-pneumonia prevailing over that great Continent; for instance, besides various forms of cattle complaints, it appeared that 2,500,000 pigs were annually lost by disease, and the message directs attention to—

“A large number of letters from almost every section of the country relating to hog-cholera and the many diseases to which all other classes of domestic animals are subject,”

—for instance, John William Ross, of Franklin County, Illinois, reported to the President as follows:—

“The disease most prevalent in cattle is murrain. It is characterized by small vesicles in the mouth, on lips, gums, and tongue, with drivellings of saliva, often causing inability to eat or drink. These symptoms are accompanied with fever, swelling of the udder, and lameness.”

Every Member acquainted with epizootic diseases would recognize in these symptoms the disease they knew as the foot-and-mouth complaint. And yet his hon. Friend had contended that there was no proof of the existence of cattle diseases in the United States. According to the Message of the President, it appeared that cattle of the United States suffered from foot-and-mouth disease, pleuro-pneumonia, and another frightful malady called "Texan fever." The hon. Member had laid great stress on the fact that there were only seven States in which pleuro-pneumonia existed; but it must be remembered that the cattle of other States would pass through those in which pleuro-pneumonia was known to prevail to a considerable extent; and what security had we that cattle passing through those diseased districts would not, if sent into the interior of our own country, communicate disease to our own cattle? Having been to the Veterinary Department of the Board of Trade yesterday, he had had the opportunity of referring to a very interesting and instructive Report to Congress upon the diseases of cattle in the United States. From that Report it appeared that a disease known as "Spanish" or "Texan fever" having broken out in 1867, and spread with great rapidity, had caused much alarm to American stock-raisers. The Report stated—

"In consequence of this state of things, Mr. Horace Capron, the U.S. Commissioner at Washington, secured the services of Professor Gamgee, who, in 1871, not only instituted an inquiry into Texan fever, but into 'Lung Plague,' or Pleuro-Pneumonia; a disease Professor Gamgee informs the American public in his Report, is one which may for centuries, if left unheeded now, harass the stock-raisers of the entire Continent, and bring poverty and ruin to many thousands of families. The malady was introduced into America (1843) by a German cow imported direct from Europe—this animal communicated disease to the native cattle of Long Island, and pleuro-pneumonia has prevailed more or less ever since; and so, in 1847, introduced into New Jersey; in Massachusetts from Holland, 1859; in Pennsylvania it raged in Bucks County through cattle bought in the market of Philadelphia. For three years past, the City of Washington, and, indeed, the whole District of Columbia, with adjoining parts of Maryland and Virginia, have been seriously affected with the Lung Plague."

Professor Gamgee pointed out that, as was the case in England, so in America—

"Everyone strives against the disease, but strives in secret, lest the publication of facts should prevent the sale and transfer of unhealthy or infected stock."

To show how dangerous Texan fever was regarded, he would read the following from the same Report:—

"In Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, Virginia, Kentucky, Carolina, and Georgia, Spanish or Texan fever has been the cause of great losses:

this fact has excited the most virulent opposition among the stock-raisers of those States to the driving of Texan steers across the prairies. The nature of this feeling is indicated by a letter from a Missouri stock owner to The Prairie Farmer, in which he says—'Talk to a Missourian about moderation when a drove of Texas cattle is coming, and he will call you a fool, while he coolly loads his gun, and joins his neighbours; and they intend no scare either. They mean to kill, do kill, and will keep killing until the drove takes the back-track, and the drovers must be careful not to get between their cattle and the citizens either, unless they are bullet-proof. No doubt, this looks a good deal like border-ruffianism to you; but it is the way we keep clear of the Texan fever; and my word for it, Illinois will have to do the same thing yet. Congress ought to do something in regard to this stock. Stringent laws were passed in regard to the rinderpest, and yet it is scarcely more fatal than Texan fever.'"

Yet it was from a country full of such dangerous diseases that the hon. Member had told them they should import cattle without the restrictions which now existed. He (Mr. James Howard) had seen two eminent veterinary Professors during that week, who assured him that they saw no reason why Texan fever, if once introduced into this country, should not become acclimated and dangerous. Leaving the subject of the diseases which prevailed in foreign countries, he wished to say a few words on another question which had been raised by his hon. Friend—he meant the proportion of the home supply of live animals to the foreign supply—and hon. Members would perhaps be surprised at the small proportion of foreign animals. The home supply of cattle annually slaughtered had been estimated at 1,750,000; the total from all foreign countries was less than 200,000. The home supply of sheep was 11,000,000, and the total foreign supply less than 1,000,000. The domestic supply of pigs was estimated at 5,000,000, and the total foreign supply was less than 50,000. He estimated that altogether the foreign supply of meat imported alive was only about 7½ per cent of the entire home consumption. In making his calculations, he had taken into consideration the greater weight to which our own animals attained. The estimates of the home supply, he would state, were taken from tables published in a pamphlet, entitled Our Meat Supply, written and compiled by himself in 1876, and published by Virtue. Before concluding, he would draw attention to the fact that the breeding power of this country had been greatly lessened by the ravages of contagious diseases, and the losses we had sustained in our own flocks and herds amounted to as much as the whole foreign supply. During the six years preceding the outbreak of rinderpest, 1,000,000 head of cattle were lost by pleuro-pneumonia alone, whilst our total importations during the same period were only about 500,000. To show further the advantages which had resulted from the existing regulations, he would point to the almost total immunity from disease which most of the counties of England now enjoyed. By the adoption of similar regulations, America would, in a short time, be able to show as clean a bill of health. There were other points he should like to have troubled the House with a few remarks upon, such as the dead meat trade, the preventible waste of animal food, butchers' establishments—which were a disgrace to the 19th century—but he had trespassed upon its attention already too long, and would, therefore, hasten to a conclusion. He had been a Freetrader ever since he had an opportunity of listening to the stirring eloquence of Richard Cobden; no Member of that House revered the memory of Richard Cobden more. He had been for years a member of the Club called after Mr. Cobden's name, and he was also a member of its committee. He was not, therefore, likely to advocate any interference with free importations. No one, he believed, wished to interfere with freedom of importation; all that was demanded was that the Government should use due diligence to prevent the importation of cattle with contagious diseases; he recognized a broad and clear distinction between free imports and sanitary regulations; indeed, they were wide as the poles asunder; and believing that the removal of the present restrictions would be neither wise nor politic, and that their maintenance was in the interests of the great consuming public, he must oppose the Motion of the hon. Member for Salford.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT thought that everyone would admit that this was a question which raised very serious considerations. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold) had failed completely to show that the proposal he had made would be beneficial to the consumers of this country. What they had to look to was the price of meat, and they would have expected that the arguments of the hon. Member would have shown that the price of meat had been increased by the restrictions placed upon the importation of foreign cattle. But the hon. Member had signally failed to prove any such thing. In the first place, the hon. Member had shown that, notwithstanding all the restrictions, cattle had come in far more freely during the last few years than ever they had done before. The hon. Gentleman, as a political economist, ought to have known, if he knew anything at all, that this being a great consuming country, so long as it was willing to take meat or corn, meat or corn would come. But the hon. Member had omitted to state that the first thing every country ought to do was to see not only that its own cattle, but the cattle imported into it from other countries, were free from disease. Now, going back to 1866, when there was the most severe outbreak of cattle plague that ever occurred in this country, what did he find? He found from a Return in the Library to-day that in 1866 the number of farms affected by the disease was 9,954, the number of cattle attacked 76,000, killed 13,906, died 42,812, recovered only 7,854. But there was something more. The expense to one county alone—Cheshire—was upwards of £266,000, and up to that moment they had not paid off the rate in aid. That led them to consider more carefully than ever before what ought to be done, and to make certain regulations; but even those regulations were not half sufficient for the purpose. Things went on until three or four years ago, when another outbreak occurred, and the Duke of Richmond and Gordon, as President of the Council, thought it necessary to ask Parliament to pass another Act to deal with the disease. Up to that time the Privy Council had been able, by Order in Council, to stop the importation of cattle from other countries when those countries were said to be diseased. But the new Act stated that all countries were to be considered as diseased countries unless the Privy Council had ascertained that they were free from disease. He ventured to say that that was the wisest course to pursue. He totally disagreed with the hon. Member for Salford, who said he had no confidence in the one or two men of the Privy Council. He had every confidence in the Privy Council; it was upon it that the great responsibility was thrown of keeping this country free from disease prevailing in other countries. When the Bill, now an Act, to which he referred was under discussion, it was stated that there was no disease in Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Spain, and Portugal, and it was declared emphatically on both sides that cattle from these countries should be admitted. But when it was suggested that the great Continent of America should be excluded from the operation of the Act they said that it would be most unfair to do so, because there was more pleuro-pneumonia there than in any country of Europe. The Vice President of the Council was perfectly alive to the importance of the matter. The great object was to give the cheapest possible supply of food to the people, and the right hon. Gentleman knew that the worst thing that could be done if they wished to carry that object into effect would be to have diseased cattle imported to infect our flocks and herds. In the case of Ireland they said that nothing should come out of that country without proper inspection at the port of embarkation, and which was not in a satisfactory condition, and here at home nothing could be moved from one county, or even one district, to another if disease existed in the former. The question was not one of Free Trade. Free Trade was an accomplished fact in which they all acquiesced; but they did desire that the farmers, whose recent losses had been so considerable, should not be placed in an unfairly disadvantageous position.

Mr. James Howard

MR. JACOB BRIGHT observed that, though the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had endeavoured to scare them by his recollections of the great cattle plague, the House would not wish that the present excessive restrictions should be continued. It was impossible to contend that those restrictions did not limit and reduce the supply of foreign, and especially of American, cattle. No doubt, the Vice President of the Council would tell the House that he must enforce the law; but that was no reason why they should not complain of the law, and ask that it should be changed. The present restrictions raised the price of cattle from America from $7 to $10 each, and that must affect the supply and raise the price of meat. They imported cattle from Ireland, and the healthy were allowed to pass freely and the unhealthy were slaughtered, and they wished to be allowed to do the same thing in regard to other countries. In his opinion, that might be done at a practically inappreciable risk. Examination at the ports showed that the proportion of diseased animals was extremely small. For instance, during the year 1879 119,000 American sheep had been brought to this country, and all of them had been slaughtered at the port of entry because 33 of them had the foot and mouth disease. Restrictions that had that effect were unreasonable, and would fail to commend themselves to the bulk of the English consumers.

MR. E. W. HARCOURT: Sir, the import of foreign cattle disease into this country is a matter of such terrible importance, not only to the grower of meat, but also to the consumer, that every good citizen, as well as every good farmer, is bound by his duty to his country, as well as by his personal interests, to resist to the utmost of his power any attempt to reverse that wise law which was recently passed to stop the terrible scourge which we all so much dread. I do not believe that the Government, in its rather new character of the farmers' friend, and in face of the protestations which it made at the commencement of this Session, can for one moment entertain the idea of acceding to the propositions of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold). We have been opportunely furnished this morning with a Blue Book relating to the diseases of animals in America; and as, in my opinion, a few facts are worth a thousand theories, I shall not apologize to the House for making a few quotations from this Blue Book. The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright) says that he has not had time to read it; and, therefore, his arguments must lose much of their force. On the 28th of February, 1879, we find the United States Minister writing to Lord Salisbury thus—

“The authorities of the several States most interested in the matter, as well as the Federal Government, have taken such prompt and vigorous measures for the extirpation of disease, should it be suspected to exist, and have required so rigid an examination by experts before shipment, that the danger of pleuro-pneumonia, or, indeed, any other serious ailment, has been reduced to a minimum. I cannot but hope, therefore, that Her Majesty's Government will see fit not to depart from the policy hitherto pursued, and which has resulted so favourably."

This was answered on the 8th of March, 1879, as follows:—

"Their Lordships regret that it is not possible, in view of the provisions of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, and of the existence of disease in America, to modify the provisions of the Order in Council of the 10th of February last, relating to cattle brought from the United States."

The wisdom of this caution is exemplified by the following extract from The New York Herald, March 6, 1879—

"It has been a mystery to the general public how pleuro-pneumonia, which did not exist in the cattle raising districts, yet appeared to such an extent in shipments of American cattle on their arrival at British ports, as to force the English Government to make a rule against our cattle. The mystery is now cleared up, and the old truth is again illustrated that the ruin of trade is due to dishonest and unscrupulous traders. At Chicago from 8,000 to 12,000 cattle are fed every winter in stalls, to be sent eastward in the spring as fattened stall-fed cattle. How they are fed and how they are kept is a story the record of which is a vivid repetition of descriptions that have been written of the Blissville stables. The condition and surrounding of the cattle is enough to breed disease even if they were fed on wholesome hay and corn. Long troughs run the full length of the sheds, presenting, like the floors and sides of the walls, a filthy appearance, slimy, steaming, and actually rotting. Although cattle, when they are turned into these stables, may not have been fed for 48 hours, and, from insufficient food whilst in transit, present a half-starved appearance, they merely sniff at the vile mixture that is offered to them, and utterly refuse to touch it. They are penned several days before they will touch the food, but as soon as they do commence to feed it is surprising how rapidly they fatten up, and the healthy appearance they present. They are then re-shipped to East St. Louis, and there sold from the stock yards as fresh and healthy Texan cattle, mixed up with bond fide shipments from Texas and Colorado. In this way are daily shown on the Eastern market from 800 to 1,000 head of cattle that are undoubtedly diseased, so intermixed with good condition stock that it is impossible to separate them after they reached the East."

Professor Law, of Brooklyn, says—

"Whatever country has definitely exterminated the plague, such as Norway, Denmark, &c., has solely relied on slaughter. If any State allows temporizing measures, that State will only perpetuate the disease in the country, and will entail great losses on its citizens."

Mr. E. W. Harcourt

And when I allude to Danish cattle, I cannot forget what a prominent part they were made to play recently at an election in the City of Oxford, where a certain right hon. Relative of mine, now at the Home Office, was concerned. What they were then intended to indicate I will not stop to inquire; but I am glad to think that Her Majesty's Government now takes a very healthy view of this important subject. Well, again in April, 1879, the United States makes application to Lord Salisbury in these terms—

"It is the earnest desire of the President of the United States that Her Majesty's Government may see the importance and propriety of revoking the Order of the 10th of February last subjecting live cattle from the United States to immediate slaughter at the port of arrival, thus removing the present serious interruption to this great element of commerce between the United States and Great Britain, and in which the people of both countries feel so deep an interest."

Again Lord Salisbury answers—

"The existence of contagious pleuro-pneumonia among cattle in the United States is clearly established by documentary evidence, and has been detected by the Inspectors of the Privy Council in cargoes of cattle from the United States landed at the ports of London and Liverpool. Under the above circumstances, and having regard to the fact that no system of inspection, however perfect, affords complete security against the introduction of the disease, their Lordships regret that they are unable to modify the Order of Council, February 10."

Lord Salisbury's wisdom in this matter is again exemplified by the following quotation from the printed proceedings of the American Shorthorn Breeders' Association, October 29, 1879:—

"Amid these indications of prosperity we must not conceal from ourselves the fact that great danger threatens the trade in live stock. It is beyond a doubt a fact that contagious pleuro-pneumonia exists among the cattle of the United States. This is no mere sectional question, but one in which the people of the whole country is interested."

The British Consul at Philadelphia writes to Lord Salisbury, January 20, 1880—

"It has been decided that no State in America has the power to exclude the infected cattle of a neighbouring State. The three States now infected have shown no tendency to act for the extinction of the disease, and unless the United States pass a general law for its suppression it cannot be eradicated from the country."

In February, 1880, a letter was written from the Clerk of the Council to the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, setting forth the futility of the inspection, upon which the American Government endeavoured to persuade the English Government to rely—

"I am directed to call the attention of Lord Salisbury to my letter, in which it was stated that their Lordships had carefully considered the Orders issued by the American Government for the inspection of cattle previous to exportation; but their Lordships are aware from experience that such inspection is unreliable. In the year 1879 there were 57 cargoes of American cattle in which pleuro-pneumonia was detected; the total number of animals in which the disease was found to exist was 137, a number far in excess of that received in one year from all other exporting countries put together."

The last quotation I shall make is from a letter addressed by Sir Edward Thornton to Lord Granville, April 26th, 1880—

"It appears that the disease exists in some parts of the State of Connecticut, West Chester County, New York City, and Long Island in the State of New York, and in several counties in the States of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Maryland. It would seem that many cattle have died of the disease in the above-mentioned States, that others have been slaughtered, and that the regulations made to prevent the spread of the disease are not attended to, and are sometimes wilfully evaded, and that there are quite enough infected cattle to cause the disease to spread over a large extent of territory unless stringent measures are adopted and vigorously enforced for its suppression."

It appears to me that there is a class of politicians who have a political economy entirely of their own, not founded on facts, but simply fitted to their own preconceived ideas. These politicians deliver themselves occasionally of remarks so exceedingly elementary as quite to take one's breath away with astonishment. This is a case which requires special knowledge of the facts to enable anyone fairly to balance the advantages and disadvantages of the indiscriminate import of live meat into this country. It is simply a question of whether the country gains more by indiscriminate import or loses more by the introduction of foreign disease. Theorists, of course, in the face of all evidence, will vote in favour of the gain, but they will so vote simply because they are theorists; they are not competent to consider that beyond the present difference in price there lies the deeper question of the destruction, or, at any rate, the deterioration, of the entire stock of the country. Mere theorists do not consider that when the stock is in-fectured it is not the loss of meat alone that is involved, but that the breeding qualities of our herds are affected for generations. Present loss of meat, present loss of milk, is bad enough; but when the loss is permanent, then, indeed, the question becomes a very grave one. The theorist, it is true, presents to uninformed minds pleasing pictures of the abundance which will be produced by the removal of what he is pleased to call protection; but he is unable to appreciate the grievous injustice to the farmer, the serious loss to the country, which the adoption of his crude notions would entail. The immunity from disease which has followed the legislation of the late Government has been such a marked blessing to the farmer, has been such a marked blessing to the country, that it would be a bold Government indeed, it would be a bad Government indeed, which should seek to reverse it.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he wished to invite the attention of the House to the effect which these regulations and restrictions had upon the farmers of this country, as well as upon the landlord. In the first place, he begged to point out that there were two classes of farmers whose interests were affected by the importation of foreign cattle. The interests of the whole of the farmers were uniform in this respect, that they were anxious there should be no disease imported into this country; but there was divergence in the interests of the two classes in another respect. There was one class of farmers who bred cattle, and another who bought store cattle for the purpose of fattening them. Now, the interests of these two classes were, in some respects, very distinct indeed. The breeder desired that there should be few store cattle imported, in order that he might get a better price. The farmer who fattened store cattle desired to have a very large supply of store cattle, because, being able to buy them cheap, he was able to make a good profit from the fattening. Those practically acquainted with the condition of things in this country for the last year or two knew that the large portion of farmers' losses arose from this circumstance, that they had to buy store cattle at a very high price, and having fattened them, sold them at a lower price per cwt. than that for which they bought them. Now, how did this question of imported foreign cattle affect the farmers? In the Western States of America they might get almost an unlimited supply for the purpose of fattening, thereby making a handsome profit. He had been over in the North-Western States last autumn, and, although he did not take upon himself the part of a Commissioner, he had inquired into the state of cattle disease, and made inquiries on every occasion as to the subject, and also as to the price at which cattle could be bought and brought over. Notwithstanding the statement that had been made by the hon. Member for Bedfordshire (Mr. J. Howard) and others, the result of his inquiries was that disease was practically unknown in those districts. No doubt, on one occasion, Texan fever spread through one of the Northern States, very much as rinderpest prevailed in this country a short time ago; but since 1871 there had not been any further case of Texan fever in the North-Western States. He believed that Texan fever was somewhat like yellow fever—it did not extend beyond a certain degree of latitude. When in the Western States, he saw very large herds sold at such a price that they might be delivered at Liverpool at £15 a-head. They were half-fattened—a condition in which the farmers of this country would like to have them. These cattle would have readily been bought in this country by farmers at £20; and, indeed, they could not get them at that price. What took place in consequence of these regulations? Instead of these store cattle coming over to this country, and the fatteners getting a fair opportunity of making a profit, they were directed into Illineis, where Indian corn was grown in abundance, and fattened there. They then came across to Liverpool, were slaughtered at the port of debarkation, and sold in competition with the cattle here; so that the difference of £5 per head was turned into the pockets of the Yankee, instead of into that of the British farmer. This was one of the consequences of the restriction imposed by these regulations, and he was bound to point out that result for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the fact that this question was a double-edged one, which not only affected the consumer and breeder of cattle with regard to the importation of disease, but also the British farmer and landlord. After thinking over the position of the

Mr. J. W. Barclay

British farmer for the last year or two, it did seem to him that the best prospect of the British farmer was to be able to buy store cattle cheap, fatten them, and sell them in this country. The United States were held to be better adapted for the breeding than for the fattening of cattle; and if the British farmer could have his store cattle at the same price as the Yankee farmer, he had no doubt he would be quite able to compete with the American farmer in the fattening of cattle. He could not, however, support the Resolution of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. A. Arnold). He had no doubt there was a considerable amount of pleuro-pneumonia in the Eastern States of America; but to say that no cattle should be imported from the Western States because disease existed in the Eastern States would be as absurd as to say that no cattle should be imported from Denmark because there was disease in Spain. The mistake was made of dealing with the whole of America as one country; and when the hon. Member for Bedfordshire said that cattle could not be brought from the Western States without passing through the States where disease existed, he was deficient in his geography; for a glance at the map would show that there were lines of railway coming westward from Chicago through Michigan to the Canadian ports, and that it was possible to bring Western cattle from Chicago without going within 500 miles of the infected districts. We allowed cattle to be imported alive from Canada now; so that if there was a clear road from the Western States to Canada, without going near the Eastern States, he did not see why the Privy Council should not take steps to allow the unrestricted importation of cattle by that route. The Privy Council ought to make such independent inquiries as should satisfy them whether or not that course could be safely carried out. From his earliest observations in connection with the stamping out of rinderpest in this country, he was fully impressed with the great necessity for the preservation of our herds and flocks free from disease; and he certainly would not propose any relaxation of the restrictions, if such relaxation would be accompanied by any really tangible danger; but, in the face of the difficulties now before the British Parliament, and in the face of the feeling which was getting up in many of the large inland towns, he considered it of great importance, in the interest of the farmer and breeder of cattle, that restrictions should not be maintained of greater gravity or severity than were absolutely required. He would suggest to the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council that they should send out to America two or three gentlemen in whom they had full confidence, who should, in the first place, satisfy themselves as to the existence or non-existence of the disease in the Western States; and, in the second place, as to whether traffic in cattle could be carried on with safety from Chicago to the Canadian ports; and if they found that it could, then he was sure they would be doing very great service to the British farmer if they could see their way to permit the importation of store cattle into this country. In the meantime, perhaps the Eastern States of America were not taking such energetic steps as they ought to get rid of the disease. But he believed that if there were any indications of such a policy as he had recommended being adopted—namely, to allow of the introduction of cattle from the Western States by the Grand Trunk and Great Western of Canada Railways—they would soon see that the railway interest of the Eastern States would take the matter up, that the disease would be stamped out in that quarter, and so we should ultimately be free to receive cattle with safety from any of the ports on the Eastern seaboard.

Mr. CHAPLIN said, he was unable to understand the speech of the hon. Member who had just sat down. It appeared to him to be the strongest possible speech in favour of the Resolution, and yet he had concluded by saying he should not be able to support it. Unless his memory altogether deceived him, the hon. Gentleman took a considerable part in the discussion on the Bill in 1878, and he was then one of those who appeared to offer to the measure a very considerable degree of opposition. The hon. Member appeared to retain a lingering dislike to that measure, but lacked the courage of his opinions to support the Resolution of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. A. Arnold). He (Mr. Chaplin) could not share the wish of the hon. Member for Salford that we should return to the Free Trade in cattle with America which existed some years ago. The hon. Gentleman seemed to have forgotten that severe irruption of the cattle plague which had caused so much devastation among the flocks and herds of this country that we had not yet recovered from its effects, and would not, probably, for many years to come. It had been effectively shown that, so far from the existing restrictions having reduced the supply, there had been an increase; and when it was complained that the imported dead meat did not "harden off," he could only say that he thought the tenderness of meat was an admirable characteristic. Then it was argued that the cattle-producing districts of America were free from disease; but the hon. Member for Forfarshire admitted that the cattle would be brought through the infected Eastern districts. [Mr. J. W. BARCLAY said, he suggested that they might be taken through Canada.] He (Mr. Chaplin) sympathized as much as anybody with the toiling millions; but was it not, he would ask, the greatest certainty in the world that, if disease were introduced into the country, the price of food, instead of being lowered, as the hon. Gentleman supposed, by the importation of foreign cattle, would be found to be permanently increased? He hoped, therefore, the House would not assent to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, which would be regarded as a wanton and needless attack upon them by the agricultural interest at a time when the unhappy circumstances in which they were placed entitled them to general sympathy, if not to the assistance of Parliament, in an exceptional degree. As to the first proposition of the hon. Member, he doubted whether, after what had been said, it was necessary further to reply to it. As to the next statement, that there was freedom from disease in the stock-producing States of America, he did not know what the hon. Member called the stock-producing States of America; but many diseased animals came from the United States. The whole question was whether the Government or any hon. Member could convince the House that, contrary to what they saw in the Blue Book, the general sanitary condition of animals in the United States was such as to afford reasonable security against the importation therefrom of diseased animals in this country. Unless this could be supported, it was impossible for the hon. Member to press his Motion any further. He found, as a matter of fact, that in 1879 1,181 diseased animals were imported from the United States into this country; and that between the 1st January and the 30th June of the present year there had been imported 495 diseased animals. He submitted, therefore, that the hon. Member for Salford had not a leg to stand upon, and that it was impossible for the Government to do anything else than to give to the Motion an unqualified resistance.

COLONEL KINGSCOTE said, he thought the time of the House had been taken up too long in going through Blue Books on this question. He considered just cause had been shown for standing by the Act of Parliament. The hon. Member for Salford (Mr. A. Arnold) had sneered at the Duke of Richmond; but the present Vice President had backed up the opinion and actions of the Duke of Richmond. The Act of Parliament required that foreign animals should be slaughtered at the port, subject to the power of the Privy Council to allow their importation if a clean bill of health for the exporting country could be shown. He appealed to the House whether the hon. Member for Salford, or the hon. Member for Manchester, who had supported him, had shown that the price of meat had increased in consequence of the restrictions put upon the importation of cattle from America, or that that country was so free from disease that cattle might without fear be imported into this country. It was impossible to read through the Blue Book, however cursorily, without seeing that in America pleuro-pneumonia existed to a very dangerous extent, and that it was not unlikely that Congress would be appealed to to do something with regard to this matter. America, however, had just cause of complaint with respect to the dead-meat trade. The dead meat imported was treated like so much carrion when it arrived in this country. His hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) would back him up in this assertion. There was no disguising the fact that the middle man in this country, the butcher, and the dealer in live animals, thought that they could make more out of them than out of dead meat; and, therefore, they set their face against the dead-meat trade. The hon. Member for Salford and the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright), when they spoke of so many sheep being slaughtered at the port of landing because one or two were infected, seemed to forget that that meat was not lost to the community, but was sold and eaten. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) had referred to the Returns of the last six months, by which it appeared that 187 animals had disclosed symptoms of pleuro-pneumonia. What would have been the extent of the disease and the consequences if even five or six of those animals had found their way into this country? He thought it would be most detrimental to the interests of the country to allow foreign animals to come into the country indiscriminately. He, therefore, hoped that, under present circumstances, the Privy Council would staunchly maintain the Regulation.

Mr. Chaplin

MR. DUCKHAM said, he had listened to that discussion with a great amount of interest, but that it did not appear as if the House were likely to be convinced by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. A. Arnold). If we were to supplement the produce of our own country by importations of diseased animals from abroad, the result would be that disease would be spread broadcast here, and that, instead of cheapening the supply of meat to the people, we should tend very decidedly in the other direction. Pleuro-pneumonia, of which we knew a great deal now, was known only in France when Youett, in 1835, published his treatise on cattle, under the supervision of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge. Owing to the free importation of stock in 1839, that disease had soon reached this country; from England it had gone to Australia, and thence all over the world, having become a source of very serious loss to the Colonies belonging to Great Britain. It had recently got across from Australia to New Zealand, to the great distress of the stockowners in the latter place. An hon. Member had just now said that there had been no cry from the farmers of England respecting the losses sustained by imported diseases until the cattle plague had broken out; but that was not quite true; still, it was only when the cattle plague actually broke out and threatened to destroy the whole of our herds that attention was given to what had long been an unheeded complaint. The very means adopted to stamp out the cattle plague in 1867—for it had continued from 1865 to 1867—had freed the country from foot-and-mouth disease and from pleuropneumonia. Yet, as soon as free importation became resumed, the foot-and-mouth disease had spread with the utmost rapidity. Owing to the state of the law here at the time, many millions were lost, and the foot-and-mouth disease formed, during the year 1872, certainly a national curse. In 1873, he (Mr. Duckham) submitted, in his evidence before a Select Committee of that House, the result of his investigations, and showed that the nation sustained a loss of £19,000,000, which was nearly four times the value of the imported live stock of that year. The Veterinary Report of the Privy Council, which they had been furnished with, showed that the number of diseased animals which had come from the United States during the past year was 137; but the total number imported in the same vessels with the diseased animals was 21,647; so that, had not restrictive regulations prevailed under the Act of 1878, the seeds of disease would have been scattered all over the country. When they looked at the rapid increase in the importation from America, it did not appear that any real loss had been sustained by the nation in consequence of the regulations; for whilst in 1875 there were only 299 cattle brought into England from the United States, there had been, during nine months last year, 76,117. An increase had taken place in sheep also, for whilst in 1877 they stood at 13,120, they reached 119,350 during nine months last year. The improvement which had taken place since the establishment of the restrictions was a sufficient evidence in their favour, and he was emphatically of opinion that the continuance of good and effective regulations was for the general good of the nation—for the interest of the producer as well as of the consumer.

Mr. MUNDELLA said, he did not regret that his hon. Friend the Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) had brought that question before the House, because there was a great misunderstanding in many large constituencies as to the use which the Privy Council was making of the powers intrusted to it. His hon. Friend complained that the Lord President of the Council and the Department had assumed to themselves the right and responsibility of dealing with the matter, and remarked, further, that he (Mr. Mundella) might plead that he was acting there as the mouthpiece of the Department. He declined altogether to take that course. He preferred to take upon himself the full responsibility of the words he uttered. He had, therefore, endeavoured to master the question, and what he should have to say to the House was really the result of his own convictions. His hon. Friend had said that the existing restriction on importation violated the principles of Free Trade and of political economy. Now, he (Mr. Mundella) hoped that, as an old Freetrader, he was above suspicion; and he was quite sure that his noble Friend the Lord President of the Council (Earl Spencer) was as good a Freetrader as any hon. Member of that or the other House.

Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD denied having used the language attributed to him.

Mr. MUNDELLA begged his hon. Friend's pardon for having misunderstood him. He had certainly understood his hon. Friend to say that the restriction violated the principles of Free Trade. His hon. Friend had spoken with a good deal of feeling as the Representative of a large constituency. Like his hon. Friend, he (Mr. Mundella) was the Representative of one of the largest constituencies in the Kingdom, and one which, of all others, was most interested in the matter. There was none in which the habits and necessities of the people required so large a consumption of meat as the town of Sheffield. He thought, after all, that this was not a farmer's question, but a consumer's question; and he, therefore, desired to argue it purely from a consumer's point of view. He wished, in the first place, to clear up one or two misapprehensions. His hon. Friend thought that the opposition made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster) to the restriction when first proposed by the Privy Council was not altogether a successful opposition. He did not quite agree with that conclusion. The opposition succeeded in obtaining for the Privy Council the privilege of exercising option in all cases, and that seemed to him to be a fair and reasonable compromise. It was a compromise which had, he believed, worked well, and he was prepared to stand by it. It was not only to the interests of the farmers or breeders, but to the interests of the consumers and of the general community, that they should as much as possible preserve their flocks and herds from the inroads of disease. His hon. Friend had referred back to the year 1878. Now, he (Mr. Mundella) was quite content with what was achieved in the year 1878. On the 1st of January, 1879, the Act of 1878 came into operation. What was the feeling of the House, and of the Privy Council, at that time in regard to the United States? The conviction was strong that no disease existed in the United States at that time; and the Bill, as it came down from the House of Lords, placed the United States on an exceptional footing. That course was subsequently changed, and the United States were placed on exactly the same footing as all other countries. On the 1st of January, the Act came into operation, and on the 7th of January, 1879, a cargo of cattle was brought to this country by the Ontario, in which there were two animals dead from pleuro-pneumonia, and 12 others after death were found to be seriously affected. There could be no mistake with regard to pleuro-pneumonia. There was no question about that. [Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD dissented.] His hon. Friend the Member for Salford shook his head. All he (Mr. Mundella) could say was that all the medical evidence in this Kingdom quite agreed on the subject; and if eminent men who advised the Privy Council did not know their business, it should not be expected that those who were not experts or professional men should know any more of it. It must be recollected that the same rule as to restrictions was applied to home animals as to foreign animals, and if there was hardship in one case there must be hardship necessarily in the others. Let them consider how the law worked in respect to the farmer at home. They placed the farmer at home under very onerous conditions, and the two things hung together, for it was impossible that they could abolish the restrictions for the prevention of the importation of foreign disease, and still retain the restriction upon the trade at home. If they suspected the existence of disease, the farmer was required to kill the suspected animal. If they proved to be diseased, he was only allowed 75 per cent of the value; and if they were found to be healthy, then he was only allowed 50 per cent of the value. He could not buy and sell with freedom; but he was in an isolated position, and he was so situated for a certain time that his trade was entirely stopped. How, then, could they exact these onerous conditions from the farmer at home, and not exact similar conditions in regard to the foreign trade? When it was found that a ship from the United States had brought a diseased cargo, by the advice of the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council, and after a Cabinet Council had been held on the subject—for it was not done by an individual, but was the act of the united Cabinet—the Order was issued which was to come into operation on the 4th of March. During the year 1879, there were 535 cargoes of live cattle from the United States. Of these, 69 cargoes were diseased. It was quite true that there were only 137 cases of pleuro-pneumonia in these 69 cargoes; and his hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright) said, why not kill off the diseased cattle, and allow the remainder to pass free into the interior? It was not a question of killing off the infinitesimal number of animals which might be found to be diseased. These 137 diseased animals had been in contact with 119,000 cattle, and what they had to consider and deal with was not alone the cattle in which disease had been detected, but the cattle affected in consequence of having been in contact with them. If the 119,000 had been allowed to pass into the markets in the interior, it was probable that the disease would have been in the process of incubation for three or four months, and at the end of that time they would have established all over the country a disease which would have completely swept away our herds. [An hon. MEMBER: And sheep.] His hon. Friend said sheep, and referred to the foot-and-mouth disease in sheep. When it was found that sheep were suffering from foot-and-mouth disease the restrictions of the Privy Council were put in force, and what was the result? Nothing could be more admirable than the working of the Act in respect of foot-and-mouth disease. At one time, a few years ago, as many as 80,000 sheep were imported into this country in the course of a week, and for the whole of the present year there had not been a single case of foot-and-mouth disease from Ireland, and for eight weeks past there had not been one reported to the Privy Council in the United Kingdom. To use the words of Professor Brown, "foot-and-mouth disease may be regarded as practically extinct." That was an immense gain to the country, for whatever tended to preserve the breeding qualities of their stock increased the production of meat, and cheapened the supply to the consumers. When the disease was first imported from America, everybody there denied it, and said they had never heard of such a thing, and were, consequently, quite distressed at the allegation. What was the state of things in America now? It was not incredulity now, but alarm from one end of America to the other. The people of America were alarmed at the condition of their cattle with regard to pleuropneumonia. Secretary Sherman, who, at first, complained bitterly of the action of the English Government, said now in his Report—

Mr. Mundella

"Although many complaints were at first made of the Order compelling immediate slaughter of cattle imported from the United States into Great Britain, a careful consideration of the position of both countries leads to the conclusion that the Order was made in perfect good faith to prevent importation of the disease, and not with any view to embarrass the traffic in meat cattle between the countries. The supposed importation of pleuro-pneumonia by the Ontario, and the reports of the existence of the disease in several of the Atlantic States, furnished reasonable ground for the action of the British Government; and it is not doubted that the Government will be as ready to rescind the restrictions upon the traffic as it was to impose them, whenever it is convinced that it may do so without danger of introducing the much-dreaded disease."

Secretary Sherman went on to say—

"It is all important, not only with reference to our own protection, but to our commerce with Great Britain in meat cattle, that effectual measures shall be taken by our own Government to guard in general against the spread of the disease in this country, and in particular against its impossible introduction into Great Britain through the shipment of cattle from our own ports."

There was not now a word of complaint in the United States as to our rules in regard to importation from America. What did Professor Law say about it? He (Mr. Mundella) did not wish to weary the House with extracts; but he was desirous of showing that if there was no possibility at present of relaxing the regulations, they were really maintained as much for the protection of the consumer in the manufacturing districts as for the farmer. Professor Law said—

"And this malady we harbour on our Eastern sea-board, where it is gradually, but almost imperceptibly, invading new territory, and preparing, when opportunity offers, to descend with devastating effect on our great stock range of the West. There is abundant evidence of the existence of this affection in Eastern New York, in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, and the district of Columbia. Within the past year, I have advised in the case of three outbreaks—one in Eastern New York, one in Staten Island, and one in New Jersey. At present, it creates little apprehension; but we are asleep over a smouldering volcano, which only wants a little more time to gather strength, when the general infection of the country will be imminent. Speaking from the port of New York, it has already gained a substantial hold upon seven different States, including the district of Columbia, and has been invading and been repeatedly expelled from two more; and it is only requisite that it should reach the sources of our stock supplies in the West to infect our railway cars and the Eastern States generally."

And so on. He could quote 20 passages to the same effect. According to a decision come to in regard to Illinois, it appeared that, according to the law of the United States, one State was not allowed to legislate against another; and, therefore, they could not have that universal and effectual protection which was required in order to stamp out the disease. Therefore, until Congress, as a whole, took the matter up, and not State against State, there was no probability of the disease being stamped out. He wished now to point out to the House that although they had only had experience in seven months of the present year, they had had 70 and odd cases of disease more in those seven months of this year than they had in the whole 12 months of last year. We must accept that fact as a proof of the increase of the disease. We had had 20 cases of pleuro-pneumonia reported from the United States in seven months, and that was just four times as many as we had from all the rest of the world put together in six years. His hon. Friend the Member for Manchester spoke of an infinitesimal number of animals being infected; but hon. Members must remember the insidious character of the disease. One single diseased cow would infect the whole of the stock. One diseased animal imported into Australia had been the pest of that country, and the infection had now been imported into New Zealand, and was devastating the cattle of that country. These 20 cattle had come to the shores of this country in large cargoes; and if they had found their way into the inland markets there would have been no means of keeping the disease from spreading all over the country. The incubation was very much longer than the voyage. They came over in 14 days at the outside, and the disease did not, in some cases, manifest itself for three months. Suppose that the infected cattle were allowed to come into contact with the English cattle which were not sold in the market, but taken home, they might have introduced pleuro-pneumonia in its worst form into every part of the country. They had been most successful, by the Act of 1878, in diminishing the disease. He would point out to the House what had already been the operation of that Act. In Great Britain, in 1875, there were 5,806 cases of pleuro-pneumonia; in 1876, 5,253 cases; in 1877, 5,330; in 1878, 4,593; in 1879, 4,414; and in the first six months of the present year the number had been reduced to 1,401 cases. They must remember what a searching inquiry they had now, and the severe penalties imposed for concealment. Everybody knew he must report every case, and he dared not do otherwise, and with these severe restrictions they had succeeded in reducing the number of cases to less than one-half what they were last year. He was sorry to inform the House that he had that afternoon received a telegram which he did not think it fair to conceal from the House, as it might be read with more alarm when it appeared in the newspapers to-morrow. Professor Brown had received a telegram that afternoon from Birkenhead, stating that five beasts, suffering from splenetic apoplexy, had to be slaughtered on debarkation from Boston, and that 43 others had been thrown overboard on the passage. Professor Brown said that this disease was known as "Texan fever," a malady which was even more fatal than the cattle plague. Immediately on receiving the telegram, Professor Brown ordered the entire cargo of cattle to be slaughtered at once, and everything connected with them which could carry infection to be destroyed. He had thought it right to mention this circumstance, the telegram having been handed to him that evening as he came down to the House. It was evident that in the importation of animals from America there was a source of danger which could not be ignored. His hon. Friend the Member for Salford seemed to think that the operation in the restrictions would lead to a diminution in the supply of food. He would point out what the imports of meat had been. In 1875 there were imported 215,581 cwts. of beef, representing 32,337 head of cattle; in 1876, 413,351 cwts. of beef, representing 62,003 head of cattle; in 1877, 678,505 cwts., representing 101,775 head of cattle; in 1878, 729,123 cwts., representing 109,368 head; and in 1879, 812,237 cwts., representing 121,836 head of cattle in the shape of dead meat. He agreed that they had not yet devised a better means of conveying meat fresh to London and other places at a distance from the port of debarkation. Hitherto there had not been devised a means of transporting dead meat from Liverpool to Manchester, which was comparatively a very short journey, in a reasonably wholesome condition. No doubt, it was a most delicate and perishable article of food; but we were able to bring supplies of other articles of food from Glasgow in the summer, and it did seem discreditable that greater care was not exercised in regard to the conveyance of meat. A more important question than the dead meat trade was the proportion of imported cattle to home cattle. This was a very important matter indeed, and involved the consideration whether we were to sacrifice the greater source of supply for the sake of a comparatively small portion of the supply. The number of cattle in Great Britain in the year 1877 was 5,697,933; in 1878, 5,738,128; and in 1879, 5,856,356. At a moderate calculation, one-third of these were killed annually, or, in round numbers, about 2,000,000 head of cattle were slaughtered in Great Britain each year for the purpose of providing food at home. And what were the imports? The total imports in the largest year were 246,652, or less than 12½ per cent of the whole meat consumption of the country imported in the shape of live cattle. Surely, then, as political economists, they should not neglect the important source which supplied more than 87½ per cent, in order to admit, without restriction, the remaining 12½ per cent. The foreign importation was, no doubt, invaluable as a supplement to the home production; but if they furnished 87½ per cent at home, the supply of 12½ per cent from abroad would not materially affect the price. And the importation of American cattle had not fallen off. In 1876, 392 were imported; in 1877, 11,538; in 1878, 68,450; in 1879, 76,117; and in seven months of this year, 94,856, being at the rate of 150,000 for the year, and nearly double what was imported last year. No doubt, if the cattle were allowed to go free into the interior, they would realize higher prices; but the margin of profit was already so considerable, and the prices so remunerative, that the trade was abundantly attractive to the American producer, who was anxious to send in all the cattle he could. He did not think, therefore, that there was any danger of the supply falling off. We had done all we could to induce the Americans to place their country in such a condition that we might consider proposals for the admission of their cattle; but, up to the present time, nothing had been done. He thoroughly sympathized with his hon. Friends in their desire to accelerate the supply from America, and nothing would give him greater pleasure than to be able to announce that the laws of America had been placed upon such a footing that they would prevent the spread of disease, and enable the American authorities to stamp out the disease wherever it manifested itself. He should be glad to announce that all that had been accomplished; but, up to the present moment, the American Companies had done nothing. He held in his hand an extract from The Chicago Journal, a Western live-stock journal, of the 5th of July, the last month in which this statement appeared—

Mr. Mundella

"In the meantime, traffic between the infected and non-infected districts will go on without let or hindrance, and the vast herds of the great breeding and feeding regions of the West may at any time be invaded by the dreadful scourge of virulently-contagious pleuro-pneumonia; and when it shall have broken out in the regions tributary to Chicago, St. Louis, Kansas City, and Council Bluffs, entailing millions of loss annually on the great West, when our sage Congressmen will, probably, awake to the fact that something ought to be done, and then it will, probably, be too late. It is barely possible that a vote may be reached upon the Bill agreed upon in Committee before the present Congress adjourns; but, from the present outlook, such an event is not probable; and even if the friends of the measure should succeed in bringing it to a vote in the House, it would almost certainly fail in the Senate for want of time. The outlook is decidedly unfavourable, and the great stock-growing regions of the West appear to be doomed to two more years of imminent peril."

The agriculturists of America complained bitterly that the Senate had gone home without having legislated in the direction of preventing disease. Then, how could they, with the law passed in 1878 before their eyes, with its requirements which were pretty distinct, and which appeared to him to be essentially necessary, say, with his hon. Friend the Member for Salford, that the stock-producing States of America were free from disease, and that it was desirable for the Government to consider the existing restrictions with a view to their modification or removal? The restrictions would be removed if, at any time, the Privy Council were satisfied that the measure taken for preventing the introduction and spread of disease and the general sanitary condition of the animals afforded reasonable security that disease was stamped out; but, in the face of the facts he had stated, and if time would only permit, he could have entered into the question at much greater length. How could they do that? They had come to the conclusion that it was impossible, with any regard to the safety of our own cattle, and with any regard to the interests of the consumers, to admit under fewer restrictions than at present the importation of American cattle. He knew that the Lord President of the Council had written a letter both to the Colonial Office and the Foreign Office, drawing the attention of the Canadians and the Americans to the condition of American cattle, and Secretary Evans had proposed to Canada that the Western cattle should be allowed to pass through Canada by way of Detroit, in the direction intimated by the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay). But he wished hon. Members to bear this in mind. It was said that all the cargoes we had from America were from the West, and yet they had plenty of disease in those cargoes. Therefore, the effect of sending these cattle through the Eastern States would simply be to spread disease. There was certainly no evidence to show that there was no disease in the West. The evidence established this fact, that wherever the cattle had been carefully examined disease had been found to exist in the cattle of the Eastern States. They had not yet so carefully examined the cattle from the West, because there had not been the same necessity for it. But if they were to travel through Canada, he presumed that Canada, for her own security, would have a thorough examination. The Lord President had written a letter to the Colonial Office, requesting Lord Kimberley to impress on the Canadian Government the necessity of urging the Government at Washington to enforce regulations for the whole of the United States so as to prevent the spread of disease, either by means of the transportation of animals, or otherwise. It was only by the adoption of some such measure that he believed the disease now existing in the United States could be eradicated. A copy of the letter of the Lord President had been sent to the Foreign Office; and he thought that having done that, and having represented the position fully to the American Government, this Government had done all they possibly could. In the interests of their own cattle, and in the interests of their own trade, it was desirable that the Government of the United States should pass stringent regulations and put them into practical operation. He only desired to say one word more. If we were at that moment to repeal our rules with respect to the admission of American cattle, it would be a very bad thing for ourselves and for America; because the American people, who were urging upon the American Government the duty of doing everything to stamp out disease in the States, would find their hands weakened. The Government would continue the course they had marked out for themselves, and he hoped they would do that with continued and increased success.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE wished to express the great satisfaction with which they had listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mundella), not only because they considered the arguments he had used were extremely valuable, but also because the testimony he had borne as to the value of the Act passed by the late Government was extremely important, coming, as that testimony did, from the Vice President of the Council. The Act passed by the late Government was not at all intended to be of a protective character; but it was passed for the sole and separate object of endeavouring to protect the flocks and herds of this country from disease. There had, no doubt, been great misunderstanding and misrepresentation respecting that Act in some of the constituencies and large towns of the Kingdom. He rejoiced, however, to think that, after the remarks he had just listened to, the Act would be judged by its own merits, and he thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the very able and convincing speech he had made.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, they had received a very grave piece of news from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mundella). In speaking of the outbreak of "Texan fever" in America, he told them that it was very virulent, even more so than the rinderpest itself. What they had a right to ask was this, and he did not think they would ask in vain, because, after listening to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, he could come to no other conclusion than that he was thoroughly alive to the great necessity of stamping out disease at home and keeping us free from the infection of disease from abroad. What they had a right to ask was that more than ordinary precautions would be taken to prevent the spread of disease. It was not the stoppage of merely one vessel every now and then that was wanted; but far greater care and watchfulness would be required. The entire prohibition of entry might be required in order to prevent the disease finding its way into England. They were justified in calling particular attention to this point, and requiring that the Department to whom was intrusted the duty of attending to these matters would perform their duty with the utmost vigilance. It was to him a matter of great satisfaction to hear the praise that was passed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mundella) upon the Act of 1878. He had a most lively recollection of the debates in the House during the passage of that Bill. He remembered the opposition which the Bill met with from the Party now in power; and he recollected, too, how the present Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster) regarded the Bill with gloomy forebodings, and now he prophesied evil as the result of the restrictions. How he spoke of the restrictions as a sham, and how he maintained that the attempt to keep disease out of the country would lead to restrictive trade. Now they were told that, so far from the restrictions being a sham, they had been eminently successful. Foot-and-mouth disease was a thing of the past; pleuro-pneumonia, and other diseases were kept so under control, that there was every hope that shortly they might be entirely extinct. It was very satisfactory for those who fought the Bill day after day, and night after night, and only managed to pass it at the end of the Session, to know that now the most unqualified praise and approbation was given to the Bill by the Vice President of the Council. It was satisfactory to them to know that, as the Bill eventually passed through the House, it had achieved all the successes they expected it would. The Bill was brought in, not with the view, as was stated by some hon. Gentlemen, of affording protection to the British farmer, but with a view of protecting the interests of the community at large, and procuring for the people that which they wanted—good and sound meat. There was another point to which he wished to draw attention, and that was as to our right, in our own defence, of maintaining what restrictions we chose for keeping out disease. What did America do? Why, America itself absolutely prohibited the introduction of stock from the Dominion of Canada, and subsequently established a quarantine of 90 days. If America, so alive to her interests, was ready, in defence of her stock, to impose such stringent restrictions, we, in England, had a right to do as much for ourselves. What had been done by the late Government had been well done; and, at present, the country was freer from disease than it had been for a great many years. It ought to be borne in mind that the existing restrictions were very onerous and very severe on the farmers; but they submitted to them cheerfully, because they knew that law, as now existing, would secure them from the importation of fresh disease.

Mr. Mundella

But let the law be altered; let them legislate in the spirit of the hon. Member for Salford, and permit the importation of diseased stock, and they would find it impossible to maintain the home restrictions. That debate had been of great value; it had been of great value, because it had shown how absolutely hopeless it was for the hon. Member (Mr. Arthur Arnold) to attempt to get anybody to follow him into the Lobby. The opinions of the hon. Member had been entirely demolished by the practical sound sense which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council. The right hon. Gentleman had cut the ground completely away from the hon. Gentleman's feet. However, the hon. Gentleman had occupied their time; he had flogged the horse in vain; but they thanked him for the action he had taken, because they had been shown that Her Majesty's Government were ready to carry out the Act of 1878 in its entirety. They believed that, rightly administered, the Act would secure the country against disease. He was glad to find it was being so administered, and he hoped that the Vice President of the Council would take special care with regard to the particular disease of which he had spoken.

MR. W. E. FORSTER thought it requisite that he should make some slight allusion to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote) and the hon. Gentleman (Mr. R. H. Paget). His right hon. Friend (Mr. Mundella) had made a most convincing statement, and, in the course of his speech, he alluded to the Act of 1878. Leaving the question as to what must be done, the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote) took advantage of the opportunity of enlarging upon the benefits of the Act of 1878. He (Mr. Forster) did not know that, generally speaking, it was very interesting to the public to make this kind of reference to past Acts. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. R. H. Paget) had, in a good-humoured way, taunted him (Mr. Forster), because, during the passing of the Act of 1878, he had something to do with the criticism of it. But the Act which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mundella) had administered, and which they considered to be an advantage, was the Act as finally passed.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, he particularly took care to speak of the Act as amended in Committee.

MR. W. E. FORSTER continuing, observed, that the hon. Gentleman gave on credit to the then Opposition for the amending of the Bill. They never opposed the Bill on the ground that it would prevent the importation of disease, but they opposed it because they considered that if it was passed in the form in which it was brought in it would have been a protective Act. As it was finally passed, it was an Act for the purpose of preventing the importation of disease; and if the hon. Member (Mr. R. H. Paget) cared to refer back, as he seemed so interested in past discussions, he would find that instead of gloomy prophecies of evil, he (Mr. Forster) expressed himself satisfied with the way it had been amended, and the part he and his Friends had played in that Amendment, and prophesied that good results would follow. He, therefore, did not think that the right hon. Gentleman's (Sir Stafford Northcote's) allusions to that Act would be very interesting to the public. They all admitted that it was very desirable to have as many restrictions as were necessary to prevent the importation of disease; but no more. He also admitted that the result of the discussions in 1878 was to demonstrate the formidable character of pleuro-pneumonia, and the necessity of legislative action with regard to that disease. It was quite clear that pleuro-pneumonia did exist in the United States to a very considerable extent, and that there could not be free importation without great danger of infection. His right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council (Mr. Mundella) told them how glad he would be if negotiations could be entered into with the United States for the isolation of that part of the country in which disease prevailed, so that they would be able to receive cattle from the healthy places. He (Mr. Forster) feared, from the right hon. Gentleman's statement, that it would be very difficult to obtain that result, because it seemed that the disease must come from the stock-producing districts. He hoped the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) would not proceed to a division, because it appeared quite impossible to alter the restrictions at the present moment without danger of introducing the disease.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD desired to state, in reference to the telegram which had been read to the House by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mundella) that on page 85 of the Blue Book presented that morning, it was declared, on high authority, that, strictly speaking, Texan fever was not contagious.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 194; Noes 20: Majority 174.—(Div. List, No. 97.)

Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he did not intend to pursue his Notice with regard to Afghanistan, after the special appeal the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India (the Marquess of Hartington) had made to him on the preceding day; but he wished to ask the noble Marquess if he would be so good as to fix a day for the discussion of the question of our relations with Afghanistan? He would remind the noble Marquess that, since the statement he had made yesterday, very grave news indeed had reached the country—news with regard to the withdrawal of our troops from Cabul. He would not refer to that, farther than to say that it was a step which might be extremely disastrous not only to our Army in Afghanistan, but to our general relations with India. He thought that, under those circumstances, the Government should give the House an opportunity of expressing its views on the subject. A discussion would be to the interest of the public, and would strengthen the hands of the Government.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that, as he had stated the other day, our relations with Afghanistan were critical, and the negotiations were not completed. Under those circumstances, a discussion on the affairs of Afghanistan would be inconvenient to the Public Service at that moment. No doubt, before the end of the Session, the hon. Member might be able to find an opportunity of raising the question. He could not, however, say that within a short time a discussion on the affairs of Afghanistan would be desirable.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee upon Monday next.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY (re-committed)
BILL—[BILL 209.](Mr. Dodson, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Brassey.)COMMITTEE. [Progress 6th August.]

Order for Committee read.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that, as far as he had been able to ascertain, it would be a convenience to a large number of hon. Members interested in the progress of this Bill, if the consideration of the remainder of the clauses were taken to-morrow at 12 o'clock. As far as he had been able to ascertain, that course would give general satisfaction. He would, therefore, ask the House to allow him to put down the Bill for to-morrow.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the House will, To-morrow, resolve itself into the said Committee."—
(The Marquess of Hartington.)

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the proposal of the noble Marquess was a very novel one, and one which the House, however anxious they might be to give facilities for proceeding with the Bill, ought to consider very seriously. The proposal made on the previous day, that they should take a Sitting on Saturday, was one to which he, personally, gave his consent, on the understanding that the Business to be taken was what he had described as Business of a "non-contentious character, and he made that proposal on the understanding that they should have given to them, on Monday, a full statement of what the proposals of the Government were with regard to the Business for the remainder of the Session. Now, it had not been usual—during the whole of the last Parliament, he thought, there had been no instance of it—for the Government to take for their own Business Saturday Sitzings, except in one or two instances where it was necessary for the purpose of passing a particular measure on a particular day, or at a period of the Session when they had already arrived within sight of the end of the Session, and a statement had been made as to the measures it was intended to proceed with and those it was not intended to press. At the present moment, they had a large number of measures on the Paper. It was quite obvious that if all those measures were to be proceeded with, the Session must last for a very considerable time, and it was hard upon hon. Members that they should be called upon to sit six days in the week for the Government, with only the relief of an occasional count-out on Friday evenings when private Members brought forward their Business. With regard to To-morrow, as he had stated, it would not be unfair, under the circumstances, for the House to meet for the purpose of taking the Bills the Government had mentioned, and for which hon. Members were prepared—for instance, the Post Office Money Orders Bill, the Merchant Shipping Bill, and the Education Bill. He should not have been indisposed to proceed now—if it had been thought desirable—with the Employers' Liability Bill, because hon. Members knew it was on the Paper. It might be gone on with, and finished if hon. Members chose to sit late. Many of them made arrangements to go out of town on Saturdays; and many, no doubt, not having expected the Bill to come on, would be obliged to go away that day. It was hardly reasonable for the House to be asked to take a measure of this kind on Saturday. He did not imagine that a Bill of that kind could be got through on Saturday. [Cries of "Yes, yes!"] That he did not know; but he would suggest that it would be more convenient to proceed with it now.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that if the House was disposed to agree to the proposal of his right hon. Friend it would materially alter the state of the case. He did not know whether hon. Gentlemen were prepared to enter into discussion of the remaining clauses at that hour; but if it was the view of the House he should readily assent to it. He might, under other circumstances, have had an observation or two to make with regard to what had fallen from his right hon. Friend with reference to the practice of Governments as to Saturday Sitzings; but, at present, it did not seem necessary.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL believed that, as far as his hon. Friends around him were concerned, if the noble Marquess decided to go on with the Employers' Liability Bill, no opposition whatever would be offered; on the contrary, he believed the House would be prepared to proceed with the measure.

There never had been but one desire on that side of the House, and that was that the measure should be passed into law as soon as possible. Were they to understand that if the Employers' Liability Bill was taken now, and the Committee stage disposed of, the Government would not think it necessary to call on the House to sit at 12 that day? If the noble Marquess proposed to meet at 12, he (Lord Randolph Churchill) and his Friends would have some observations to make about it.

MR. RYLANDS ventured to suggest to the noble Marquess that it would be very much to the convenience of a large number of Members if the course suggested by the Government were persisted in. It seemed to him that to attempt, after 1 o'clock in the morning, to go into the remaining clauses of the Bill would be an extremely inconvenient course. He would remind the Government that it was not expected, and a number of hon. Members who were interested in the Bill might be away. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) had raised this difficulty in a most unreasonable manner. If they attempted to deal with the Bill that night they would certainly fail to get it through. As he understood it, the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill), who, as an individual, took upon himself to represent that part of the House in which he sat, intended to resist the putting down of any other Business for Saturday if the Employers' Liability Bill were taken now. If the Bill, then, were now gone on with, they might find themselves in the position that, having started on it, they were unable to finish it, and were obliged to report Progress at 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning, and when the Government proposed to put it down for the Saturday Sitting, or to put down any other Business, they would then probably meet with the persistent opposition of the noble Lord and his Friends. The result would be that a considerable amount of time would be wasted in an unseemly dispute as to the despatch of Business. If the noble Marquess would challenge the opinion of the House—as he hoped he would—with regard to the Business for the morning, he believed it would be shown that there were a large majority in favour of the course proposed by the noble Marquess.

Lord Randolph Churchill

MR. A. J. BALFOUR felt certain that if the noble Marquess could get hon. Members on his own side of the House to assist him in going on with the Bill, no Motion from that (the Conservative) side would be made for adjournment, so far as he could judge from the feeling of the House. Every assistance would be given to the Government; but they must understand, if they agreed to sit up until 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning, discussing the Employers' Liability Bill, they were not to be asked to meet again at 12 to discuss it once more.

MR. J. W. PEASE hoped the noble Marquess would take the offer which had come from the other side of the House, and that they would now go on with the Employers' Liability Bill. If they made such progress as they were making up to 7 o'clock, they would probably get through in a short time. The clauses that were left were not, except one, of serious importance, and they would not require very long discussion. Therefore, he trusted the noble Lord would go on with the Bill.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Let us have it distinctly from him.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that if the House would take up the consideration of the Bill, and go on with it for an hour or two, he would not ask them to meet in the morning.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 7 (Short title).

MR. J. W. PEASE said, the clause gave the Bill a different title to that which it had been known all through the discussion, and he was afraid that would lead to confusion. Hon. Members constituents who had known the measure all through as the "Employers' Liability Bill" were unacquainted with "Workman's Compensation Act."

MR. DODSON said, the suggestion was a good one; therefore, he would move in page 3, line 32, to leave out the words "Workman's Compensation," and insert "Employers' Liability."

Amendment agreed to; words substituted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

MR. DODSON rose to move, in accordance with a promise he had given to an hon. Member, the following new Clause:—

(Money payable under penalty to be deducted from compensation under Act.)

"There shall be deducted from any compensation awarded to any workman, or representatives of a workman, or persons claiming by, under, or through a workman in respect of any cause of action arising under this Act, any penalty or part of a penalty which may have been paid in pursuance of any other Act of Parliament to such workman, representatives, or persons in respect of the same cause of action; and where an action has been brought under this Act by any workman, or the representatives of any workman, or any persons claiming by, under, or through such workman, for compensation in respect of any cause of action arising under this Act, and payment has not previously been made of any penalty or part of a penalty under any other Act of Parliament in respect of the same cause of action, such workman, representatives, or person shall not be entitled thereafter to receive any penalty or part of a penalty under any other Act of Parliament in respect of the same cause of action."

The object of the clause, in simple words, was this—Under the Mines Regulation Act and the Factory Acts workmen, in certain cases of accident, were entitled to receive compensation out of the penalties inflicted on the employers, and it was necessary to provide that workmen should not obtain compensation under one or other of those Acts and the present measure as well. If compensation were given under one Act, by this clause it could not be obtained under one of the others.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that on behalf of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for West Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill), he had to state that in consequence of what had fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General—namely, that the clause relating to Railway Companies would probably be amended, and certainly would be brought up on Report, his hon. and learned Friend would not take up the time of the Committee with his Amendment now, but would wait and see what was the proposition of the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. S. Morley) and the Government suggestions in the matter, and postpone any action he might wish to take on the subject until Report, reserving full right to raise the question at that time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) (for the hon. and learned Member for West Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill)), moved, in page 3, after Clause 6, to insert the following Clause:—

(7.) "This Act shall not come into operation until the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one, which date is in this Act referred to as the commencement of this Act."

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. GORST (for the hon. Member for Greenwich (Baron Henry de Worms)), moved in page 3, after Clause 6, to insert the following Clause:—

(Act to extend to workmen in Royal Arsenal at Woolwich and in Her Majesty's dockyards and victualling yards.)

"Subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, this Act shall apply to every workman not being a member of Her Majesty's regular Forces within the meaning of 'The Army Discipline and Regulation Act, 1879,' not being in or belonging to Her Majesty's Navy, and borne on the books of any one of Her Majesty's ships in commission, nor being a person serving in an established capacity in the permanent Civil Service of the State, employed in the Royal Arsenal at Woolwich, or in any of Her Majesty's dockyards or victualling yards, or under any Department of the State; and such workman, or, in case the injury results in death, the legal personal representatives of such workman, and in Scotland, any person entitled in case of death shall have all and the same remedies and rights of compensation as are by this Act given to and conferred upon workmen in the employment of private persons, and such remedies and rights may be enforced by action brought against the Commissioners of the Treasury, and the said Commissioners shall pay any amount so recovered, and the costs and charges of the proceedings in which such amounts are recovered, out of the moneys voted by Parliament to defray the ordinary costs and charges of the Departments in which such workman shall have been employed."

The hon. and learned Member said, he had not moved the clause in the form in which Notice was given, because in that form it could not be put from the Chair. Of course, he was quite aware that, in its present shape, the clause was inoperative; but it was the only shape in which a private Member could propose it. Workmen employed in the Government Establishments were on the same footing with those employed by the great Railway Companies or other large employers of labour; and that being so, he could not see why the Admiralty and the War Office should not be liable to pay the same compensation in cases of accident as persons carrying on other great industrial undertakings. He need hardly say that in the dangerous employments in Dockyards accidents were extremely frequent. Loss of fingers or hands, and mutilation in various ways, were very common; and he was sorry to say deaths from accidents in the Yard were by no means uncommon. In cases of mutilation, or loss of life, at the present time, neither the persons injured, nor the representatives of the person killed, had any legal claim against the War Office or the Admiralty; but both the War Office and the Admiralty were accustomed to make grants of what were called "compassionate allowances." He could appeal to his right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) to say whether the granting of that compassionate allowance was not a matter of considerable difficulty and embarrassment. The First Lord had to fulfil the function of Judge, and determine whether the accident was caused by the man's own fault or not. They had to assess the amount of injury sustained, and it was impossible to give satisfaction to the persons injured, or the representatives of the person killed. It would be much better to have the matter settled by a judicial officer. The grants would be dispensed with more equity and more satisfaction, both to the Government and to the persons interested. The person injured could not complain of the stinginess or hard-heartedness of the Government in the matter. The Government would pay what was legally due, neither more or less. No person would be able to complain that the amount was too little, or that his claim had not been fairly considered. The object of the clause was to put the Government workmen on the same footing with others in similar employment not under Government, and he could not see how Her Majesty's Government could make objection to the clause. They had imposed by their Bill certain legal liabilities upon Railway Companies and other employers of labour, and they could not very consistently refuse in their own case that which they considered fair in the case of other employers of labour.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must call the attention of the Committee to the circumstances of this clause. The clause has been altered since the morning, and altered in a way, I have no doubt, which the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) believes removes some of the objections to its being put to the Committee. The difficulty I pointed out to the hon. Gentleman who consulted me was that the Motion was in a form in which it could not be brought before the Committee. The reasons were twofold. In the first place, the Committee has not the power to deal with any right of the Crown without the sanction of the Crown being intimated by a responsible Minister of the Crown. The clause on the Paper this morning was a direct charge on public taxation. That also could not be moved by an independent Member. So far as I can judge of the new form of the clause, the original objection remains. The rights of the Crown would still be infringed by the new clause. Under those circumstances, I do not think the Committee has power to discuss or to vote on the clause. Apart from the question of whether it is competent for this Committee to impose on public taxation the charges for any results of actions brought in these cases, after consultation with the Law Officers of the House, I do not consider the Committee can consider the clause in the present form, unless moved by a responsible Minister of the Crown.

Mr. Gorst

MR. W. H. SMITH hoped the Government would take the clause into consideration. It would be utterly impossible to maintain a distinction between workmen employed in the Dockyards and those under private firms. He was convinced also there would be great advantage in having the compensation awarded on some settled basis such as that suggested. There was no doubt whatever that accidents must arise in the conduct of very large works such as had been described. The mode in which these cases had been met was to make a grant from time to time for compensation, and those grants had been given very liberally by the Treasury; but that was not compensation by right. He could not see how the distinction could be maintained between the position of large bodies of men engaged in the Dockyards and other bodies of men engaged in the same work carried on by contract outside the Dockyards.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF, as representing a borough containing one of the largest Dockyards, claimed to say a few words in support of the clause. Within the last few months, he had had his attention drawn to a case of injury sustained by a man at Portsmouth Dockyard in the course of his business, so that he was unable to work. Although such cases were met by an allowance for compensation, still it was always a matter of doubt and uncertainty as to the amount, and of great delay before it was received. He did not make that a ground of complaint against the Government; but there would be cause of complaint if the existing distinction was still kept up. Although the clause could not be formally put, he hoped the Government would not take advantage of that; but, on Report, would bring up a clause to carry out the object his hon. and learned Friend had in view. It would only be an act of justice to the workmen employed in the Dockyards.

MR. DODSON said, he was not surprised at the anxiety expressed upon this matter by hon. Members who were connected with the Dockyards. It was only laudable and very proper that they should study the interests of those whom they represented. But he must remind the Committee, and he must also remind his right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), that the clause only dealt with Established men, and not with men who were not on the Establishment; and, with regard to the men on the Establishment, he did not think they would feel inclined to exchange the position they at present occupied in order that they might be brought under the operation of the Bill. He did not speak without some knowledge of that subject. He believed that it had fallen to his lot to be the author of the Treasury Minute which settled the distinctions between Established and non-Established men; and he was not prepared to say now, even in the interests of non-Established men, that it would be to their advantage that their condition should be changed to the position of workmen under the Bill. He was certainly not prepared to enter into any undertaking on the part of the Government that anything would be done by the present Bill to change their position. If any alteration were to be made at all, it could only be after a careful inquiry, and he could hold out no undertaking that any attempt would be made in the present Bill to deal with the matter.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must really point out to the Committee that this is a most irregular discussion.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he was not desirous of continuing the discussion, but wished in a few words to offer a suggestion—namely, that it should be made competent for his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gorst) to bring up the Amendment on the third reading. At present, it was impossible to move it, because the Royal Prerogative was concerned; but, if the Bill were re-committed at a subsequent stage, the discussion might be raised, and he apprehended that that was a course which the Government would not object to.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. J. W. PEASE moved the following Clause:—

(Provision regarding mutual assurance societies or funds on behalf of workmen.)

“An action for the recovery under this Act for compensation for an injury shall not be maintained against any employer who shall have contributed to a mutual assurance society or fund on behalf of any workman so injured, and otherwise entitled to compensation: Provided, That the conditions of insurance and the rules of the mutual assurance society or fund have been certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies for the time being.

Previously to such certificate being granted, the said Registrar shall satisfy himself—

That the employer has agreed to pay at least thirty per centum of the insurance premium;

That the scheme of assurance submitted to him has been approved by an actuary of standing;

That there is a reasonable probability that the sum to be paid in case of death or injury by such assurance society or fund will in the aggregate be fully equal to the sum which would be payable as compensation under this Act:

Provided always, That should the amount or periodical payments, as the case may be, insured by such society or fund not be paid in accordance with the rules so certified by the Secretary of State, the workman so injured may maintain an action for compensation under this Act.”

The hon. Member said, he was afraid that he should have to ask for the indulgence of the Committee even at that late hour—half-past 1 o'clock—as the subject with which the clause dealt was the very important one of insurance. He wished to amend the clause as it stood in his name on the Paper. The last line but one said—“rules so certified by the Secretary of State.” It should read—“said Registrar” instead of “Secretary of State;” and in regard to another portion of the clause after the words—“approved by an actuary of standing," he desired to insert the words—"in accordance with Clause 11, s. 5, 38 & 39 Vict. c. 60" (the Friendly Societies Act). That clause was one which directed that when annuities were paid by Friendly Societies the tables should be approved by an actuary appointed by the Treasury, or by an actuary employed by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt. He desired to take the question of insurance a little out of the groove they had been following in the course of the discussion of the Bill. It appeared to him that they had been confining the discussion far too much to the employer and the employed. They should say not what was good for the employer, or what was good for the employed, but what was good for both, and good for the country generally. An attempt had been previously made to raise the question as long ago as 1847 by the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair, in a Report in which it was suggested that a tax of $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per ton should be levied upon the coal owners for an insurance, provident, and an education tax. The hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Craig) said that the amount of an employer's liability might be met by a liability of £283 in respect of every 1,000 men. The hon. Member was wrong in his calculations, because he (Mr. Pease) found that, in Northumberland, the liability would be £690 per annum for every 1,000 men, to make an available fund for insurance; and in Lancashire and Cheshire, £920 per annum for every 1,000 men, so that it was not a light task that insurance would involve. The great object was not to provide for those accidents which were occasioned by the negligence of the vice-master as he was called, but to provide for all accidents that might happen to those unfortunate men who were killed or injured in dangerous employments, or in connection with the manufactures of the country. In looking through the last reports of the Registrar General, he found there were something like 13,000 men killed annually in connection with the various industries of the Kingdom. There were about 1,077 on railways; 998 in coal mines; 78 in metallic mines; 4,797 in mechanical industries; 1,741 in chemical works; 4,540 by asphyxia—not miners or on railways—and 435 by violence. These were very large figures; but he did not think they were figures which could not be dealt with by the steady progress of insurance principles. The Bill provided compensation for those who were injured, and also for the representatives of those who were killed by the negligence of others; but it was replete with law from one end to the other. They had, for instance, to discuss who was the vice-master. That was a legal question. They had to discuss question after question in which legal points were involved; and what he feared was, that when they came to decide what were cases of negligence and to consider the legal bearings of the numerous questions, so much of what ought to go to the working-man would be eaten up by law that the provision made for him by the Bill would be found to be nearly worthless. If they abolished the law of common employment, they would still only provide for a small proportion of cases. What was wanted most in this country was to provide for the whole of the accidents, and the largest proportion of injuries and deaths were not provided for by this law, nor would they be provided for by any contemplated change of the law. To show how the legal actions might run, he would mention a few facts which he had obtained. He had a list of 111 men killed in succession on one of the largest railways, and in nearly every case it would be held that there was contributory negligence. The list included a man left repairing an engine by himself; a guard riding on the brake and crushed between the waggons and the platform of a goods warehouse; a platelayer who stepped in front of a train; a goods guard who fell and was run over; a fireman who fell from the engine; and a signalman killed by an express train on leaving his cabin to cross a line. In these cases the accidents resulted in death; but they afforded good examples of other cases which were not followed by death. Insurance would provide for all accidents, and a small payment from each individual would provide a fair amount of compensation for the whole of the workmen injured, and the representatives of those killed while engaged in these dangerous occupations. The insurance system had taken very great hold in the coal trade and also upon the large railways. In a paper which had been circulated, it was stated that there were already 117,000 men in the coal trade who were insured, and the insurance system was now maintaining 728 widows and 1,443 children, in addition to 19,894 cases of disablement. In these cases the recipients of the relief were, by the exertions of the men themselves, entirely kept from the poor-house. He was, therefore, anxious that by the Bill everything that was possible should be done to foster habits of providence among the men and relieve the rates, and provide for all. In this system of insurance the men had been assisted by the employers, who had contributed towards the insurance funds last year a sum amounting to between £7,000 and £8,000. In the Northumberland and Durham district alone, £5,000 was contributed in this way by the employers. That was certainly a greater expense to the master than would be thrown upon him by the present Bill. His own view was, that what was stated by his hon. Friend the Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian) was under the truth, and that a very small portion of workmen would come under the Bill. The measure would, consequently, prove a great disappointment to the working classes, when they found that the doctrine of contributory negligence would come between them and the benefits they imagined conferred by the Bill. There was a great probability that the Bill, when passed, would work against the provident societies. The men would naturally say that the law had already made provision for them. They would say—"The law will take care of me. I come under Mr. Dodson's Act, and I shall be taken care of." He was still more apprehensive that there would be an inducement to the employer to step back from the insurance office, and say—"I will no longer go on subscribing to these funds which cost me more than I should have to pay for the accidents that actually arise, and for which I have become responsible under this new legislation." He had no wish to unnecessarily detain the Committee; but he would not like to close his observations without referring to the recent colliery explosion at Risca. If an explosion of the same character had taken place in Northumberland, or Durham, or Lancashire, or Cheshire, the whole of those injured, or the relatives of those killed would have been provided for; they would have come upon their insurance fund, instead of going to the Mansion House or the mayor of the locality, as had been the case in Wales. According to the scale of the insurance societies, the explosion at Risca would have cost between £14,000 and £15,000. That sum would provide 5s. per week for each widow, who would receive it, on an average, for 10 years; 2s. per week for each child for six years; and £5 for the funeral expenses of those who were killed. If accidents such as that at Risca were to come within the scope of the present Bill, there immediately came the question, were the men killed through the negligence of the master, or were they guilty by their own contributive negligence? If there was contributive negligence on the part of the men, the Bill left them perfectly unprovided for; but if there was a doubt about it, there would, in all probability, be a law suit for, say, the sum of £15,000. The result of the action might beggar a poor colliery proprietor; and supposing the men gained the day, it would be found that when the £15,000 came to be divided between lawyers and clients, the lawyers would get by far the larger share of it; but if the master won, the widows were unprovided for. It was most desirable that this system of insurance should be carried out to the greatest possible extent. He would like to provide that the sum paid to a man for injury through the insurance fund would be equal to that which he could possibly derive under this Bill, and that insurance should be a bar to action. He thought he was right in saying that under Lord Campbell's Act, insurance was practically a bar to action under certain circumstances. [Sir HENRY JACKSON: No, no!] The hon. and learned Member for Coventry said "No, no!" Whether that was so or not, he (Mr. J. W. Pease) was afraid that if they did away with insurance, they would flood their workhouses. He would be told that the Bill did not prevent any man insuring, and that his plan was totally voluntary. Every plan of insurance, if successful, would necessarily have to be voluntary; but by far the best plan would be one which would be a bar to action. He thought he had devised that bar in the scheme which he had laid before the Committee. It was true that a workman might contract himself out of the Act, and that he might do that without insurance, or by entering an insurance club which was not registered. He (Mr. J. W. Pease) provided that insurance was not to be a bar to action, unless the club was registered. Looking through the Friendly Societies Act, he found it provided everything that was necessary in the way of reports, and investment of accounts, and so forth, so that any workman might be perfectly sure that he was subscribing or putting his money into an association out of which he would get proper and suitable relief when he needed it. He was afraid that if some such clause as his were not added to the Bill, if the Bill were allowed to go forward without a provision that insurance was to be a bar to action, it would, as he had already stated, do a great deal of harm to that which was now doing a great deal of good. If the Legislature in this case refused to acknowledge the principle of insurance in any way, the effect would be most disastrous. He would conclude by moving the new clause.

Mr. J. W. Pease

New Clause (Provision regarding mutual assurance societies or funds on behalf of workmen,)—(Mr. Pease,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. D. GRANT said, that anyone who had listened to the debates upon that question, must have been considerably impressed with the large amount of labour and thought that had been bestowed upon the question at issue. They had now approached a subject which, he believed, to be of the very greatest interest to the working classes. He would endeavour to show why it was so. If the Bill passed in its present form, it would simply have the effect of encouraging litigation in the fullest sense they could conceive. Anybody who knew what were the conditions which surrounded the ordinary life of the working man, must know that that would be so. The working man stood comparatively alone; whereas capital was powerful and could, in case of dispute, proceed from one Court to another, beating the working man by mere force of wealth. If the Bill they were now discussing was passed in its present form, the Committee would clearly see how utterly unfairly, in the great majority of cases, would the law operate, so far as the working classes were concerned. He was told that the Railway Companies intended, if the Bill became law, to separate themselves from the existing arrangements, by which they contributed largely towards the funds which they had now a direct object in maintaining for the relief of men who were injured in their employ. He was told that they intended to take their stand upon the point of law, and fight the case out to the bitter end. If such a course were to be adopted by all the leading companies and large employers of labour in the country, it was clear that the immediate effect of the Act would be to place the working man at a very great and serious disadvantage. A large proportion—in fact, the great bulk—of the working-class population of the country were not connected definitely with the industries which had been so frequently alluded to in the debates upon the Bill. In the Metropolis, for instance, there were 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 of people, but there was no distinct industry carried on by those people; there was no one industry which would give them reason to say, "This industry needs special legislation." And yet the great mass of the working classes in the Metropolis were as much entitled to legislation as those classes whose interests were so well and ably advocated by some hon. Gentlemen in that House. They were, therefore, entitled to ascertain whether a system of insurance would, or would not, work in the interest of the working men. He believed it would decidedly work in their favour. The hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt), whose judgment upon such matters was of the greatest value, owing to his association with one of the largest industries in the country, told them that the Bill would be quite useless, because the men themselves had already worked out a system of insurance. He (Mr. D. Grant) agreed that the masters ought to contribute towards the fund. He had heard masters in the House say that they objected to the system of insurance, because it would impose burdens upon them. He believed, on the contrary, that the system would be a means of bridging over those differences which existed between capital and labour. It would enable the men to become associated with the masters, and one could see how largely men would benefit from such association. Could they have any doubt that, at the present time, the wisest thing to do was to adopt a course that would bind capital and labour together? But, yet, the Bill would not do that. The first part of the measure would make war to the knife. The men would turn round and fight the masters, and the masters would turn round and fight the men. A principle of antagonism would be developed; and, therefore, he thought that the proposal now made should be accepted. The effect would be to improve and work out the principle of the measure, and the Bill, then, without doing injury to anyone, would do good to both sides.

Mr. J. W. Pease

Mr. BROADHURST said, he would ask the Government not to accede to that proposal. The matter had been discussed more than any other phase of the Bill; and numerous conferences had been held with regard to it—conferences at which all the recognized trades of the United Kingdom were represented, including the mining and railway interests and the iron and the textile trades. In every case they had had a numerous vote against any proposal to incorporate in the Bill a system of assurance, because it was absolutely foreign in every particular to the measure under debate. They, the workmen, had nothing whatever to say against insurance in the abstract; but they did say that it was not right or just for the employers to seek, by a system of mutual assurance between themselves and their workmen, to evade their just and proper liability for accidents occurring through their negligence or bad plant. The hon. Member for Durham (Mr. J. W. Pease) had gone into a very long and interesting and able statement of his case. Most hon. Members of the Committee, he was sure, were well posted up to the hon. Member's view of the question, for the employers had liberally supplied them with literature and figures—had given them these to an enormous extent—but he did not think they had proved their case or title to have assurance incorporated in the new Act. The hon. Member who proposed the clause made a great point of saying that the system of insurance would be a voluntary one. If it was to be a voluntary system, then, why should they ask for its incorporation in the Bill. They were at perfect liberty now to recognize the voluntary system of assurance; in fact, the hon. Member for South Durham had shown them that they had the power, and, not only that, but had actually put the power into practice—had shown it by quoting the great and good work which the societies in his own county, and in Northumberland and Lancashire, had done through this voluntary system of assurance. Now, no doubt, he would miss many important points; but he was especially anxious not to detain the Committee at that unreasonable hour in discussing uninteresting points and details. The hon. Member for Marylebone (Mr. D. Grant) had stated—as had been stated a hundred times in the course of this debate, although those statements, he (Mr. Broadhurst) contended, were altogether wide of the mark—that if the Bill were passed without a system of assurance there would be constant warfare between employer and workmen. He did not for a moment believe that the measure would promote anything at all of the kind; and had he any idea that it would do so, he should not be so strong an advocate of the measure as he was. The fact was, that very few of the accidents that occurred to the workmen in the course of their employment would come under the operation of this Bill at all. The Bill was so guarded in the interest of the employer that, if it was passed, the workman would have the greatest difficulty in establishing his claim to compensation. By far the largest number of accidents that occurred both on railways and in mines, and in all other industries, were accidents of a nature for which the workman had never yet asked Parliament to make employers liable. It was only in comparatively few cases that there was evident and gross neglect on the part of the management. It was not so much compensation that the men were asking for as that Parliament should pass a law to make employers liable for gross neglect, in order that they would be much more careful in the future in the conduct of their works than they had been in the past. His firm belief was that the result of the Bill would be to bring about much greater care and caution on the part of the employers than they hitherto exercised in their different sections of industry. He sincerely trusted that the Government would not agree to anything in the nature of the proposal of the hon. Member for South Durham. The hon. Member said it was to be a voluntary system of assurance; but he knew perfectly well, as all other hon. Members knew perfectly well, that they had now their voluntary system of assurance. That they could continue and develop as much as they liked. But if there was an assurance clause in that Act of Parliament when it was passed, the employer would go to the workman—he did not say that this would occur—but it would be in the power of the unscrupulous employers, of whom he knew there were none in the Committee, to take the Act and shake it in the face of their workmen and say, “Parliament has given you authority to establish a system of assurance.” And they could in that way terrorize over and intimidate the workmen into joining a society which might not be for their great and lasting benefit. He trusted the Committee would pardon him for having spoken so long. There were many phases of the question which he should have liked to have placed before the consideration of the Committee had the discussion taken place at some earlier hour of the day.

SIR WILLIAM PALLISER said, it seemed to him that hon. Members who advocated assurance as an alternative or modification of the Bill lost sight of the true object to be obtained by the measure. It seemed to him the object of the Bill was not to inflict fines or penalties upon employers of labour, nor even to fully indemnify workmen for injuries received. The true purpose of the Bill was to render it worth the while, from a pecuniary point of view, of the employer to take every possible precaution to prevent accidents from taking place. He believed the result of the measure would be to diminish accidents to a very remarkable extent. In a word, he would say that the Bill was a preventive; but that assurance, at the best, was but an indifferent palliative.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Knowles), who occupied a representative position on that question, was, unfortunately, not present; and the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Craig) had left the House, under the impression that the debate was not to come on; therefore, he trusted that this discussion would be raised again on Report. It could not be adequately considered now. The hon. Member who had just sat down had drawn attention to the fact that the Bill, as it stood, would leave a great number of accidents to which workmen were subject unprovided for. Well, the effect of the proposal of the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. J. W. Pease) would be to bring all those accidents under the provisions of the Bill; and he thought it must be admitted that if they could secure all the advantages promised by the Bill, and, at the same time, increase the area of those advantages without doing anything to frustrate that spirit of self-reliance which had already done so much for the workmen of this country, it would be well. The right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill had said, with reference to a recent proposal before the Committee, that he believed labourers in Her Majesty's Dockyards would be worse off than they were at present. He (Mr. Percy Wyndham) believed that would be the case with many workmen who were not in Her Majesty's Dockyards. Reference had been made, the other night, to the opinions of Mr. John Bryson—and he regretted that the hon. Member for Northamptonshire was not now in his place. That hon. Member had said that Mr. Bryson being correctly informed as to the purport of the Bill withdrew the opinions he had communicated. But conversations were very often misunderstood. Mr. Bryson had written his views in a long letter which he (Mr. Percy Wyndham) held in his hand. This gentleman feared that, under the Bill, workmen would lose the advantages they now possessed from the mutual co-operation between themselves and their employers when misfortune fell upon them. He did not wish to say anything that might seem like a slight on the employers; but he was stating the truth when he said that, at that moment, many of them were thoroughly frightened on this question. Here there was an opportunity of reassuring them. The principle of assurance was a most valuable one. Hon. Members looked on it as likely to be a panacea for all the evils the working classes suffered from, especially for the great evil of pauperism. But, without insisting on that question, which was foreign to the Bill, he still said that what was right in that direction would be right in this. It ought to be the endeavour of the Committee, instead of trying to frustrate the plan of those who were trying to benefit all parties, to inculcate in the minds of the working classes the principle of self-reliance; to seize that opportunity of advancing the principle, instead of putting a bar for ever to that which, after all, was the best thing the workman could look forward to for permanent and real help. Many of these accidents provided for in the Bill might be caused by the negligence of someone also employed, for whom the employer was not liable; but if a system of insurance was adopted, then they would provide for all accidents that might occur, from whatever cause. He hoped the Government would consent to the proposal. He knew that many hon. Members, before this Bill became a reality, and before there was any fear of it in their minds, were only too glad to be called on to pay 30 per cent, or even to meet their workmen half-way, in carrying out that principle. The hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) argued as if the two were not, as it were, engaged in the same employment; that it was only the workmen who suffered when an accident of this kind came. But it fell as heavily upon the employer, not in his person, but in his trade losses; and if that principle of compensation was carried too far, it would stop what ought to be the real panacea—that vast amount of public charity.

Mr. Broadhurst

MR. BURT joined with the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) in appealing to the Government not to accede to the proposal of his hon. Friend (Mr. J. W. Pease). He was very strongly in favour of insurance, and he knew how generously his hon. Friend the Member for South Durham had supported the Northumberland and Durham Miners' Relief Fund, which had done so much good, and which was a model for other mining districts to imitate. His hon. Friend had referred to the unfortunate explosion at Risca, and said that if a fund existed similar to that provided in the North of England, there would have been no necessity to make an appeal for assistance throughout the country. But he would remind his hon. Friend of a fact of which he was well aware, that the Northumberland and Durham Miners Provident Fund was a purely voluntary association, and the miners of South Wales had exactly the same opportunities of forming similar institutions for themselves. The hon. Gentleman who, a short time ago, addressed the Committee (Mr. D. Grant), in referring to a speech made by him (Mr. Burt) in Northumberland, had unintentionally, he was sure, somewhat misrepresented what he said. He did say that, so far as Northumberland was concerned, that Bill would not have any very great effect, and to that he would adhere; but that was entirely different from saying it would have no effect in other districts. In Northumberland they had accidents, unfortunately, but very few arose from negligence of officials or negligence of managers; therefore, uncommonly few cases would come under the operation of a Bill of that kind. Reference had been made by the hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham) to statements made by Mr. Bryson. He found Mr. Bryson frequently quoted in the House, and a great deal of pains was taken, and some money was expended also, in making Members of the House familiar with the views he entertained on the subject. Mr. Bryson was a very capable and intelligent man, and he (Mr. Burt) had no wish to detract from what he said; but he wanted what he said to be judged on its own merits. He was president of an association of which he (Mr. Burt) had been secretary for 15 years, and was so still. Mr. Bryson, in his speech, was not speaking for the Northumberland and Durham miners, but was simply expressing his own views. He (Mr. Burt) had presented a great number of Petitions from the miners of Northumberland and Durham in favour of the Bill; and at a meeting of from 40,000 to 50,000 miners of Durham, which he addressed a few days ago, resolutions were unanimously adopted in favour of this Bill and against the embodiment therein of this insurance clause. He thought that, so far as that went, it was a conclusive expression of opinion against the insertion of the clause.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS congratulated the Committee upon the different spirit with which the proposal was approached now from that with which it was received the first time. On that occasion the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. J. W. Pease) predicted the evil effect that would result to capital and labour from the adoption of the principle of the Bill at all. [Mr. J. W. PEASE explained that he had never said that.] He would accept the correction. But it was quite certain that he had never heard so much prediction in connection with a Bill as with this. So considerable had it been, that he honestly believed that if all the prophecies could be cut out, the debate would have been reduced to one-tenth of its present dimensions. However, he would not go into that, but simply refer, for a few moments, to the principle of the Bill. That principle was to reduce to a minimum the amount of preventible accidents; and the accidents which could be reduced by the operation of the Bill had nothing to do with those risks which ordinary insurance covered. It referred to accidents arising from inefficient control or direction; and most of the accidents from that cause were preventible. With regard to the very mine to which reference had been made—Risca—he was talking with a gentleman who, before going to India, was for some three years engineer in the district where the explosion occurred, and he expressed an opinion, from what he knew of the mine, that proper precautions would have prevented the accident. With regard to insurance, a homily had been read to the Committee as to the wisdom of encouraging prudential motives among the working classes. Nobody would commend that more willingly than himself; but it seemed to him that, by strictly defining the accidents which could be prevented, they developed still more the prudential element, because, by so doing, they guarded against those accidents for which the employer was, and should be, responsible. It was desirable to offer an encouragement to the efforts of the workmen themselves; but that those efforts should be made the policy of lessening the responsibility of the employer was an incongruity which he hoped the Government would not admit into the Bill.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY said, he was quite sure that the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. J. W. Pease) intended the clause to be fair to the workman. But, as he (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) interpreted it, it only contemplated insurance against accidents for which the employer would be liable under this Bill. The clause was less wide than that proposed by the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Knowles), who proposed that the workmen should be insured against accidents of every kind, and the employers' liability to the fund should be a third. But the clause of the hon. Member for South Durham would release the employer from all but 30 per cent of the cost of insurance against accidents coming under the operation of the Bill. As drawn, the clause seemed to him to apply only to insurances against risks arising from negligence, and so was not an adequate substitution for the liability under the Act.

MR. J. K. CROSS said, he was sorry to hear that, if the Bill passed, there was a possibility of the subscriptions of the employers being withdrawn from the insurance funds. If he thought so, as an employer himself, he should be heartily ashamed of the class to which he belonged. He believed that the Bill would simply secure to the workmen an advantage which he thought they ought to have. He had not heard before the statistics which had been placed before the Committee by the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. J. W. Pease); but, after listening to those statistics, he thought they were considering the matter too much from the colliery point of view. The accidents which occurred in collieries were only 1-12th of the total number of accidents. [An hon. MEMBER: Fatal accidents.] Yes, fatal accidents. The fatal accidents brought before the Committee related to a greater extent to mining operations than to any other kind of work. But what was to become of the 11,000 other people who were killed? Were they to have no chance of compensation, unless they entered some insurance society? It was stated that some 4,700 persons were killed in the course of a year in the various mechanical trades. Those trades were spread all over the Kingdom, and it would be difficult to induce the men to enter into insurance societies. If the Bill passed, and the employers generally were able to prove to the men that insurances would give them more than they could gain under the Bill, the workmen were not such fools that they would fail to see their own interest and advantage, and subscribe. Insurance, therefore, if the Bill passed, would not become the mere dead letter which some hon. Members seemed to think. A remark had been made as to what was likely to happen in the case of the Railway Companies. It was said that they would withdraw their subscriptions from accident funds if the Bill passed. He thought there was no foundation for the assumption, and, if such a thing did happen, the men would find it better to seek some other employment where they could obtain more protection. It certainly appeared to him that, under the Bill, the workpeople would not get more than their due, and he did not think it would be to the disadvantage of the employers to adopt it.

Mr. Thorold Rogers

An hon. MEMBER said, he had been a witness on more than one occasion of an accident in a coal mine, and he could bear his testimony to the value of the present system of insurance. Insurance furnished a fund which was immediately applicable in the event of an accident; whereas, if the Bill passed, the injured men or their representatives might have to wait an indefinite time before they got the benefit it proposed to confer upon them. In answer to a remark made by an hon. Gentleman opposite, he could assure him that the utmost care was taken by the masters in all the collieries he had seen to avoid accidents. When an accident did occur the fine upon the employer was much heavier than hon. Members had any idea of. He said that from personal knowledge, and it was a fact which he had had before him all through the discussion upon the Bill. If hon. Members had had the same personal acquaintance with working collieries that he had had, they would give them full credit, notwithstanding the fact that they had to work underground in comparative darkness, for being always anxious to prevent accidents. In the districts with which he was acquainted, insurance did not exist; and if, when accidents did happen, private benevolence did not step into the aid of the sufferers, it would be very bad indeed for them. He did not believe it would be so; but if the Bill passed, he sincerely trusted that it would not have the effect of checking the flow of public sympathy and benevolence. The calamity which had just occurred at Risca, would have pressed much more heavily upon the sufferers if it had not been for public benevolence. Speaking from personal knowledge, he felt bound to express his belief that in certain collieries in South Wales, under the best management, it was impossible to prevent occasional accidents. The men were far from heedless of themselves, or their lives; but blowers of gas came off without warning, and accidents occurred. The men were accused of being so reckless as to open their lamps for the purpose of lighting their pipes when there were blowers of gas about; but that was not the result of his experience. When an accident occurred, it involved a very serious loss to the employer; and he thought that all classes would be only too glad if the Government would do something in the way of encouraging the adoption of a system of insurance by the colliers generally.

SIR HENRY JACKSON thought the alteration in the name of the Bill was exceedingly significant. It was now called "The Employers' Liability Bill." It was originally to be a Workman's Compensation Bill, and the difference between the two names exactly expressed the difference with which it was regarded. A Workman's Compensation Bill meant a Bill to secure for those who suffered from accident compensation; whereas an Employers' Liability Bill seemed to be a Bill with penal consequences upon the employers, in the hope of making them more careful hereafter. It was a Bill to provide compensation for the sufferers by bringing legal pressure to bear upon the employers. With that candour which distinguished him, his hon. Friend the Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) said that he did not want the pressure unless it was sanctioned by the law. He supposed the Government would follow the course they had adopted all through, and not accede to the clause. The wording of the clause was not perfect; but the principle of it was perfectly fair and clear, it being that facilities should be given for making this new burden tolerable to the employers. It was due to the employers to guard them against the possibility of being ruined in a night. It was not very likely to happen that they would be ruined in a night; but no one could foresee what would take place. But would not one of the effects of the Bill be that private ownership would cease? And if they did not get, as was stated by the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr.

J. W. Pease), speculative young men commencing life, the best substitute they would get would be joint-stock companies, with their capital fully paid up, or with part of their capital taken out in debentures well secured. It really seemed to him that, as a matter of practical prudence, and in order to secure the benefit of the clause for those for whom it was designed, the insurance clause ought to be inserted in the Bill. He hoped that something had fallen from one speaker or another to induce the Government, at the last moment, to consent to let the clause be read a second time.

MR. DODSON said, they had had a very interesting discussion upon the question of insurance. Although there were no insurance clauses in the Bill, they had had, at intervals, while the Bill had been under consideration, references to the subject of insurance. Let him remind the Committee what were the proposals with which they started. They were, at first, told that what was greatly desired was a system of compulsory insurance; but now compulsory insurance was entirely lost sight of, for it was admitted that it was a very difficult matter to establish. Well, then, if compulsory insurance was necessarily abandoned, there remained the question of permissive or voluntary insurance. He could not see, at the beginning of this discussion, and he did not now see, why, for the purpose of permissive or voluntary insurance, any clause was required in the Bill. Surely it could be effected mutually between employer and employed. But, then, they had a proposal that there should be a clause introduced, providing that if the employer contributed not less than 80 per cent of the insurance fund, he should be exempted from the liability under this Bill; and they were told that unless some provision of that kind was made, insurance would cease, or, at all events, would very greatly diminish. Yet, at the same time, they were assured by many of those who made the statement, that the system of insurance was very widely popular. If that were so, he certainly could not see why insurance was to be abandoned, because the liability in respect to a certain class of accidents, which were admitted to form a very small proportion of the accidents occurring, was to be thrown on the employer. Let him put this point to those who said this Bill would put an end to insurance. Up to the present time, the employer had been liable to the full extent for accidents resulting from his own negligence. That liability had not prevented or discouraged insurance, and he had heard no argument which induced him to believe that an enlargement of liability would put an end to, or could be expected to diminish, insurance. Let him again ask, if it be admitted, as they must assume it was, to be just that an employer should be liable for the negligence of his superintendents, how could it be just to exempt him from that liability if he contributed a certain amount of the insurance fund? Liability was imposed upon the employer by the Factory Act and the Mines Regulation Act, and yet that liability had not checked insurance. They had been told by hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House that the workmen valued the liability which was imposed by the Bill upon employers, not merely in a monetary sense, but because of the safety which they thought it would secure to them by rendering the employer more careful. He trusted that the very sad views which the hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) held, as to the effect of the Bill, would not be realized. He (Mr. Dodson) saw nothing in the way of preventing employers in this country doing what employers did in foreign countries—namely, protecting themselves by a system of mutual insurance. On the whole, he would be exceedingly sorry if he thought the Bill which the Government had promoted, and hoped to pass, would cause any undue or unjust liability upon the employer. He would be exceedingly sorry if the effect of the Bill would be that which some hon. Gentlemen had imagined. And, in the third place, he would be exceedingly sorry if the Bill would have the effect of checking or discouraging that system of insurance which it was most desirable to encourage for the sake of the working classes of the country and for the sake of mutual good feeling between master and servant. He confessed he had not heard any argument, either that night or at any other time, upon the question of insurance to make him believe that that would be the effect; and believing that the principle of the Bill was just, and that there was no case made out for exempting the employer from his liability imposed upon him by this Bill, if he contributed 30 per cent or any other proportionate amount to the insurance fund, he was not prepared on the part of the Government to accept the Amendment.

Sir Henry Jackson

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he had listened with great attention to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodson), and to the address of the eminent coalowner (Mr. J. W. Pease), who had proposed the establishment of a system of insurance which worked so well under existing circumstances. What said the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodson)? Why, that nothing could be more advantageous than the system of insurance; but he would do nothing to assist the hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. W. Pease) in establishing the system. There would be, and there must be, insurance.

MR. COURTNEY said, that if they were to have a division upon the question, he would like to explain very briefly why he intended to vote with the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. J. W. Pease). As he understood the Bill, there was nothing in it to prevent any employer or labourer contracting himself out of it. It might, therefore, be made a condition in the rules of any mine, that the workmen should not be entitled to have recourse to the remedy of the Bill; and, of course, that might be made a part of any system of insurance connected with any colliery. It might be said that this showed it was quite unnecessary to put into the Bill any provision establishing the system of insurance; because, since the Bill gave perfect liberty of action both to employer and employed, a system of insurance could be devised by the employers, and they could make it a condition on the part of the workmen that they should come under the system and renounce the privileges of the Bill. He did not believe that that House or that Parliament would permit that. He understood it to be contended by the promoters of the Bill that it was essential, or, at all events, it was desirable, to impose upon the employers such a fine for injury to workmen as would make them careful, both in the choice of their agents and in the condition of their plant and machinery, and that it would be quite inconsistent with the principle of the Bill to allow owners to set aside the responsibility which the Bill said it was expedient they should be subjected to. He had come to the conclusion that, as the Bill now stood, the power of contracting out of the Bill could not be sustained, if attempted to be put in practice. Well, then, the matter of insurance under the Bill became a practical question, and the reason why it appeared to him that the system of insurance deserved support was that it embodied in it the principle of a proportionate contribution on the part of the owner. Of course, the amount of that contribution would be open to discussion; but the principle was a just one, and, if adopted, would secure precisely what the Bill proposed to secure—namely, a fine to be imposed upon owners, so as to make them doubly cautious in the choice of their agents and in the conduct of their works. By securing from the employers adequate contributions to the fund, they carried out the principle of the Bill. But they did more than this. They secured, by the establishment of an assurance fund, a quality he missed in the Bill. They would give the workman an interest in keeping down the demands on the insurance funds, and would enlist him on the side of carefulness, besides sustaining in him a spirit of independence and self-reliance; because he would come for compensation to a fund to which he was a contributor, instead of coming to the employer for compensation. The proposal should therefore be adopted.

MR. J. W. PEASE said, he was very much indebted to the Committee for the kind manner in which they had debated the Amendment, and he must express the deep disappointment he felt at the way the Government were treating the matter. He thought they would live to regret it, if they lived for any length of time. He must ask leave to take the sense of the Committee on the Amendment.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 28; Noes 68: Majority 40.—(Div. List, (No. 98.)

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Knowles), who was absent, had asked him to move this clause for him—

(Provision in case of insurance.)

“Provided, that where an employer shall have contributed one-third of the premium or subscription to any sufficient fund for providing against personal or bodily injury in favour of a n the man, e ind, or d, or em-the they Act, tives or re-any ll, in ceary ation, epre-ed to any than r his r this such any tract such loyer ble by his wages.

upon the as to the work his representatives should the injury result in death."

mutually agree ion to be paid y injury or to order that it might be negatived and reported. He did not want it to be so that no one moved the clause.

New Clause (This Act shall not extend to any mines to which "The London Mines Regulation Act, 1872," applies) — (Sir Henry Jackson,) — read a first time.

Question, "That the Clause be not read a second time," put and negatived.

House resumed.

Bill reported, as amended, to be considered upon Wednesday next, and to be printed. [Bill 303.]

ASSAULTS ON YOUNG PERSONS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HORWOOD, Bill to amend the Criminal Law as to Indecent Assaults on young persons, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HORWOOD and Colonel ALEXANDER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 304.]

BASTARDY ORDERS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HIBBERT, Bill to render valid certain Orders in Bastardy, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HIBBERT and Mr. DODSON. Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 305.]

House adjourned at a quarter after Three o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday. 9th August. 1890.

INU' Rail-Amen land)

(184).
(185); Lord Plunket's Indemnity. second Reading — Committee negatived — Exchequer Bonds and Bills.
Sport — Artizans and Labourers Dwellings (Scotland) Provisional Order (Leith) * (155).
third Reading — Inland Revenue * (177), and passed.

AFGHANISTAN — MILITARY OPERATIONS—THE LATEST TELEGRAM.

QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether there was any additional intelligence from India?

EARL GRANVILLE: We have received the following telegram from the Viceroy, dated 8th August, 1880:—

"Following from Griffin, 7th August:—'I believe the withdrawal to Gandamak of our troops and Roberts's march to Ghazni will, from arrangements now made with Ameer and tribes, be without any opposition whatever. The Candahar news has necessarily caused much excitement; but we have counteracted it, and yesterday I received most friendly letters from Moosakh-i-Alam and Mahomed Jan.'"

To-day there is this further telegram—

"From Viceroy, 9th August, 1880.

"Major White, Military Secretary to the Viceroy, having joined his regiment (92nd Highlanders) with Roberts's Division, reports magnificent force; could go anywhere."

LORD ELLENBOROUGH asked, If any news had been received from the neighbourhood of Khelat-i-Ghilzai?

EARL GRANVILLE said, that that was all the information obtained.

COMPENSATION FOR DISTURBANCE (IRELAND) BILL — THE ULSTER TENANT RIGHT.

EXPLANATION.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, he would, with the leave of the House, read the following letter, which he had received from his noble and learned Friend (Earl Cairns):—

"5 Cromwell Houses, S.W., Aug. 6.

"Dear Lord Redesdale—In speaking on the Irish Land Bill on Tuesday night, I referred to the introduction by Lord Portsmouth of the Ulster tenant-right into the South of Ireland as having been done on a 'small' scale, or on a 'small' estate. I said this in consequence of a statement I had seen in the papers; but I learn from Lord Portsmouth that it is not correct, and that the estate in question is one of upwards of 12,000 acres in extent. As I am unable to be in the House next week, might I ask you to explain this by reading this note on my behalf?

"Believe me, yours faithfully,

"CAIRNS."

He had only to say, in addition, that his noble and learned Friend wished the explanation to be made public.

TURKEY—RUMOURED NAVAL DEMONSTRATION.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in asking the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that

Her Majesty's Government intend to take part in any naval demonstration against the Ottoman Porte, notwithstanding the general state of affairs in India and China?—said: My Lords, although the rumours respecting a naval demonstration against Turkey have been very persistent, yet it is difficult to believe that Her Majesty's Government have really decided on taking part in such an attempt to coerce the Ottoman Government—or, in other words, to endeavour to wrest from it for Greece large Provinces inhabited by a population which is not Greek, but which is principally composed of Albanians, Vlachs, and Mussulmans. Metzovo, one of the towns which has been recently mentioned as one that the Porte could not cede for strategical reasons, is the chief town of the Vlach population which inhabits the Pindus; and I would ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Earl Granville), whenever he shall present Papers on this subject to the House, also to lay upon the Table the despatch or despatches of the late Sir Thomas Wyse, in 1854, which relate to the plundering of Metzovo by Theodore Grivas. The population of Metzovo is black, and their language is almost identical with that of the Wallachians of Roumania, and they have nothing in common with the Greeks. It is inconceivable, that after what has lately taken place in Bulgaria with respect to the attacks made on Mussulman villagers, and the outrages on their women, and the connivance of the Bulgarian Government in those outrages, and the utter inability of the European Governments or their Agents to punish or prevent such outrages, that the Government of Her Majesty should be asking, nay, if these rumours be true, requiring, the Ottoman Government to give up Mussulman populations to the tender mercies of the Greeks. Such demands are so extravagant, and so contrary to the rules and prescriptions of the Law of Nations, that they could only be made under the sanction and authority of some Treaty. Now, it is evident that the 24th Article of the Treaty of Berlin contains no such authorization; it does not go further than to authorize the European Governments mentioned in it to offer their mediation to facilitate negotiations. I, therefore, ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State, what other Article of the Treaty of Berlin he can cite which would authorize such dictation to an independent Nation; or, by what rule several Powers can lawfully and justly combine to do that which would be a violation of the Law of Nations if done by one of them? We have, however, of late become accustomed to see so many sophistries, and such disregard of the Law of Nations, in the speeches and despatches of public men, that it may be more useful to ask Her Majesty's Government, whether they consider the present time opportune for breaking the Law of Nations, for coercing Turkey, as it is called, but for what would be re-commencing war, bloodshed, and famine in Southern Europe, and engaging this country in complications for which it is not prepared? What is the present state of India? That country has not recovered from famine; its finance is disordered by a large deficit; a large part of its Forces are entangled in military operations in a country from which they cannot withdraw; the unpopularity of these military operations has checked the recruiting for the Indian Forces. The contentment of all the Indian populations with the British Government has lately been impaired by several causes. First by the Famine, which has made the taxation to be felt more grievously by the cultivators; next, by several breaches of faith on the part of the Indian Government, such as the application to the expenses of the Afghan War of money proceeding from taxes avowedly imposed for the purpose of forming a Famine Fund; the delay in extending the perpetual Settlement which was promised in 1862; the delay in admitting a larger number of the Natives of India to Civil employment. Within a few days the leading journal has published an article implying that India is rather a burden to this country, and that it is one that this country may not always care to retain. This language becomes additionally mischievous when it is borne in mind that similar language has been, not long ago, uttered at a public meeting by a right hon. Gentleman now a Member of the Cabinet. Is this, then, a moment when it is safe to disregard the feelings of the leading population of India, and by engaging in a Quixotic expedition to the Adriatic or the Ægean, to risk a collision with the Ottoman Empire, and by so doing cast a firebrand into the midst of the powder magazines upon which the Government of India is sitting? I will now ask your Lordships to look to China. We know that Russia and China are on the brink of war, that the Russian Forces in Central Asia are not equal to those of China, and that every mail brings news of additions to the Russian Naval and Military Forces in the Pacific; it is known that in the event of war Russia contemplates a blockade of the Chinese seaports, and that a blockade, whether effective or not, would most seriously interfere with our trade with China; that it might do more, for it might entirely interrupt it, and in that case inflict a deficit of £8,000,000 or £9,000,000 on the Indian Treasury. Is this, then, a time for sending British ships to the Adriatic, and running the risk of having to send more to the same place? It is, perhaps, hardly necessary to look so far as India and China; for, if we look at home what do we see? The whole of the United Kingdom still suffering from bad harvests and depressed trade; our Army disorganized, or, if that is too strong a term, numerically so much reduced that it would be difficult to send large re-inforcements in a condition fit to take the field. The late Government were accused of following a gunpowder policy for the sake of British interests; but if the present Government do not take care, it will find itself engaged in a gunpowder policy for a false idea, and in opposition to every British interest. I beg to ask the Question of which I have given Notice.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I understand the Question, of which the noble Lord (Lord Stanley of Alderley) has given Notice, is prompted, in the first place, by a friendly feeling towards Turkey; and, secondly, by some exaggerated idea that Her Majesty's Government are likely to lead this country into the dangers attending a naval demonstration, notwithstanding the recent disaster in Afghanistan. I cannot concede to the noble Lord an exclusive monopoly of friendly feeling towards Turkey, although, at the same time, I cannot but take a different view of the position of that Empire from what my noble Friend does. I cannot help thinking that there cannot be a more ill-judged mode of demonstrating that friendly feeling towards Turkey than to say or do anything at this moment which would encourage the Sultan and his Government to believe there was a want of will on the part of the Governments of Europe to insist on the fulfilment of Treaty obligations which they entered into under the Treaty of Berlin. I believe that it is the opinion of nearly all competent men—certainly it is the opinion of all the leading Statesmen of Europe, and I believe that I can include the noble Marquess the late Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (the Marquess of Salisbury)—that if Turkey remains in the state she now is—if the reforms so long promised are not carried out, if the Frontier questions are to continue in their present unsettled state, if the finances of the Empire are to go from bad to worse, if oppression and corruption remain unpunished, if no security for life and property prevail even in Constantinople itself—we are very near the end of the present state of things in Turkey. The view of Her Majesty's Government is to endeavour to produce such a change—to settle as soon as possible the international Frontier questions, and to promote such practical reforms both in Europe and Asia as shall prevent what will be most dangerous, not only to Europe, but to Turkey. To that end the concerted action of Europe has been, and is directed; and I am bound to say that I think it a friendly, and not in a hostile, spirit to Turkey. We have heard from a very high authority in this House that it would be most difficult to establish the concert of united Europe, and we have been told that, even if established, it would be quite impossible to maintain it. I do not pretend to be blind to the difficulties which surround the six Great Powers acting for one and the same purpose. There are in this matter different principles, different interests, different contingencies, and different views; but what we hope and rely upon is, that that there is one paramount interest, common to all, which will override the smaller divergencies of opinion. I have read accounts in the newspapers—sometimes English, sometimes Continental—of that concert of Europe being already broken up; but I prefer, instead of trusting those reports, to look as much as I can to facts as they exist. Your Lordships are aware that the Great Powers of Europe unanimously agreed to send an Identical Note to the Porte demanding that the provisions of the Treaty of Berlin should be carried out; and your Lordships are also aware that, with regard to the question of the Greek Frontier, all the Powers of Europe were united in deciding to meet at Berlin for the purpose of coming to a common decision as to the line of Frontier which had been indicated at the Protocol of the Treaty negotiated at Berlin. Your Lordships are further aware that there they came to a unanimous decision to adopt the line proposed, and which all agreed to be a just and loyal carrying out of the line which had been indicated in that Protocol signed at that capital two years ago. They also agreed unanimously to present a Collective Note both to Turkey and to Greece, recommending them to adopt the course proposed; and the Powers are, at this moment, in intimate communication as to what steps should be taken since the reply has been received from the Porte—a reply which does not contain a refusal, but is of a dilatory character. Your Lordships are likewise aware that the Powers have also agreed, after various unanimous communications with the Porte, to send a Collective Note on the question of the Montenegrin Frontier. In that Note they say that delay is no longer possible, and that they believe the cession of the district which they define will be the most advantageous arrangement for all parties concerned. Accordingly, three weeks are given to the Porte to carry out the peaceable cession of the district under what is called the Corti arrangement; and the Powers further express their expectation that if that arrangement fails, the Porte will join the Powers in assisting the Prince of Montenegro to take possession of the Dulcigno district. My Lords, Mr. Goschen, who is placed in a most difficult position at Constantinople, and who, I am bound to say, has exhibited all that judgment, firmness, and conciliation which were expected of him by his late Colleagues, informs me that the Powers have almost completely agreed as to the demands which they think Europe should put forward as to the reforms to be made in Armenia. During these communications, Mr. Goschen has expressed perfect satisfaction as to the language and attitude of the Ambassadors of all the Powers.

Lord Stanley of Alderley

Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, who has shown great ability in representing this country on the International Commission appointed under the 23rd Article of the Treaty of Berlin as to the reforms in the European Provinces of Turkey, speaks as to the cordial unanimity of the Delegates of the different Powers, and states that they have as nearly as possible completed every portion of their work. Perhaps your Lordships will allow me to add that, so far as I can judge in London with regard to the attitude and language of the Representatives of the six Powers since the time I entered the Foreign Office until this very day, the language of these Representatives has been constantly and perfectly consistent with the desire of their Governments to maintain what we believe to be so essential—the united concert of Europe; and they also hold what we hold, that it is impossible to believe that the decided will of united Europe can be set aside by the Porte. My noble Friend wishes to know whether we are going to take part in any naval demonstration; and he grounded his dread of it, or gave as one reason against it, the disaster which had recently happened to British troops in Afghanistan. Now, with regard to the naval demonstration, I decline to state what course Her Majesty's Government mean to pursue. Her Majesty's Government have come to the conclusion, as I have already mentioned, that it is impossible for Turkey to maintain resistance to the united opinion of Europe in matters on which it has a right to speak. In a matter like this they think it most unadvisable to make unnecessary announcements to the world of threats of the employment of force, and to do that which is of a minatory nature, and which adds no strength to the determination of the Government in that respect. With regard to the Montenegrin Frontier, such an announcement would be most inopportune, because it is not reasonable to expect that Turkey will refuse to do anything at once, or to completely carry out one of the two alternatives which have been proposed to her. The noble Lord has referred to the disaster in Afghanistan, in the terms on the Paper—"Notwithstanding the general state of affairs in India and China"—

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he had spoken of the general state of affairs in India, excluding all reference to military operations in Afghanistan.

Earl Granville

EARL GRANVILLE: Excluding all reference to the military operations in Afghanistan. Such an omission appears to me to weaken the force of the observations of the noble Lord that had any bearing on Turkey. I can only say that any military check of that sort, however painful to our feelings, and however much we may deplore that it is probably directly, or indirectly, owing to that under-rating of the force of uncivilized foes which is so often found among the Armies of civilized nations—that is a matter which we put entirely aside in considering the course we ought to pursue in common with Europe in regard to Turkey. In regard to the feelings of the Indian community, to which the noble Lord has alluded, I believe that those populations are intelligent enough to be grateful to this country for the endeavours we are making to rescue large numbers of their fellow co-religionists by getting a better Government for them in Turkey than that which now exists. We have adopted, with great care and consideration, the policy which we thought best adapted to meet the end in view. The noble Lord seems to think that the Government are running into great danger. We are not pretending to act as the sole police of Europe on the Eastern Question, as it involves the other Powers as much as ourselves. On the other hand, we are determined not to shrink from responsibility, and from action, in common with the other Powers, in order to prevent a catastrophe which we believe might end in a manner that would be most dangerous, and lead to the very consequences which the noble Lord appears to apprehend—namely, the complications which it might create for this country.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: My noble Friend (Lord Stanley of Alderley) has done considerable service in putting a Question we should have had on Thursday last had it not been for the unexpected absence of my noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury). Having, for the last few weeks, been much employed upon the subject, I feel bound to take the opportunity of protesting, however briefly, against the naval demonstration as to Greece, which is supposed to have been contemplated. After weighing all that has just fallen from the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Earl Granville), as far as we can judge, the project has not been abandoned. It seems to me that propositions which are just have been identified with results entirely untenable, and that they ought now to be divided from each other. We may hold an extension of the Hellenic Kingdom to be useful. We may concur in the opinion of the King of Belgium, when Prince Leopold, upon the subject. We may think the line suggested at the Congress of Berlin to be desirable. We may approve some line more favourable to Hellenic views, such as has been recently suggested. At the same time, we may remember that no European concert is entitled to impose on one State against its judgment, sacrifices to another State. In any just and accurate comparison of objects, to uphold the Law of Nations is more important than to accord to Greece the territory she may aim at. No war having occurred between Greece and Turkey, exchange or purchase are the ordinary modes in which one ought to acquire territory from the other. If the authorities of the Sublime Porte are willing to make an uncompensated sacrifice, they are, of course, at liberty to do so. But no array of Powers can dictate to them a larger sacrifice than, in their judgment, seems to be consistent with the safety of their Empire.

DISTRESS (IRELAND)—ASSISTED EMIGRATION.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN, in rising to call the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the subject of assisting emigration from certain districts in Ireland, said, although the matter had engaged their Lordships' attention incidentally once or twice in discussion on other matters, he thought the state of things in Ireland at the present moment was of such a character as to excuse him for bringing this important subject before them again. He did not think it was necessary to waste any time in attempting to prove that it was a fact that certain districts in Ireland were over-populated at present, and that there were only two alternatives for that state of things—removal of a portion of the surplus population to other parts of Ireland, or its emigration to other countries. As regarded the first, there was no possibility of migration from one part of Ireland to another, as it was not likely that any manufactures would spring up which would find employment for the population. He should, therefore, assume that the only practical way of relieving the over-populated districts was by emigration. If that was the case, it appeared to him, seeing that neither the people themselves nor their landlords could bear the whole expense of such a remedy, that on an exceptional occasion of this kind, when the people were suffering from exceptional distress, it came quite within the province of the Government to take the matter up. To make emigration as easy as possible, it was obvious that facilities should be afforded to whole families to emigrate, because it was hard enough for a man to give up the plot of ground to which for his whole life he had been attached; but it was harder still to leave his wife and family behind, until in another country he could earn money sufficient to send for them. Besides, it was not well, in the interests of the country, to have the bread-winners—the bone and sinew—go out of it, while the old and the women and children were left behind. Therefore, he thought that, in a case of this kind, every facility ought to be afforded to enable not only able-bodied men, but to enable fathers of families to emigrate with their wives and children. He thought, also, that emigration should, if possible, be directed to the British Colonies which required to be populated, rather than anywhere out of the Empire. If there were any strength to be obtained by increase of population, it was only right that our Colonies should have it, and not other nations. He further contended that when the emigration was to our Colonies the emigrants were generally successful, and a source of strength both to the Colonies and to the Empire. There was also another advantage—namely, that the people who went to the Colonies became thoroughly well-disposed towards British rule; whereas experience proved that when they went to the United States, they frequently retained great animosity towards this country. All other things being equal, he did not wish to enter into the question of the merits of one particular Colony over another; but he thought it was obvious that the one which was nearest and could be reached cheapest, was the one which should be taken, if any system of State assistance of emigration was adopted. The nearest of our Colonies was Canada, and Canada afforded a great many advantages. In many parts there was a large quantity of prairie land that required no clearing whatever, besides which the Dominion, itself, would advance money to the emigrants, on the security of the land for tools and provisions for the first year. Terms were offered by the Canadian Government which were of a most liberal description. The Canadian Government gave to the head of a family a homestead grant of 160 acres, which they were allowed to choose where they liked; and at the end of three years, a Government Inspector looked over the land, and if the emigrant had made any improvement on it, if he had built himself a house and broken up the land, showing that he was a bond fide settler, the emigrant became absolutely entitled to the 160 acres, and at the same time had a prescriptive right to purchase another adjoining lot of 160 acres at 10s. per acre. Besides that, the Canadian Government had most excellent arrangements. They had a gentleman over here to take charge of emigrants, and they had a gentleman at Quebec to receive them and forward them to the land they were to occupy; so that the emigrant was conducted to the spot, and chose himself the spot where he wished to live. Prairie land was offered to the emigrants, and there was such a demand for labour in Canada at remunerative wages that the emigrants would want no help after a short time. The objections entertained to emigration by the Roman Catholic clergy, on the score of the evil influences under which the emigrants too often fell on being landed in New York, would vanish if the emigrants went to Canada. He thought nothing could be more liberal than the conduct of the Canadian Government, who, in fact, did everything but advance the money to the emigrants to go out with. It might be said that if the Canadian Government offered such advantages, what was the object of troubling this Parliament about it? But he confessed it appeared to him that the British Parliament ought to offer some assistance also. Many of the landlords would now be very glad to assist their tenants to emigrate, if they could, but they had not the means. In some cases the landlords might, no doubt, be unwilling to assist; and, in such cases, assistance should be given by the State. He hoped that Her Majesty's Government might be able to see their way towards doing something, and he should like to see them appropriate a sufficient sum of money to enable some emigration scheme to be carried out in conjunction with the Canadian Government. If the Government were not prepared to do that, he hoped they would advance money to the owners of lands and Boards of Guardians to assist in emigration, taking the security of the land in Canada for the re-payment of the loans. If they were not able to do that, it might be advanced through the Irish Boards of Guardians, on the same terms as advances were now made for the drainage of land. He knew that, inasmuch as emigration ought to be conducted in the spring, it would be too late for an extensive emigration that year; and, therefore, he did not ask Her Majesty's Government to make any definite reply at present; but he did hope that between this and next year they would give an attentive and favourable consideration to the subject.

VISCOUNT MONCK said, he joined most cordially in the appeal made to their Lordships by his noble Friend (the Earl of Dunraven), for he thought the subject was one which demanded their Lordships' and the Government's most serious and earnest consideration. To a great extent, it was simply a question of political economy. They had in many districts of Ireland a redundant population, living normally on the verge of starvation, and liable to be reduced by an accident to a state of famine; while, under the rule of the same Sovereign in Canada there were, practically, unlimited tracts of fertile land crying out for hands to cultivate it. It seemed to him that it would be betraying a great want of statesmanship, if they were not able to devise some effectual means of remedying such a state of things, and bringing those two elements of prosperity together. He was by no means disposed to undervalue the principles of political economy. On the contrary, he believed that, like the laws of arithmetic or those of gravitation, they would act whether we wished it or not; but there was a primitive law which commanded man to increase and multiply and to replenish the earth. The second portion of that command had been neglected. We had not replenished the earth; and, in Ireland, the congestion of a population had resulted in great misfortune. It was said that we ought to leave the redress of such misfortunes to natural causes. By the operation of natural causes, famine and pestilence were means by which nature redressed the evil of over-population. But we did not allow the operation of those natural causes to work itself out to the full extent, and God forbid that we should. We remembered that we were dealing not with inanimate objects, but with human beings, and we stepped in to save them. But he held that, as we did interfere, we ought to interfere with the root of the disease, and not merely with the symptoms. The true mode of proceeding would be by removing the cause of the disease, and not by merely alleviating results. He believed that the only means existing of preventing a recurrence of famines or scarcities of food in Ireland was by the removal from that country of a portion of its population. Within the last week his noble Friend (the Earl of Dunraven) and himself had an interview with Sir John Macdonald, the Prime Minister of Canada, and their conversation with that gentleman enabled them to see what great advantages would follow from emigration to that Colony. Within the last few years, by the union of the Provinces of North America, the Canadians obtained an almost unlimited tract of fertile land in the North-West of America. There was room on it for almost any number of people. It would be almost impossible to fill it up. The Canadian Government had taken this matter in hand, and the encouragement they gave to emigrants seemed to be dictated by prudence and judgment. They gave to an emigrant 160 acres of good prairie land which required nothing but the plough. They had organized a system of receiving emigrants, conducting them through the country, and guiding them in the choice of allotments. In fact, they took care of the emigrants in every way. If the British Government made advances to Irish emigrants on the security of their allotments, the Canadian Government would undertake to see to the collection of the re-payments and the transmission of the money to this country. He hoped that Her Majesty's Government would consider the matter, and that if by that time they were not prepared with a plan, his noble Friend (the Earl of Dunraven) would bring forward a Motion on the subject, calling for a Select Committee to inquire into it. In 1847 and 1848, what were called natural causes were allowed to operate, and most Irishmen would agree that very few of the then existing population were benefited by those natural causes. A great number of landowners were ruined, many among the farmers and the middle classes were evicted, and a vast number of people died. Natural causes operated unhappily for the people, but to the advantage of Ireland. It was impossible to read the oft-quoted pamphlet of Mr. Tuke, without being struck, on the one hand, with the great misery existing in some of the places he had visited; and, on the other hand, with the comparative improvement in the average condition of the population as compared with 1847 and 1848. That was the result of the operation of natural causes; but, unfortunately, 2,000,000 of people had disappeared somehow, and in a way far from creditable to our administration. He trusted his noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies would not give an absolutely negative answer to the proposal, but would keep his mind open on the subject.

The Earl of Dunraven

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY trusted that the Government would not give a direct negative to the appeal made to them, but would, at least, take the matter into consideration, and that his noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies would have some conversation on the subject of assisting emigration with the Canadian Minister who was now in this country. It had recently been stated that the railway to Manitoba was already completed to a considerable distance west of the settled parts of Canada, and there would be plenty of room along this line for emigrants. He thought that a good deal of false sentiment against emigration was due to Goldsmith's "Deserted Village" and "Traveller;" but at that time emigrants were very much left to take care of themselves, and were unsupported and unassisted by the State.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, that he would admit the importance of the question, and that it should not be discussed as a Party matter; but he feared that while the people of Ireland had any hopes of getting part of the land of Ireland for themselves, they would not wish to emigrate without leaving behind some members of their families to occupy the tenements that were considered so undesirable. He believed the condition of the poorer tenants in Ireland had been exaggerated, because many of them were labourers, and, when there were good seasons in England, their earnings here made them comfortable as compared with many labourers in England. Owing to the wet climate and soil of Ireland, the difficulties of small cultivators were greater than in any other country, and made a corresponding demand for capital to balance the seasons. The people of Ireland also contracted early marriages, and they carried this custom into the large towns to which they were attracted by the industries concentrated there. The consequence was, that the population of those towns increased faster than the industries; and that made emigration desirable, not only for the people of Ireland alone, but for the people of the United Kingdom generally. The prospects held out by the Canadian Government were certainly very attractive, and Her Majesty's Government ought to endeavour in some way to assist our people to avail themselves of the offers that were made. It would be quite legitimate that not only Government aid, but also local aid and individual aid, should be given. He believed that it would be far more desirable than giving fixity of tenure to small tenants in small holdings, to send them to a country where there was a vast extent of fertile land that only required to be occupied and cultivated to yield a good living and easy prosperity to an industrious people.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, he wished to swell the general chorus of approval with which the noble Earl's (the Earl of Dunraven's) suggestion had been met, by adding his own. He must, however, say that although it was generally assumed that emigration would be a panacea for the difficulties existing in Connaught and other parts of Ireland, yet he could not persuade himself it would be so. Still, he would urge the Government to give the subject their best consideration. If he doubted whether emigration would be an unmixed good, it was because, while the population was congested in certain parts of Ireland, in other parts it was sparse, and there were tracts of mountain moorland that were perfectly reclaimable. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had found it possible almost to create land, which was of a certain agricultural value, and believed the process was remunerative. Before systematically reducing the population, it would be well, therefore, if the Government would see whether there was not land that might be available for supporting some part of the population. When noble Lords spoke of the "conversion" of the Irish to emigration, he felt it impossible not to sympathize with the affectionate attachment of the Irish people to the soil of their country, although he admitted that the feeling was carried to excess. As, however, a large portion of the Irish people were emigrating, it would be well if they could direct, at least, a portion of the stream to their own Colonies. With regard to the development of emigration, he might point out that during the first four months of the year the number of emigrants from Ireland was 34,046, and during the same period of last year the number was 11,904, which showed a development of emigration since last year of nearly treble. Two-thirds of the total number of the emigrants last year went to the United States; whereas in Connaught the proportion was four-fifths of the whole number; and in Mayo, where the evils existed in the highest degree, the proportion was 11 out of every 15. Of the total emigration from Ireland since the Returns were first compiled, about 12 per cent had emigrated under the provisions of the Poor Law. In the year 1855, which might be taken as a fair sample of emigration at its height, the proportion was as high as 27 per 1,000; while in March, 1880, the proportion was only 6 per 1,000; so that, whatever the influence of the Act might have been, it was dying out. He could not disguise from himself that there was a certain danger in emigration as regarded migratory labourers, particularly while the system was going on of subdividing the waste lands which were formerly held in common. That system was proceeding in Connaught, both on the estates of good landlords, who wished to relieve the congested population, and on the properties of landlords who only wished to increase their rentals, and if it was to continue he only feared that the same state of things as regarded the congestion of population which they found so threatening would arise again, and there might arise with it that system of small cottiers, which all deplored. He hoped the subject would receive careful attention on the part of the Government.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that in the unavoidable absence of his noble Friend the Lord President of the Council (Earl Spencer) he had undertaken to answer the Question for him; but he must remind their Lordships that it was rather an Irish than a Colonial question. As far as the Colonies were concerned, there could not be the slightest doubt that it would be most advantageous to them to get as large a number of emigrants as they could to cultivate their waste lands, although he was sorry to say there were Colonies which, believing that emigration would diminish the wages they now enjoyed, discouraged it. That, however, was certainly not the case with Canada, in which Dominion there were, undoubtedly, immense tracts of land waiting to be cultivated, and the Canadian Government were wisely desirous of getting a large number of emigrants to cultivate the ground as soon as possible. Therefore, as far as he was concerned, looking at the interests of the Colonial Office, he had not one word to say against any proper scheme of emigration. But, as he had said, this was an Irish question, and in that point of view, perhaps, he ought to speak of it with more reserve. His noble Friend who had just sat down (Lord Monteagle) seemed to balance very much the arguments pro and con—sometimes he favoured emigration, and sometimes he wished to keep the population at home. For himself, he must say he doubted extremely whether emigration was entirely the panacea for the ills of Ireland it was sometimes supposed to be. It was perfectly true that the great emigration that took place in 1841 took place under the most melancholy circumstances, and the depletion of the population then was not only owing to emigration, but to the lamentable number of deaths from famine and fever. The figures were so remarkable that he would quote them; at least, he would quote those in regard to Connaught, the Province most concerned. In 1841, the population was 1,418,000; in 1851, it had been reduced to 1,100,000; and in 1871, it had fallen to 846,000. Notwithstanding that immense diminution, they still found that the condition of Connaught was such that they might almost suppose no practical diminution of the population had taken place. That was not encouraging; and when he was told that if they only sent away a certain further proportion of the population at the expense of the British taxpayer all the evils of Connaught would be removed, he confessed he was extremely sceptical. There was another evil under which various parts of Ireland suffered, and which, he believed, was one of the causes of the difficulties under which landlords and tenants alike suffered, and that was the small holdings. In that respect it was well to observe the prodigious change which had been effected. In 1841 there were over 100,000 holdings under five acres; but they had fallen in 1878 to 22,425. These figures, then, showed that the population had been greatly diminished, and that the process of consolidating the holdings was steadily going on. He felt a great deal of doubt as to whether it would be prudent of the Government to interfere with that process, and, perhaps, by an expenditure of £10,000,000, to transport a great portion of the population to Manitoba and other distant parts of Canada. There were several practical objections. In the first place, would the population go? That was a matter of considerable doubt. He had been told that landlords had frequently offered the tenants on their estates the opportunity to emigrate, but had not found the offer freely accepted. Then, again, let them look at the operation of the existing law. Noble Lords hardly seemed aware of the vast powers given by the Act of 1849 to Boards of Guardians, under which they might borrow money on the security of the rates to the extent of 11s. 8d. in the pound, for the purpose of assisting emigration, and thus send whole families out of the country. It might be assumed that the sentiment of Ireland was opposed to such emigration, because they found that that power had been only very slightly taken advantage of, the number of families thus assisted being only 585 since the passing of the Act. Ireland, more than any country in the world, was governed by sentiment, and he was not disposed to disregard it. Indeed—and he could speak from personal experience—if there was anything calculated to arouse jealousy in Ireland, it was what they called the English Government assisting the landlords in clearing their estates; and he should view with considerable mistrust a policy of advancing large sums to landlords for that purpose, for that was what it would come to. If the Boards of Guardians were willing to assist emigrants, that would be a very legitimate operation indeed, for those Boards represented the community on the spot; they were, or ought to be, the best judges of what was required, and he believed did their duty very well. If these Boards of Guardians were disposed to take advantage of those powers of borrowing which they possessed he would receive it with great satisfaction. Speaking his own opinion—he had no authority to do otherwise—he thought that assistance might be given to local bodies of that kind; but funds given to landlords for the purpose of promoting emigration would render both the landlords and the Government open to misconstruction. He believed that a great deal more might be done in Ireland by the exertions of resident proprietors on the spot than was admitted by some, or than would even result from emigration. He was quite willing to assist in the promotion of any emigration of a legitimate character; but, at the same time, he could not help remarking that nobody who had seen what Mr. Tuke said in his pamphlet about the improved state of the property where there were resident landlords, over that where the only business of the landlord was to draw his rent, could avoid coming to the conclusion that those resident landlords who did their duty well—and many of them were Members of that House—had a heavy burden to drag after them in the persons of those non-resident landlords. If there was a country in the world where it was necessary for the proprietor to reside on his property, it was Ireland, and he regretted that such a large proportion of the estates in that country were left uncared for. It might not be very inviting to reside among such a population; but it was their paramount duty to do so; and if the population of their Lordships' estates in this country had been neglected in the same way as the population of Ireland, they would see a state of things in England and Scotland at which they would be very much surprised. It was only by landed proprietors living among the population of Ireland, and living among them from one generation to another, that real improvement could be effected. There was one set of people who believed that it was only by clearing Ireland of the people that you could bring about a satisfactory condition of things; there were others who thought the removal of the people from Ireland was a great evil and ought to be resisted. While agreeing with neither of those parties, he believed there was, in certain places, a congestion of the population which it would be an advantage to relieve; but he held that it was the first and primary duty of the Government and of all persons connected with Ireland to see how they could improve the condition of the population of the country itself, and enable them to prosper and live happily there.

EARL FORTESCUE said, he was sadly disappointed at the speech of his noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley). As the noble Viscount (Viscount Monck) had truly observed, in a speech which was a most effective answer to his own speech of the other day, the laws of political economy vindicated their truth by their action, whether they believed in them or not. The measure proposed recently by the Government, by violating the clearest principles of law and political economy, and establishing a most dangerous precedent, alarming not only the landowners, but the capitalists, not only of Ireland but of Great Britain, and thus driving away the capital, much needed in both, from the improvement of the land, would have confirmed and perpetuated the local evils clearly pointed out by the noble Earl (the Earl of Dunraven), who had so usefully called attention to the subject, by encouraging the redundant population to remain on their miserable holdings; and thus would have destroyed any hope of making a permanent improvement in the condition of those districts which they said required this exceptional legislation. He utterly disbelieved in the existence of distress over anything like the extent of the scheduled districts, which comprehended much more than half of Ireland. There was considerable evidence of prosperity in Ireland—for instance, there was a remarkable increase in the Customs. Whereas the Customs in England and Scotland showed a falling off of £450,000, the Customs in Ireland had increased by £40,000, and £4,000 of that increase was in a scheduled county. Last year, in one of his frequent visits to Ireland, he was struck by the great improvement in the condition of the country which had taken place within his recollection. He believed the distress was far more local than the measure recently rejected by an overwhelming majority of their Lordships, including a majority of the Liberal Peers, would lead one to suspect. The very fact that the area of distress was so limited made it all the more easy to apply what his noble Friend, who had just sat down, did not deny would be one of the remedies that would diminish that congestion of population which formed so great a difficulty and was the source of so much distress and danger. If the Government, profiting by the special facilities now opportunely offered by the Canadian Government, took emigration up not merely as a means of enabling landlords to clear their estates, but in conjunction with Boards of Guardians; if they went to work systematically, so that whole families might emigrate and carry the feeling of family with them, much good might be done. If the people were allowed to take some of their pastors with them to such a country as Canada—and, Protestant as he was, he would not object to that—if they could find there the society which they had left behind, and almost everything the same except their poverty, he believed they would be a source of strength and wealth to the Dominion, and that, while finding prosperity for themselves, they would confer hardly a less benefit upon those they had left behind. He must add that while he quite agreed as to the benefits resulting from the residence of landowners on their estates, and the extreme desirableness of their doing so, they could not, and ought not, to be expected to expose their own lives, and the lives of their families, as well as their property, to danger from lawless violence. That was a point which he would earnestly impress upon Her Majesty's Government.

The Earl of Kimberley

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE remarked, that it was by no means surprising that few Irish landlords lived on their property, considering that several of the Members of their Lordships' House had been from time to time warned by the Government of the day not to do so.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, the difficulties in the way of what was proposed were almost insuperable; and he wished to point out that, in order to relieve the congestion of the population, there ought to be a provision that if persons were assisted to emigrate, the houses in Ireland in which they resided should be pulled down; otherwise, other families would come to inhabit them, and the recurrence of the evil would be certain and immediate.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he had omitted to give some figures in the course of his remarks which had an interesting bearing on the case. The number of emigrants from Irish ports in the first six months of 1879 were 22,787; and for the first six months of the present year they were 64,583, showing an increase of 41,795. That, at least, showed that an increased emigration was going on.

LORD DENMAN said, that he had referred their Lordships to Maguire's The Irish in America, and had desired to present a copy of it to the Library of their Lordships' House.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN, in reply, said, he had never suggested that emigration should take any other form than an extension of the system of granting loans to the Boards of Guardians. The money which was advanced by them could be secured on the holdings of the emigrants in Canada, according to the scheme laid down in the Bright Clauses of the Land Act.

LORD PLUNKET'S INDEMNITY BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to relieve the Right Honourable William Conyngham Baron Plunket from certain disabilities and penalties in consequence of his having sat and voted in the House of Peers without being duly qualified by making and subscribing the oath prescribed by law—Was presented by The LORD CHANCELLOR (by Her Majesty's Command); read 1^a; and to be read 2^a To-morrow; and Standing Order No. XXXV. to be considered in order to its being dispensed with.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter
before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 9th August, 1880.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee— —CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, Class IV.—
 EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART, Vote 3;
 Class I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS,
 Votes 12, 20, 21; Class II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS, Vote 33; Class III.—LAW AND JUSTICE, Votes 3 to 14, 18.

WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee—
 Consolidated Fund, £10,818,274.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—County Courts
 Jurisdiction in Lunacy (Ireland)* [306]; Courts of Justice Building Act (1865) Amendment* [307].

Second Reading—Bastardy Orders* [305].

Committee—Report—Census (Ireland) [284];
 Census (Scotland) [286].

Committee—Report—Considered as amended—Third Reading—Elementary Education (re-comm.)* [264], and passed.

Third Reading—Elementary Education Provisional Orders Confirmation (Cardiff, &c.)*
 [268]; General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Provisional Order (Forfar Gas)*
 [283]; Married Women's Policies of Assurance (Scotland)* [270], and passed.

Withdrawn—Vaccination Acts Amendment*
 [222].

QUESTIONS.

RULES AND ORDERS—PETITIONS—REFERENCE TO THE OTHER HOUSE OF PARLIAMENT.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR begged to present Petitions from the Tower Hamlets Radical Club, from the Westminster
 Democratic Club, and from Lambeth Radical Club, in favour of his Resolution—

“That it was inexpedient that Public Business should be at the mercy of a body of hereditary and irresponsible legislators.”

MR. WARTON asked the Speaker, Was it Constitutional for a Member of that House to present a Petition which contained an attack upon another branch of the Legislature?

MR. SPEAKER said, he did not quite understand the Question of the hon.
 and learned Member.

MR. WARTON said, he might be wrong; but he submitted that part of the Constitution was, that neither House should receive Petitions which were insulting to the other.

MR. SPEAKER said, he presumed that if the Petitions alluded to contained insulting expressions the hon. Member would not have presented them.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said the Petitions were couched in most respectful terms.

COURTS OF LAW (SCOTLAND)—PAY-MENT OF FEES BY STAMPS.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he will cause inquiries to be made as to the use or non-use of stamps for fees in the Courts of Justice in Scotland; and, why not used on all occasions upon payments connected with the administration of justice?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH:
 Sir, I have made inquiry into the matter referred to by my hon. and gallant Friend, and find that fee stamps are used in all proceedings in the Supreme Courts in Scotland—that is, in the Court of Session, Court of Teinds, and High Court of Justiciary. Their extension to the local Courts has been under consideration, but is attended with difficulties. In the Sheriff Courts there is the difficulty of distribution in all the places where Courts are held. There are also fees payable to officers of Courts, which are still, in certain cases, retained for their own use.

PRISONS ACT, 1877—PRISON LABOUR—COMPETITION WITH TRADES AND MANUFACTURES.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that letters with price lists of mats and mattings, manufactured by prisoners in Wakefield Prison, have been issued by the authorities of that prison to the manufacturers and merchants, offering to supply them with those articles from 1st August; whether a similar course has not been taken by the authorities of other prisons; whether the manufacture of mats and mattings in our prisons did not considerably increase in 1879, and has not increased since, employing a greater proportion of prisoners in that trade than in any other; and, whether he will take steps to avoid, according to the spirit and intention of the Prisons Act, 40 and 41 Vic., c. 21, s. 11, “undue pressure on, or competition with, any particular trade or industry?"

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had made inquiries as to the subject-matter of the Question of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and found that the letters with price lists had only been sent to wholesale dealers. The best calculations showed that, instead of there being an increase in the manufacture of mats and matting in prisons, the opposite was the fact, for the number of prisoners employed in that kind of work was, at present, 1,000 fewer than four or five years ago.

BRIDGES (IRELAND)—RE-NAMING OF CARLISLE BRIDGE, DUBLIN.

MR. DAWSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Corporation of Dublin, having, by formal resolution, recently named the new bridge across the Liffey O'Connell Bridge, the Port and Docks Board, who built the bridge, refused the request of the Corporation to have removed therefrom tablets describing the bridge as Carlisle Bridge, and to substitute therefor tablets describing it as O'Connell Bridge; whether the naming of thoroughfares within the City of Dublin is not by Law vested in the Corporation; and, if so, whether there is any means of securing that such right shall, in the case of bridges, be preserved to the Corporation, and of preventing its being frustrated by a body like the Port and Docks Board, which does not represent the great body of the ratepayers, and was only intrusted with the erection of the bridges in order to protect the navigation of the river; and, whether it is a fact that, when the plans of the bridge were submitted to the Corporation for its approval, the present inscription on the tablets was omitted, and that the placing of any such inscription naming the bridge was not attempted in the case of Grattan Bridge, formerly Essex Bridge, which was, in a similar manner, built by the Port and Docks Board, but with money, as in the present case, principally contributed by the ratepayers of the City of Dublin, the elected representatives of whom are the Corporation of Dublin?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Really, Sir, this is a question which does not concern the Executive Government. It relates, I suppose, to a dispute on a matter of law between the Corporation of Dublin and the Dublin Port and Docks Board. As regards information on the matter, I daresay the hon. Member is better informed than I am, as he is a member of the Corporation. As for a legal opinion on the subject, if mine were good for much, it would not be my business to give it. It is a legal dispute, or may come to be one. I cannot give an opinion upon it, and I suppose the parties will settle it in the usual way.

MR. DAWSON: May I ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, or the Attorney General for England, to state his opinion on this question relative to the legal right of the Corporation and of the Port and Docks Board?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I really think that these are both influential bodies, and not at all devoid of means, and that they are in a position to get their legal opinion in the usual way.

THE LATE REGISTRAR GENERAL — RETURN ON MORTALITY (GENERAL AND INFANT)—THE NOTE.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the President of the Local Government Board, By whose authority a "Note" was appended of information not ordered by this House to the Return on Mortality (General and Infant), dated the 16th day of June, 1879; whether the Note is not misleading, as it compares epidemic years 1838-42 with years consisting of epidemic and many non-epidemic years, and omits the years 1843, 1844, 1845, and 1846, which were non-epidemic years altogether; and, whether he will give consent to a Return of deaths from smallpox for England and Wales during the years 1843, 1844, 1845, and 1846?

MR. DODSON: The Note in question was added by the late Registrar General. Its object was to show the average rate of mortality from small-pox in the whole series of years for which the information is available, both before and after vaccination was compulsory. The Note was inserted to prevent the public being misled by a comparison of two periods of seven and nine years, the latter of which includes the epidemic of 1871 and 1872. The years 1843-46 were omitted because they are the only years since 1837 for which the causes of death have not been abstracted and classified; but there appears no trustworthy ground for the assertion that these were non-epidemic years. There is no objection to giving the Return for those years, except the trouble and expense of extracting deaths from small-pox from about 1,500,000 of deaths from all causes.

PUBLIC HEALTH—UNWHOLESOME MEAT—CASE OF GEORGE LAMB.

MR. RITCHIE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of George Lamb, who was convicted at the Thames Police Court of exposing for sale unwholesome meat and fined 2s. 6d.; and, if so, whether he has thought it necessary to ask for some explanation from the magistrate of what seems so inadequate a punishment for so serious an offence?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had received a communication from the magistrate sitting at the Thames Police Court, to the effect that on the evidence adduced he was at first disposed to dismiss the summons, it having been shown that the defendant, who had bought the food from a wholesale dealer, did not know until he had opened the tins that any of it was bad, and that the food seized was not intended for sale, although it was exposed in the defendant's place of business. On further consideration, he thought it advisable to impose a nominal fine of half-a-crown to mark his sense of the imprudence and carelessness of the defendant, and that he did.

MR. RITCHIE asked, if the right hon. and learned Gentleman was aware that this was a second conviction?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had no information on that point.

SCIENCE AND ART—SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM—DUPLICATE OBJECTS OF ART—THE LIST AND RETURN.

MR. LEEMAN asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, If there exists any List of Duplicates of Objects of Art in the South

Kensington Museum; and, if not, whether he will cause such a list to be prepared for the reassembling of Parliament; such list to be classified, and to give date and country of each example; whether he will cause a Report to be prepared to be presented at the same time, giving a detailed account of the system of circulation of objects of art throughout the kingdom under the Science and Art Department of the South Kensington Museum from its first establishment to the present time; such Report to give in alphabetical order the towns to which loans have been sent; how often, and for what periods of time; the number of objects; returns of visitors; and, where possible, the financial results; with any details, extracts from official correspondence, &c., showing the influence of such contributions from national collections in the promotion of local provincial exhibitions and museums; and, particulars as to special provisions which have been made for the safe transmission and custody of such loans; and, what, if any, arrangements have been entered into with insurance offices for protection against loss by fire?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, a list of all duplicates of art objects in the South Kensington Museum, suitable for circulation on loans to schools of art, provincial museums, &c., was printed in 1872, and can readily be made complete to the present time. A Report relating to the organization of the system of circulation of art objects on loan, as carried on by the establishment of the Science and Art Department to the present time, shall be furnished early next Session. Meantime, it may interest the House to know that during 1879 collections have been sent to seven permanent local museums, including those at Bethnal Green and Edinburgh, and to 10 local exhibitions. The number of art objects lent has been 5,854, and the number of paintings and drawings 2,089. The number of visitors to local museums excluding Bethnal Green and Edinburgh, has been 581,922. The visitors to Bethnal Green numbered 444,021, and to Edinburgh 647,294, giving a total of 1,673,237. The number of visitors to South Kensington was 879,395, making a grand total of 2,552,632. The demand for loans of art objects has largely increased this year, and we are endeavouring as far as possible to meet it.

Mr. Dodson

SCIENCE AND ART—SALE OF DUPLICATES FROM THE NATIONAL COLLECTIONS.

MR. LEEMAN asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether, in the interests of provincial and corporation museums, the Treasury are prepared to consider the advisability of issuing instructions prohibiting any further sale of duplicates of works of art in the national collections; and, if the Treasury will call for a Return, to be prepared for the reassembling of Parliament, setting forth all duplicates of works of art in those national collections of the Metropolis which are not under the control of a responsible Minister, including the British Museum, the National Gallery, and the National Portrait Gallery; such Returns to be classified, and to give date and country of origin of each example, and, in case of paintings, water-colour and other drawings, etchings, &c., to state the period and style of each master; such lists to include all duplicates not exhibited, or which can be withdrawn from exhibition without lessening the interest and completeness of the collection?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, I have consulted the Trustees of the three collections included in the Question of my hon. Friend. With regard to the National Gallery, duplicates of pictures in that institution would, as a rule, be copies, and no such copies have been sold or exchanged, nor are there any in the possession of the Trustees. The National Portrait Gallery has only one duplicate. The Question of my hon. Friend would, therefore, apply chiefly to the case of the British Museum; and, looking to the limited amount of the grant which is annually placed at the disposal of the Trustees, I think it would not be advisable to deprive them of the power of selling or exchanging duplicates. Exchange or sale is often the only means of obtaining necessary specimens. The power of sale, which was conferred on the Trustees by certain sections of the 7 Geo. III., has very rarely been exercised except for special purposes, with the concurrence of the Treasury. With respect to the second part of the Question, I am informed that the difficulties of compiling such a Return in the case of the British Museum would be very great, owing to the immense number of the objects and the necessity of careful comparison of similar specimens before they can be pronounced to be duplicates, and that the number and value of the duplicate specimens, when such an examination had been completed, would not be at all commensurate with the labour and cost.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS —ESTATE AT SEDGEFORD.

MR. MONK asked the honourable Member for the Isle of Wight, Whether it is the fact, as stated by the Reverend Mr. Zincke, in the "Contemporary Review" for the present month, that—

"At Sedgeford the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have an estate of 2,000 acres without a single cottage, and in this parish we hear of ten and eleven persons sleeping in a single room;"

and, if so, whether the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England have taken, or are about to take, steps to erect cottages for the agricultural labourers on their estate at Sedgeford, or to provide some other remedy for a condition of things which tends to the demoralization of the labourers and of their families?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Sir, the passage referred to conveys a wrong impression, and is only a quotation of words used in a Report of one of the Assistant Commissioners employed under the Royal Commission of 1869, to inquire into the condition of women and children in the agricultural districts. At that time the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had just acquired from the Dean and Chapter of Norwich the reversion of the estate at Sedgeford; but had no control over any part of the property, which was held under a long lease. It was not till 1874 that arrangements were completed by which 1,260 acres were brought into possession, the lessees acquiring in exchange the freehold of the residue. Since then the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have built six new cottages, which, added to one which was there before, makes seven cottages for one farm of 1,260 acres.

POST OFFICE—THE PROPOSED SMALL PARCELS POST.

SIR JOHN HAY (for Sir GABRIEL GOLDNEY) asked the Postmaster General, Whether, having reference to the proposal of the late Government to introduce, by arrangement with the Railway Companies, an universal small parcels post, the present Government propose to follow up the subject; and, whether, if so, any progress has been made in the matter?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, when I was appointed to the Office I now hold, I found that negotiations had been commenced by the late Government with the object of establishing, in conjunction with the Railway Companies, a parcels post throughout the United Kingdom. After giving the subject careful consideration, I came to the conclusion that the establishment of a parcels post would confer such important advantages upon the entire community that I asked the Prime Minister to allow the negotiations to proceed. His consent was at once most willingly given. The negotiations are at the present time going on; and Mr. Benthall, who has hitherto conducted the negotiations on behalf of the Post Office, is about to meet the representatives of the Railway Companies. I can assure the hon. Baronet the Member for Chippenham (Sir Gabriel Goldney) and the House that the advantages which would result to the entire community from establishing a parcels post are so fully recognized by the Post Office authorities that no exertions will be wanting on our part to bring the negotiations to which I have referred to a speedy and successful conclusion. It may, perhaps, interest the House to hear that a Congress is to meet in Paris early in October to consider the important subject of an international parcels post; and Mr. Blackwood, the Secretary, and Mr. Benthall, one of the Assistant Secretaries of the Post Office, will represent England at the Congress.

LAW AND POLICE (METROPOLIS)— POLICE CONSTABLE HORSFORD.

MR. CARINGTON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of the Public Prosecutor to take any action in the case of police constable Horsford, No. 275 Y, which was referred to him, according to the public prints, last Wednesday week by Mr. Barstow, a Metropolitan police magistrate?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that the inquiry into the matter was still unfinished, and that the initiatory action in such a case lay with the Attorney General, and not with the Home Office.

PARLIAMENT—THE BUSINESS HOURS OF THIS HOUSE.

MR. BROADHURST asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether, during the coming Recess, the Government will consider and, if possible, adopt some re-arrangement of the business hours of the House, whereby it can adjourn not later than twelve o'clock at night?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, no Members of the House would be more rejoiced than Her Majesty's Government would be if the proposal of the hon. Member could be carried into effect, and we shall be happy during the Recess to consider any suggestion that may be laid before us for the accomplishment of so desirable an object. As yet, however, we have not had any suggestion brought under our notice which appears likely to result in enabling the House to rise at the hour mentioned.

MR. BROADHURST said, that in the event of no step in the direction he had indicated being taken by Her Majesty's Government, he begged to give Notice that, early next Session, he would call the attention of the House to the subject, and would move a Resolution.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN hoped that, in connection with the subject, the noble Lord would consider the suggestion that had been made, that the Session should be held from November to May, instead of from February to August.

CENSUS (IRELAND) 1881—EMPLOYMENT OF CONSTABULARY.

MR. W. CORBET asked the Secretary to the Treasury, with reference to the Bills for the taking of the Census of 1881 in England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively, from which it appears that provision is made for the appointment and payment of a special staff of district registrars, enumerators, and other persons in England and Scotland, while in Ireland the account of the population is to be taken by—

Sir John Hay

"Such officers and men of the police force of Dublin Metropolis and of the Royal Irish Constabulary as the Lord Lieutenant shall direct ;"

Whether the police and constabulary so employed will be paid for their services, and at the same rate of pay, as those persons who perform the like duties in England and Scotland ; and, whether he will introduce such amendments into the Irish Bill as will place it on an equal footing in that respect with the English and Scotch measures ?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH :

Sir, it is not considered necessary to provide any special rates of remuneration to the Dublin Police and the Royal Irish Constabulary for taking the Census ; but, as in 1871, the ordinary allowances for extra pay and nightly allowance will probably be made to them. In 1871 these allowances amounted to 6*d.* and 1*s.* 6*d.* respectively. They are now 1*s.* and 2*s.* 6*d.* I may remind the hon. Member that the whole cost of the Constabulary and the greater part of the cost of the Dublin Police is charged upon Imperial funds, and that they are both under the sole charge of the Government. This is not the case in England, where, therefore, provision has to be made for a special staff. The discipline and intelligence of the Constabulary and Police render them particularly suited for employment upon this service.

Afterwards,

MR. SEXTON said, he observed that the Census (Ireland) Bill was down for the Committee stage that day. As the Bill might not come on till a very late hour that night, or rather an early hour to-morrow morning, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill, if he would now intimate for the convenience of hon. Members whether the Government intended to adhere to the novel provision in Clause 10, placing the direction of the Census entirely in the hands of a Protestant official, or whether they would agree to the appointment of a Catholic gentleman to share in the direction of the Census ?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he was glad the hon. Member had asked the Question. The Government had given very careful consideration to the matter referred to in the question, and they had decided that it would be best to revert to the arrangement pursued on former occasions. He, therefore, hoped that the Bill would be allowed to proceed without any further opposition.

LAW AND POLICE—THE LICHFIELD ELECTION.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the following account appearing in the "Birmingham Daily Post" of Saturday July 24th :—

"Lichfield. An Election Assault Case. At the City Police Court, on Thursday, before the Mayor (Alderman Morgan) and Messrs. Coxon, Hinckley, and McLean, an assault case arising out of the recent election was heard. Henry Baker summoned Patrick Lafferty for assaulting him in Bore Street on the evening of the 15th instant. There was a large crowd present during the affray, and many witnesses were prepared to give evidence in defence, but were not allowed. One witness, however, testified that he heard Alderman Coxon inciting Baker to fight, and saw him strike at someone with a stick ; but, missing his aim, hit Baker instead, who fell and received his injuries. Alderman Coxon, retaining his seat on the bench, denied that he did anything of the kind, and said he had no stick in his hands. He continued then to adjudicate upon the case, and finally the magistrates, refusing to adjourn the case in order to allow Lafferty to obtain a solicitor, sentenced him to a month's hard labour, without the option of a fine."

If he is aware that two of the magistrates who adjudicated in the case were seriously implicated in the proceedings which were investigated in the course of the trial of the Election Petition before Mr. Justice Lush and Mr. Justice Manisty ; that the evidence of one of them, Alderman Coxon, on an important matter of fact, was rejected by the Judges, and that the other, Mr. Hinckley, was severely censured for conduct described by Mr. Justice Lush as—

"Approaching dangerously near to the line which separated legitimate from illegitimate influences, if it did not overstep it ;"

And, whether, considering the partizan character of the bench, and the degree of punishment awarded for the offence, he will not institute an immediate investigation, with a view to the mitigation of the punishment and the release of Lafferty from prison ?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he was still prosecuting inquiries into this matter, and especially with regard to the allegation that one of the convicting magistrates was himself engaged in the affray. At present, however, he had not sufficient information on the subject to make a statement with regard to it to the House.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN, having been written to on the subject, expressed a hope that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would arrive at a speedy conclusion with reference to it, seeing that the defendant was undergoing imprisonment.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)
ACT, 1878—PHOENIX PARK, DUBLIN.

MR. ION HAMILTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is prepared to recommend the Privy Council to declare Phoenix Park to be an infected area, in consequence of the number of cases of pleuro-pneumonia which have occurred there since the 15th of May, and in accordance with the expressed opinions of the Guardians of the North Dublin Union (acting as the local authority under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act), that it ought to be restricted; and, if he will state whether, in his opinion, Section 48, Clause E, of the Animals Order, relied on by the veterinary department in depriving the said local authority of all control over the park, is consistent with Section 27 of "The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878," which provided for animals in transit only?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, with the assent, or rather by the advice of the authorities in Dublin, I shall recommend to the Irish Privy Council that the Phoenix Park be declared an infected area. I think the time has come for that. There are no inconsistencies between the numerous Orders issued under the sections of the Act to which the hon. Member refers. If the hon. Member refers to them, he will find that they provide not only for animals in transit, but for animals in places not in the occupation, nor under the control, of their owners.

TREATY OF BERLIN—MOBILIZATION OF THE GREEK ARMY.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF (for Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that Her Majesty's Government have withdrawn their recommendations to the Government of Greece in favour of a quiescent policy; and whether in consequence orders have been issued for the mobilization of the Greek Army?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government having been informed that it was the intention of the Greek Government to issue a proclamation calling out the reserves and mobilizing the Army, Her Majesty's Minister at Athens was instructed, on the 7th of July, to inform the Greek Government that they considered that step premature. In consequence of that communication, which was supported by the French Government, the Greek Minister for Foreign Affairs stated that he would recommend that the publication of the proclamation should be delayed until after the Turkish answer had been received. Her Majesty's Government were informed that similar advice had been tendered by the Governments of Austria and Germany. As, however, it appeared that, on the 28th ultimo, all the Great Powers, except England, had withdrawn their objections to the mobilization, Her Majesty's Government were unwilling to incur the responsibility of imposing their advice upon the Greek Government or to press them any further to abstain from issuing the proclamation, if they thought it necessary to do so. The Greek Government state that their object in desiring to proceed with the mobilization forthwith is to retain in the ranks the trained soldiers whose time of service would otherwise expire.

HACKNEY CARRIAGES (METROPOLIS)
—THE FOUR-MILE RADIUS.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If, considering the extension of the metropolis since the radius of four miles from Charing Cross was fixed as the distance regulating the fares of hackney carriages, and the inconvenience resulting to persons residing beyond that radius, he would be prepared to extend it to five or five and a-half miles?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had taken the opinion of the Commissioner of Police on this matter; and he was very strongly of opinion that the effect of such an alteration would be to diminish, rather than increase, the convenience of the public, as cabs would cease to ply in the suburbs.

Sir William Harcourt

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—APPOINTMENT OF SCHOOL INSPECTORS.

MR. FIRTH asked the Vice President of the Council, When the last appointment of School Inspectors was made, and how many Inspectors were then appointed?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, Treasury sanction to employ six additional Inspectors was asked for by the Department on the 8th of December, 1879, and given by the Treasury on the 17th of April, 1880. On the 19th of April, 1880, the Lord President nominated the eight candidates whom he had selected; they were formally appointed by the Queen in Council on the 3rd of May, and gazetted on the 14th of May, 1880.

AFGHANISTAN — WITHDRAWAL OF THE TROOPS FROM CABUL.

MR. E. STANHOPE asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether, in view of the calamity which has recently occurred in the neighbourhood of Candahar, it is still the intention of the Government of India to commence at once the withdrawal of the whole of the troops from Cabul; and, if he can inform the House what arrangements, or at any rate whether any arrangements have been made in the course of the negotiations with Abder Rahman for the security of the chiefs and tribes who have given assistance to the British Forces?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, it is undoubtedly the intention of the Government of India, notwithstanding the unfortunate event which occurred recently in the neighbourhood of Candahar, to commence at once the withdrawal of the whole of our troops from Cabul. That intention, I need scarcely inform the House—though I am happy to be able to have this opportunity of contradicting an impression which some of the correspondents of the newspapers appear to labour under—has not been formed in consequence of the defeat at Candahar, but is one which has long been determined on by Her Majesty's Government, and which the circumstances which have occurred at Candahar do not, in the opinion of the Government of India, render it necessary to modify in any respect. The House will, I think, be glad to know that the withdrawal from Cabul is being made with the entire assent and concurrence of General Stewart, who is, as I before stated, in supreme political as well as military command. I will, with the permission of the House, read one or two extracts from a private telegram of General Stewart, to show how completely he concurs in the policy which dictates this movement. On the 5th of August General Stewart telegraphed to the Viceroy—

“All our objects here have been attained, and nothing remains to be done but to hand over Cabul to the Ameer, who is naturally anxious to establish himself in his capital and to bring his Government into working order. Politically, the withdrawal from Cabul now would be well timed, and that we shall leave Cabul on the day fixed for that purpose two months ago. The state of affairs at Candahar renders it highly necessary that we should avail ourselves of the present opportunity, while the country remains quiet and free from complication.”

I think it would also be satisfactory to the House that I should read the last telegrams we have received. The Viceroy telegraphed yesterday—

“I believe the withdrawal to Gandamak of the troops, and Roberts's march to Ghuznee will be without any opposition whatever. Candahar news has necessarily caused much excitement, but we have counteracted it, and yesterday I received most friendly letters from Mahommed Jan and Muski Alam.”

To-day the Viceroy telegraphs—

“Major White, the Military Secretary to the Viceroy, having joined his regiment, the 92nd Highlanders, with Roberts's Division, reports—‘Magnificent force; could go anywhere.’”

In reply to the latter part of the Question, I may state that, from telegrams which I have received, I have no doubt whatever that arrangements are being made for the security of the Chiefs and the Tribes who have given assistance to the British Forces. What these arrangements are, even if I were perfectly informed of them, I should not think it desirable to publish at the present moment; but I wish the House to understand that they are not necessarily arrangements with Abdur Rahman himself, with whom, as I informed the House a few days ago, it has been the policy both of Lord Lytton's Government and that of Lord Ripon to enter into as few negotiations as possible, at present, of any character whatever. I have received no information in corroboration of the intelligence of the capture of Chaman.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked, Whether there was any communication between General Stewart and General Roberts?

SIR HENRY TYLER asked, Whether the opinion of General Roberts was in accordance with that of General Stewart as to the withdrawal from Cabul?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Yes, Sir. General Stewart is now in supreme command, as I have said, and it would not be in accordance with military discipline that an inferior officer should be asked whether his opinion is in opposition to that of his superior or not.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been called to the following facts:—That General Skobelev, with a large Russian army, is now marching through the Turcoman country towards Herat and Afghanistan; that Abdur Rahman, whom we have just recognized as Ameer of Cabul, has been for twelve years a pensioner of the Czar, and an intimate of General Kaufmann, and has refused to come within our lines; that a retreat from Cabul at present is extremely undesirable for the health of the troops, and will leave General Roberts's rear uncovered and deprive him of a base of operations in his march to Candahar; that Ayoub Khan, who has just defeated our forces, is said to have Russian officers with him; that Candahar is in serious peril, and reinforcements can only be advanced with the greatest difficulty; that a British army has never before been ordered to retreat from an enemy's country in face of a severe defeat; and, whether, in view of the above facts, and the probable disastrous effect on our prestige and position in India of a retrograde policy, Her Majesty's Government will at once countermand the order for General Stewart's retreat from Cabul?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, the Questions of the hon. Member are of a somewhat controversial character; but I will endeavour briefly to answer them. He asks whether I am aware that General Skobelev, with a large army, is now marching through the Turcoman country towards Herat and Afghanistan. It is extremely difficult to obtain accurate or reliable information about the Russian Forces in the Turcoman country; but I believe a small, not a large, Russian force is advancing through that country, no doubt towards Herat and Afghanistan, in the same way as General Roberts may be now said to be marching towards Persia or Russian territory. Abdur Rahman, who has been recognized as Ameer of Cabul, has been for 12 years a pensioner of Russia, and I believe he had been intimate with General Kaufmann. I am not aware that he has refused to come within our lines, and I do not think that he has been invited to do so. The retreat from Cabul, in my opinion, is not extremely undesirable for the health of the troops, because the troops will return to Gandamak, which is an extremely healthy position. The retirement to India will certainly not take place until, in the opinion of the military authorities, it can be executed without damage to the health of the troops. The retirement from Cabul will not, I conceive, leave General Roberts's rear more uncovered, or deprive him of a base of operations on his march to Candahar, than if the troops had remained at Cabul. I do not believe it was ever intended to keep up a communication between General Roberts and General Stewart at Cabul. I am not aware that Ayoub Khan has Russian officers with him. Candahar, no doubt, is in serious peril, and reinforcements are advancing. I trust they will arrive there before long. The British Army is not, in my opinion, retreating from an enemy's country in the face of a severe defeat, as General Roberts and General Phayre are advancing to meet the enemy. Under these circumstances, I do not think the execution of what I have already stated as having long been the deliberate policy of Her Majesty's Government is in any way discreditable to the British Army.

MR. ONSLOW asked, who would have the supreme command at Candahar when General Primrose had been relieved by Generals Roberts and Phayre?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: General Primrose, I believe.

MR. OTWAY said, he would like to know whether the noble Lord was correct in saying that when the forces of General Roberts and General Primrose joined General Primrose would be the commander? That reply did not correspond with one given the other day, and the answer given to that Question was regarded by many as of the utmost importance.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he understood that the Question put to him was, who would be in command when the forces of General Primrose and General Phayre united, and General Primrose would certainly be in command then. He did not understand the question to refer to General Roberts, who could not, under any circumstances, reach Candahar for a considerable time, and he could not say without Notice who would be in command when General Roberts's forces arrived.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT, 1878—CATTLE FROM THE UNITED STATES.

MR. BOURKE asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he can give the House any more information with respect to the importation of beasts from America that were infected with Texan fever?

MR. MUNDELLA, in reply, said, that since he had come into the House he had received from Professor Brown the following communication:—

"As to splenic apoplexy among American cattle at Liverpool, there have been six more cases in the same cargo, and I have sent an Inspector down this afternoon to make inquiries. Meanwhile, I do not apprehend any danger. We shall deal with maimed and diseased parts, and the sanitary authorities at Liverpool, with whom I communicated early on Saturday, destroy all the carcases as unfit for food, so that all is being done to limit the mischief. The Inspectors at ports where American cattle are landed have been warned."

CRIME (IRELAND)—ASSASSINATION AT NEW ROSS.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: May I ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has received any information relative to a very serious outrage perpetrated last evening near New Ross on Mr. Boyd, the Crown Solicitor for Tipperary, and his two sons, one of whom was killed?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I really have no more information on this subject than what the right hon. Gentleman himself possesses through the newspapers. I have, however, received a telegram saying that two gentlemen were shot at. [An hon. MEMBER: Three.] My telegram says two, and that one of them was seriously wounded; but I have not heard of his death. [Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I have received a telegram stating that he has since died.] I am very sorry to hear of it. With respect to the persons concerned in this outrage, they are believed to have been masked.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Has the right hon. Gentleman any information as to Mr. Boyd's assailants having been armed with Enfield rifles with fixed bayonets?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I have no information on the subject. I believe, however, that some old Enfield rifles were sold before the present Government came into Office. I have stopped the sale since.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND)— SUPERANNUATION OF OFFICERS AND SERVANTS.

MR. W. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware of the fact that a distinction exists between England and Ireland in regard to the manner of pensioning Officers and Servants of Lunatic Asylums on retirement, inasmuch as in England they can receive at the end of fifteen years' service a pension amounting to two-thirds of their salaries, under the Lunacy Acts Amendment Act of 1862, while in Ireland they must have served forty years before they can receive an equal amount; whether he is aware that the Clause in the Superannuation Act of 1859, which provides that when professional qualifications are necessary for the holding of any office the Lords of the Treasury may by Warrant direct that in computing the retired allowance of any person so specially qualified a number of years not exceeding twenty be added to the number of years he may have actually served, does not apply to the Medical Officers of Lunatic Asylums in Ireland as their salaries are not paid out of the Consolidated Fund; and, whether he will take steps to place the Officers and Servants of Lunatic Asylums in Ireland, when incapacitated by age or infirmity to perform their duties, on an equal footing in regard to pensions with their brethren in England?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, the English Act of 1862, to which the hon. Member refers, provides that 15 years shall be the minimum period to entitle to a pension; but it does not say that after that period the officer shall be entitled to a pension equal to two-thirds of his salary. So much for England. In Ireland those officers are treated as civil servants. Their superannuation is regulated on the principle of the Superannuation Act of 1859. They must serve for 30 years to be entitled to a pension equal to two-thirds of their salary. The Government are empowered to add a number of years' service for special qualification. I cannot state at present that the Government will bring in a Bill to increase the salaries of lunatic asylum officers in Ireland. I must first have information that the ratepayers would be willing to have a charge imposed on them for the purpose.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked the Secretary of State for India, whether he could inform the House when the Burials Bill and the Hares and Rabbits Bill would be taken, and which would have precedence?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I promised last week that I would to-day state, as fully as I could, what arrangements the Government propose for the Business this week, and as far as we are able to see in advance. We have, I need hardly say, very carefully examined the state of the Business before the House, and particularly the Business for which we are responsible. We are extremely unwilling to ask the House to make any unusual sacrifices of time and energy; but we have felt, at the same time, that we should not be justified in abandoning the measures we have brought forward, which we believe to be for the advantage of the country, and for the passing of which we think there are opportunities at present which might not recur in subsequent Sessions. I have, therefore, to state our proposals with regard to the principal measures of the Government. First, as to the Employers' Liability Bill, the House expended a great deal of time and labour in Committee on that Bill last week, and I am quite sure that there are very few Members who would be disposed to waste that time and labour, or to abandon that Bill. I, therefore, hope it may not be necessary to consume much more of the time of the House for its further consideration. According to present arrangements, the Report of Amendments in Committee will be considered on Friday at the Morning Sitting. Next, there is the Hares and Rabbits Bill, which, as the House is aware, was read a second time without a division; and I do not think the House would be disposed to abandon a measure, the principle of which it has accepted without any difference of opinion. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary is also, I believe, prepared to propose some Amendments in the Bill, which, he believes, will make it more acceptable to the House, and remove a good deal of the opposition which has been entertained to some of its details. We propose, therefore, to take the consideration of that Bill in Committee to-morrow at the Morning and Evening Sitzings. With respect to the Burials Bill, although no progress has been made with that measure in this House, the House is aware it has been passed by the House of Lords. As was pointed out some time ago by my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury, it may, therefore, be possible to defer the consideration of the details of that measure till towards the close of the Session; but we think it is desirable that the House should have as early an opportunity as we can arrange of expressing its opinion on the principle of the Bill. We propose, therefore, to take the second reading of the Burials Bill on Thursday next. Much of the remainder of the Business which has to be transacted by the House before it can rise, as the House will be aware, is of a character which does not admit of postponement. A great many of the remaining measures and much of the remaining Business are such as must be disposed of before the conclusion of the Session. There are the Census Bill and the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill, which it is absolutely necessary should be passed. There is also a considerable part of the Estimates which have not yet been voted, and we propose to take them to-day and on Monday next: and, of course, afterwards, on as many days as may be necessary. There is also the Indian Budget or Financial Statement, and I propose that that should be taken on Tuesday week. There are likewise the Commissions to inquire into bribery in certain boroughs, which must be moved before the close of the Session. With regard to other legislation, the Merchant Shipping (Chain

Mr. W. E. Forster

Cargoes) Bill, although not in the category of measures which it is absolutely essential to pass, may be very nearly placed in the same category, for I think a promise has been given, and very great disappointment would not unnaturally be felt if another winter were allowed to go by without an attempt being made to legislate on this subject. I have reason to believe that the Bill before the House is not one that will encounter much opposition, and I trust that the House may be able to pass it. There then remain two measures of considerable importance—the Savings Banks Bill and the Post Office Money Orders Bill. These are, I do not say measures which it is absolutely necessary to pass; but I believe that in the state in which they now are there is very little opposition to them, and very little time would be saved by their abandonment. And, therefore, while I do not pretend that they are Bills of so immediate and pressing importance as those which I have previously enumerated, the Government do not propose, at all events at present, to abandon them, and I trust it may not be necessary that they should be abandoned. The Business which I have already referred to must, I am afraid, in any circumstances occupy the time of the House for a considerable period. I believe it is not necessary that that period should be an extremely long one. I believe, if the House is disposed to devote itself with energy and without unnecessary discussion to the consideration of this Business, it may be got through within some not altogether unreasonable time. But, at the same time, I must frankly admit that the Business that I have referred to is of so extensive a character that it is impossible at present to fix, or to attempt to fix, any day on which we can with certainty look forward to the close of the Session. I can only say that, as far as the Government are concerned, they will do their utmost to bring their measures and their Business before the House in such a manner as to enable the House to consider it in as short a time as possible, and I trust that the House will give us as much assistance as is in its power in the way of preventing and curtailing unnecessary and superfluous discussion. I regret that I am not able at the present moment to indicate in a way satisfactory to the House some time for the certain termination of its labours. I have, however, frankly intimated what is the state of Business, and I will give the House all the information that is at present in my power.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to put a Question or two to the noble Lord. He did not mention the Vaccination Bill. Is that measure to be proceeded with?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No, Sir. We shall not proceed with it this Session.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The noble Lord has mentioned that the Home Secretary proposes to move certain Amendments of an important character in the Hares and Rabbits Bill, and that we are to be asked to take that Bill tomorrow. I think it would have been a great convenience if those Amendments had been placed on the Paper, so that we might have considered them. But, as that has not been done, I would ask the Home Secretary whether he could not now, without inconvenience, mention the character of those Amendments? The noble Lord has not told us when the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill will be proceeded with, nor what Business is to be taken on Wednesday.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was sorry that the Amendments to the Hares and Rabbits Bill were not on the Paper that morning. During the period when it was supposed that there would be a Sitting on Saturday, he had imagined he could have put them down on Saturday, so that they should appear on Monday's Paper. He had endeavoured to ascertain the views of as many Members as possible on that subject, and it was only on Friday that he was able to come to what he thought was a satisfactory conclusion upon it. The Amendments would, however, be in print that night, and would appear on the Paper. Generally, he might say that he had ascertained that some further limitations with reference to authorized agents were desired, and that would be the object of one of the Amendments. He found, also, that a desire was expressed—he thought at the Norwich Chamber of Agriculture—as to certain concessions which the farmers seemed willing to make. One of them was that there should be a prohibition against shooting at night time. That appeared to be a reasonable thing, and it would be included in the Amendments. There was also an objection taken, in connection with pheasants and foxes, to traps above ground. That seemed also a reasonable thing. He was not much in favour of spring traps in any circumstances, and he thought that an Amendment might be proposed on that point. Another and most important Amendment was one that affected moorland and waste and uncultivated land. The object of the Bill was, of course, mainly the protection of cultivated land, arable, and valuable grass land. He had been in communication with many Members who were interested in moorland especially, and he found that a limitation of the period of shooting was generally suggested by them—namely, from the 11th of December, that was to say, after grouse shooting ceased, to the end of March, which was the time for the nesting of grouse commencing—would also be a reasonable limitation. These were the substance of the Amendments which would be submitted to the House in Committee on the Bill.

MR. HINDE PALMER asked what would be the Business on Wednesday?

MR. GORST asked the noble Lord, Whether the Corn Returns Bill was to be proceeded with; and whether, seeing the Government seemed determined to persevere with the measures he had mentioned, they would abandon any further proposals for Saturday Sittings?

MR. W. HOLMS asked, when it was proposed to take the discussion on the second reading of the Endowed Schools (Scotland) Bill?

MS. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, the noble Lord on Friday last held out a hope of being able to promise him some facilities for the discussion of his Motion on Turkey. He should be glad to know when there was any probability of his being able to bring on the Motion.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked, whether any facilities would be afforded for a discussion of his Motion in regard to "hereditary and irresponsible legislators," whose action had now caused troops to be poured into Ireland to preserve peace and maintain a law which Her Majesty's Advisers had declared to be harsh and unjust?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, in reference to the Business on Wednesday, that must, of course, depend upon the progress made on Tuesday;

Sir William Harcourt

but if the Committee on the Hares and Rabbits Bill is finished to-morrow, as I hope it may be, we propose on Wednesday to take the Post Office Money Orders Bill, the Grain Cargoes Bill, and the English and Scotch Census Bill. The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) asked me about the Corn Returns Bill, and my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade informs me that this is a Bill which has been brought forward at the request of some part of the agricultural community; but it is not a Bill which can be persevered with in the face of opposition. We should be very glad to proceed with it; but much will depend upon the nature of the opposition. I have been asked a Question as to the intention of the Government with regard to Saturday Sittings; but I should not like at this time to make any pledge with regard to them; but if the House desires to proceed with any Business on Saturday, the Government, of course, will not be disposed to stand in the way. Until we can form a more definite opinion as to the probable end of the Session, it would not be right to press the House to meet on Saturday. As to whether I shall be able to give the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) an opportunity of discussing Afghan affairs—[MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Turkish affairs.] Turkish affairs. I have already stated the arrangements till to-morrow week, and I do not think it is possible to forecast arrangements beyond that time. No doubt, before the close of the Session, the hon. Member will have opportunities upon going into Supply of raising that question; but I do not think it is possible to name a day at the present moment.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE complained that the noble Lord had neglected to answer the Question of the right hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) with regard to the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill. He should like to ask when the Universities and Colleges Acts Bill would be proceeded with?

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL should like to know whether the present arrangement of the noble Lord with regard to the Indian Budget would be adhered to?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR mentioned that the noble Lord had not answered his question with reference to hereditary and irresponsible legislators.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that before the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India replied to the Question of the hon. Member for Galway, he would ask the noble Lord, whether he was aware that proposals to assail the existing form of government in these Kingdoms were strictly forbidden by the Home Rule programme, that the Home Rule Constitution explicitly recognized "King, Lords, and Commons," and that, accordingly, the Motion of the hon. Member for Galway had not received any kind of consent or authorization from the Home Rule Party?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he did not think it possible to fix a day this week for the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill. The same answer must apply to the hon. Member for Galway. He was afraid it was impossible, for some considerable time, to give him any facilities for bringing on his Motion.

In reply to Mr. W. HOLMS,

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, there was opposition to the Education Endowments (Scotland) Bill; but it was hoped a great deal of that opposition would be removed. Without that, he was afraid it would be impossible to pass the Bill this Session.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, with regard to the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill, he should like to know when the Return ordered in May as to the number of votes disallowed on account of improper marking would be presented?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he would inquire about it.

MR. ONSLOW asked, Whether the Indian Budget would be taken at the Morning Sitting on Tuesday, and whether the House would meet at 4 o'clock?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: At the Morning Sitting.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART.

(1.) £58,257, to complete the sum for the British Museum.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE said, he wished to call the attention of the Committee, for a few moments, to that Vote. In the first place, there had been an increase in expenditure which could be easily explained. There had been an increase in the special purchase of the Grace's Collection of prints and drawings; there had been an increase also in the classified catalogues; and there had been—and he said it with very great pleasure—an increase in the number of visitors and readers at the Museum, and that not only in one department but in many. The number had advanced from some 620,000 to 780,000, the increase principally being in the reading and sculpture rooms. The Trustees had also provided for the electric light, in order to enable readers to have the benefit of the use of the library, not only in the winter evenings, but during such times as fogs occurred; and it was only due to the officers of the Museum to state that they had done all in their power to provide accommodation for the increased number of readers and others. It was a matter of great satisfaction to them to find the Museum in so excellent a condition; but there was still greater satisfaction to the Trustees, and he was sure also to the Committee, in the fact that the buildings at South Kensington had been so far completed as to allow of the transfer of some Collections being already commenced. It would be satisfactory to the Committee to learn that three Collections—namely, the botanical, geological, and mineralogical—would be transferred completely and entirely, if not before the end of this year, at any rate in the opening of next year. As regarded the Zoological Collection, he thought he must appeal to the Government, as it was really a matter of great importance to be liberal in their grant for the purposes of the transfer of that Collection. The Committee ought to know that the transfer of the Collections—not merely their removal, but the furniture and fittings connected with them—would amount to about £177,500, or, say, £180,000. Out of that Estimate, three sums of £20,000, making altogether £60,000, had been expended; but if the transfer was completed, a much larger sum would necessarily be required in the ensuing year, and he hoped it would be forthcoming. Under those circumstances, he appealed to the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury to consider carefully whether he could not provide a liberal grant, in order to facilitate the removal of the Zoological Collection, so that the whole Natural History Collection might, as soon as possible, be arranged in its new home.

MR. STORY - MASKELYNE said, before that Vote was passed he should like to ask a question which he had previously put on the Paper. It was as to whether the Government adhered to their resolution not to provide residences at the new Museum for some of their officers? It was not an extravagant request that two or three residences should be provided, and he asked for them on what he believed to be reasonable grounds. In the first place, there was the question of custody. At present they intrusted the keeping of the Museum to the police; but there was no accommodation for any officer at the Natural History Museum. He thought it was necessary that someone should be on the premises to exercise superintendence in case of a catastrophe such as fire or burglary. He wished to ask, whether the resolution of the Government was final and irrevocable as regarded residences? and before adverting to the Collections, he should like to say one word on behalf of the gentlemen of the Museum, who deserved something at the hands of that Committee. The officers of the Museum were not highly paid, considering they were men of high accomplishments. While they cheerfully accepted that position, they had a right, at any rate, to residences, so far as these were a part of the terms of their employment by the Trustees. It was understood that an officer, under certain circumstances, as his turn came to him, might refuse or accept a house. At the present moment, one of the gentlemen who was attached to a section that was removed to South Kensington had a house at Bloomsbury. He apprehended that if he were turned out from there he would be provided with another. He wished to remind the Government of that, because he thought they might well re-consider the judgment he had understood them to have given in the matter. He wished to say one word upon another subject. He was an old officer of the Museum, and felt a deep interest in all things connected with it. Three whole Collections, and part of another one, were being transferred to the new Museum, and in the transfer of the Collection of Minerals not a single specimen—and he knew them individually—had thus far received any injury. He thought this redounded greatly to the credit of the officers, who had transferred a great Collection of very delicate specimens so carefully to their new home. Those officers had, by being there at 6 o'clock in the morning and working hard, got so far forward with their task that he believed they would get the whole Collection in before September. He referred then particularly to the Mineralogical Collection. The Botanical and Zoological had not advanced so far in the matter of removal, but they were in a forward state. He wished to refer to one matter which he believed his right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Spencer Walpole) had not alluded to. He wished to refer to the great success of the electric light at the Museum. [Mr. SPENCER WALPOLE said, he had alluded to that subject.] He (Mr. Story-Maskelyne) regretted that the remarks which fell from the right hon. Gentleman had not reached him. He would say that the light in the public Library was perfect, as regarded comfort; and he thought that the country owed something to the principal Librarian—Mr. Bond—for the promptitude with which he had adopted the electric light for the benefit of readers, and to the Trustees, who had so energetically carried out the proposal. He trusted that those officers of the Museum who were entitled, prospectively, to residences as they fell vacant, would, on being transferred to South Kensington, be provided with them.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, he wished to ask his right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Spencer Walpole) one question. About three or four years ago he ventured to impress upon him—and he had been asked to do so by a large number of people—the absolute necessity there was of providing some refreshment place within the British Museum. Ladies and others who remained there at work or study during the day for a considerable time had no opportunity of getting anything, for except at a public-house there was no refreshment place in the neighbourhood. The right hon. Gentleman said previously that there was no space in the Museum, but that they would consider the matter. He gave him (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) then to understand that by this new arrangement more space would be available in the building, and that he would say another year whether a room could not be allotted for that purpose. He, therefore, would take that opportunity of asking him the question; because, as he understood it, Collections had been moved away, and were still being moved away, to South Kensington, and that that removal would probably last till the spring of next year. If that were so, he thought the present a favourable opportunity to impress again upon him that the accommodation, which so many had asked for, might be provided.

Mr. Spencer Walpole

MR. RYLANDS said, that he took a great interest in the Museum; but he did not think that it was necessary to keep duplicate specimens in a general Collection of that kind. He was hardly able to justify to himself what the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury had put forward in regard to the expenditure of that Museum. If that Institution was in any way unduly restricted as regarded funds for the purpose of purchasing valuable specimens that might be necessary to complete the Collections, that House ought not, he thought, to be grudging in granting those funds. So far as he himself was concerned, he should say that an expenditure of the national funds for such a purpose was an expenditure of a perfectly justifiable character. They ought not to debar the Trustees from obtaining possession of valuable specimens in the various branches of art and science, simply because they wished to refrain from spending money. On that account, he could not agree with what had previously fallen from the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) as regarded that subject. With regard to the disposal of duplicate specimens, he wished to point out to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Spencer Walpole) and the other representatives of the British Museum that while, he believed, a great number of the people of this country would consent cheerfully to grant money for the purposes of that great Institution, they felt that its advantages were enjoyed principally by residents in the Metropolis, and that it was, practically, of little service to the inhabitants of other parts of the Kingdom. The inhabitants of the Metropolis, having the great advantage of the Museum Collections, it did seem to him that they ought to be willing to assist the large centres and larger towns in the country, where Museums had been established, principally by the munificence of private benefactors, by supplying them with the duplicate specimens of the British Museum. Of course, in the first instance, Edinburgh and Dublin should be attended to, and then such places as Manchester, Liverpool, and Birmingham, and afterwards the smaller towns, where Museums had been established. It was of the greatest possible consequence that those central Institutions should, while being supported with liberality by the country, also be of considerable assistance to the different localities in other parts of the Kingdom. He ventured to submit those views to the Committee; and if the Trustees would come down and ask the Secretary to the Treasury for larger grants for such purposes as he had referred to, he was quite sure that the Committee would be willing to vote what might be necessary. Such Institutions ought not to be dealt with parsimoniously by that Committee; but, on the other hand, they should receive the most liberal support. He regretted that the hon. Member for Cricklade (Mr. Story-Maskelyne) had, instead of going, in the first instance, to the Trustees, come down to the Committee and impressed upon them the necessity of making additional advantages to the salaried officers of the Institution. He must say he regretted that Committee of Supply should be employed as a means of bringing pressure to bear upon Members of the Government for an increase in salaries. [MR. STORY-MASKELYNE: The hon. Member misunderstood my remarks.] He begged the hon. Gentleman's pardon; but he quite understood from him that there were two causes of complaint. One was that some of them ought to have residences. If there was any officer of the Museum then in possession of a residence, he quite agreed that if he was required to remove to South Kensington he should be still furnished with a residence in some form or other. But he understood that the hon. Gentleman went further than that, and said that certain officers who had not residences already should have them, and also, further than that, an increase of salary

MR. STORY-MASKELYNE said, he believed the hon. Gentleman had mistaken what he said. What he had said was, that certain officers had residences, and he mentioned the case of a Natural History officer who had one at Bloomsbury, and that such residences were part of the understanding with the Trustees, and as they fell vacant so they were occupied in turn. It was part of the salary then, or, at any rate, of a prospective salary; and as many of the officers would be removed to South Kensington, he thought it would only be fair to them to supply them with residences in their time and turn. He had certainly not asked for any addition in the salaries.

MR. RYLANDS said, that would, no doubt, be considered by the Trustees. But he thought the hon. Gentleman had referred to increase of salary. [MR. STORY-MASKELYNE: No!] Then he begged the hon. Gentleman's pardon. But, at any rate, he had pointed out that the Trustees representing the British Museum had found it necessary, in consequence of the removal of certain Collections to South Kensington, that certain officers should be sent with those Collections, and that, by so doing, those who were entitled prospectively to residences would be placed at a disadvantage. What the Committee ought not to do was quite evident—namely, to provide residences for those who did not at present enjoy them. In regard to the recommendation of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cricklade, he wished to say that he looked with some jealousy upon pressure being brought in Committee of Supply in order to increase the advantages of officers of the Public Service. Such recommendations should be made to the Trustees, and not to the Committee; because he knew the difficulties which surrounded the Government on account of pressure going on all round to increase the salaries of the Public Departments. He apologized for detaining the Committee, and begged the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Spencer Walpole) to consider what he had stated.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that on behalf of the Trustees, he thanked his hon. Friend for the expression of confidence in them. He would also thank him for the liberal view with which he regarded the claim of the Museum upon the State for assistance. It was with great pleasure that he remembered that when questions, such as a grant for the British Museum, came before the Committee, his hon. Friend always was in favour of liberality in dealing with such objects of national interest. He must say, however, that he appeared to be rather hard upon the hon. Member for Cricklade. He would not enter into the question his hon. Friend the Member for Cricklade had raised; but he would say that he did not think that he had gone beyond his province as a Member of that House. On the contrary, much as he regretted his loss at the Museum, still he could not help feeling that he had brought into that House with him an amount of knowledge on the most interesting questions which the hon. Member for Burnley, with all his knowledge and culture, could hardly lay claim to. His hon. Friend had taken that opportunity of raising the question of supplying certain officers with lodging. Whether right or wrong in his proposition, this was clearly the time for him to refer to the subject. He would assure the Committee, though he felt confident his hon. Friend the Member for Cricklade required no assurance, that the Trustees were, in all respects, most anxious to deal most liberally and generously with those exceedingly eminent men whose services they had been fortunate enough to secure. With regard to the question of duplicates, which had twice that evening been before the House, the question of the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) had been already answered by his noble Friend the Secretary to the Treasury. They were all desirous that the treasures, such as the Museum possessed, should be as widely useful as possible to the whole country. But, after all, it came to the question whether Mahomet should go to the mountain or the mountain should go to Mahomet. As regarded the distribution of duplicates, of course, if there were genuine duplicates which could be spared from South Kensington, or Bloomsbury, by all means let them be sent to Manchester or elsewhere. But nothing was more delusive than the uncultured idea of what a duplicate was. What, then, was the Museum in its character? Was it a place to go and spend a Bank Holiday at, or to stroll about and pick up the merest smattering of learning; or was it a great encyclopædia of knowledge, by which information was to be gained on important subjects by that inductive process which could only be carried out by a wide examination of a large number of specimens, and then communicated to the world by students to whom such study was indispensable for their mission? He was sure that everyone who respected science or archæology would say it was the latter. The consequence was that any Collection that was really valuable must contain an infinite number of outwardly similar specimens. Such specimens were not duplicates, but varying specimens. They had a very great ostensible similitude; but they were not really identical, while it was the minuteness of the variations which made them valuable. The only way to obtain real knowledge on such a subject was by comparing specimens which varied most minutely, and which might appear to the uncultured eye to be identical. It was the same with books. There might be, for instance, two copies of a book in a great public library. Such a library was not only a reading-room, but an illustrated history of printing. Take, for instance, the familiar example of Hobbes' Leviathan. The casual visitor to some public library might note that there were two copies of the first edition of the Leviathan there. The gentleman from a provincial town then might say—"What a waste; why not give one of those copies away to us?" The reason was, that a remarkable difference in the frontispiece of this edition made the possession of two copies necessary to any first class library. The great allegorical figure which represented despotic power appeared in the frontispiece of some copies with the lineaments of Charles I., in others, with those of Cromwell. He quoted that easily explained instance, as he was a book collector himself, in explanation of the fallacy with regard to duplicate specimens of all kinds, which were, in fact, analogous specimens, the manifold varieties of which it was the work of scientific men to examine. But then what was to be done to meet the reasonable wants of provincial towns? There was no doubt what was the right thing to do—to take advantage of the aids which modern science gave for literal reproduction. There were the electrotypes, which enabled the rarest coins in the world to be reproduced with a similarity which would deceive anyone but the student; and the autotype, which enabled the rarest prints to be reproduced; and the old process of casting, which gave the absolute reproduction of the sculpture of all ages. Let the Treasury grant to the British Museum and the South Kensington Museum the means of reproducing these copies as minutely and perfectly as possible, and let them be sown broadcast over the country; but let the Collections of originals be kept at some central place as a great school of study. Make an exhibition of specimens in a place where the learners and teachers of the world might congregate to study completely all arts and sciences, which they could not do if the originals, which were their learning books, were distributed amongst the galleries in every provincial town.

Mr. Rylands

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, he could assure the Committee that great dissatisfaction existed in the Provinces and in the great centres of industry with the management of the British Museum; and he did not think there would be satisfaction in that matter until the British Museum was put under similar management to that of the South Kensington Museum. Unsuccessful applications had been made for assistance to the British Museum for help to these centres of industry which had to provide their own Collections of Art. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope) had spoken of Mahomet having to go to the mountain. That, he supposed, meant millions of people in different parts of the country who had need of study must come to London. But that was impossible. The people in the Provinces, although they could not come to London for the purpose of study, in no way begrudged the grants to the British Museum and similar Institutions in London; but the time was coming when such towns as Birmingham, Sheffield, and Manchester would no longer be content to be heavily taxed for those Museums, and yet be denied any help to their own Collections. In Birmingham the people were taxing themselves to the extent of 1*d.* in the pound—that was to say, to the utmost the law would allow—for the purpose of providing an Industrial Museum in the centre of a population of 1,000,000 inhabitants. They had industries absolutely indispensable to the welfare of the country; and yet they had to pay some thousands of pounds in aid of London Museums, while they had only permission from Parliament to tax themselves to the extent of 1*d.* in the pound for their local Museums. The sum of £24,000 had been voted in Birmingham to provide an Art Gallery and Industrial Museum—a very large sum for the people to provide without any aid, especially when they saw the large sums expended in London, and when they were told that the “mob” must come up to London for the purpose of art study, and to enjoy the advantages of institutions provided by their money.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he had withdrawn the word “mob” as soon as uttered, and substituted “people.”

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, he could assure the Committee that there was a great feeling of dissatisfaction on the part of the taxpaying classes in the Provinces at having to vote large sums of money, year after year, for the London Museums; while they had to provide, at their own expense, everything they wanted for themselves in matters connected with Art and Industrial Institutions. But those Collections were not wanted for themselves alone. They were wanted for the benefit of national industries, without which England must go down; and, therefore, it became necessary that they should be established in the centres of men engaged in those industries—in places where they could be studied daily, and where they would assist the various trades to which those men belonged. He trusted, before many years had passed, that the whole management of the British Museum would be thrown, if he might so speak, into more directly representative hands, as was the case with the Museum at South Kensington; and not till then did he believe that the country would be satisfied with the management of that Institution. In the meantime, he would suggest to the Trustees that when the next provincial deputation waited upon them, it should be received with a greater disposition to utilize, for the general good, the great treasures at their command. As he had before pointed out, the people in the Provinces did not begrudge the grants to the British Museum, National Gallery, and South Kensington Museum. On the contrary, they would not object to see them increased, as long as the money was wisely spent. But the time had gone by when a system of art centralization could be continued; and it would, before long, be forced on the Government by the Provinces that the centres of industry, who were taxing themselves to establish Institutions of their own, should receive some aid, in proportion to that taxation, from the central government.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, the hon. Gentleman could hardly have listened to his concluding observations, in which he pointed out that when the Museums had reproduced specimens on a magnificent scale, it would be more favourable to the students of the Provinces that they should study them in one central spot than in isolated specimens.

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, that he thought that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cricklade (Mr. Story-Maskelyne) had done his duty in pointing out that his colleagues were insufficiently rewarded. He wished to speak from another point of view equally representative. Having had the privilege and advantage for years of being a student at the British Museum, he begged to say, on behalf of the readers there, that their wants were also entitled to the consideration of the Trustees, and that if those wants were overlooked by the Trustees they were entitled to the consideration of the House. He would add, from experience of a practical kind, that the Trustees did not always seem to be acquainted with the nature of those wants. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Spencer Walpole) had justly pointed out, as a subject of satisfaction to the Committee, that the number of readers had immensely increased. The Museum was not merely a collection of stuffed birds and beasts, and curious specimens. He reminded hon. Members that it was also the greatest Library in the world, and that its advantages as a place of study were inestimable. For that reason he thought it was the paramount duty of the Committee to see that the wants of the public were sufficiently provided for. Those wants, however, he took the liberty of saying, were not provided for in a proper manner. Two years ago he had pointed out to the Trustees the exceptional and glaring wants which were still to be observed in the Historical Collections of the Museum; and he repeated deliberately, and upon reflection, that there were blanks in them which were a reproach to the literature of the country. Hon. Members had heard, with regret, the recent destruction of the Library of a great Professor. Much as that event was to be deplored, he did not hesitate to say that if there was one thing that would have reconciled that distinguished person to the loss of his unrivalled Collection it was that which was within the grasp of the Trustees of the British Museum, and which, as he knew, they had not lifted a finger to obtain. He referred to the journals of the age, which were in themselves priceless for historical purposes. Yet, day by day, and month after month, he had besought the authorities of the British Museum to stir themselves in that matter. Files of old newspapers were constantly sold in the auction room, and the more they were sold the greater, in his opinion, was the duty of the Trustees to make a complete collection of them. If these records were destroyed, they were irreplaceable. On the other hand, he did not hesitate to say that if they were collected in time they would be of priceless value to the historian. He had represented the importance of this many times, but had never been able to make any impression upon the authorities of the British Museum, many of whom were his personal friends. It appeared to him there was something wanting of a representative character in the Governing Body, one half of whom never went near the Museum. There were amongst the Trustees Prelates and Peers; but what was wanted was the proper inclusion of men of science, letters, and art, who knew the wants of their Profession, and who would be able to suggest and provide remedies for them when necessary. He must not be supposed to say one word personally against the Trustees, who were a most estimable body of men; and if they had all the same zeal for letters as his right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Beresford Hope), and the same experience in business as the Baronet the Member for the London University (Sir John Lubbock), he would be the last man in the world to raise an objection to them as Trustees. But he objected to the Body being constituted by the mere nomination of the Treasury, which conferred the dignity and honour of the Trusteeship of the British Museum on persons who, though they stood well already with regard to their position, wanted still that particular feather of Trusteeship in their cap. In the course of last winter, which was one of extreme discomfort, it had been part of his duty to spend many hours and weeks in the British Museum; and here he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the position of the attendants in the reading room. He had always found these attendants, who, he held, were scandalously underpaid, most attentive to the wants of the readers. They were at all times full of suggestions, aptitude, and readiness to supply the wants of the readers, and were absolutely invaluable to any student in getting through his work. But, as had already been pointed out, the number of readers had enormously increased, and one of the physical results of this was that before the day had gone by the air became completely overused. There was no system of ventilation. Hot air was introduced to counteract the intense cold, and then the windows were thrown open. That state of arrangements would, in itself, appear sufficiently bad; but many of the most persevering readers in the Museum had joined in asking the Trustees for what he would call the miserable permission that the attendants who were obliged to stay in the overused air every day should have the benefit of the Act introduced by his hon. Friend the Member for the London University, and get four days' relief in the course of the year; and, notwithstanding that the proposal was put before the Trustees in the most unexceptional way, this concession was refused. But although the Trustees had not thought fit to improve the position of the attendants, why, he asked, was not something done to make the condition of the readers more comfortable? Owing to the state of the atmosphere, he had himself been frequently compelled to leave the Museum earlier than he intended, perfectly exhausted. This condition of affairs was neither just to the attendants nor to the readers. If men like his hon. Friend the Member for the University of London, who worked with their brains, were appointed to the Trusteeship, they would soon find out what was necessary, and see that it was carried out. He was aware that his hon. Friend had been so appointed; but he was an exception to what ought to be the rule. The requirements of visitors needed the presence of men who understood the working of great Institutions. He concluded by repeating that the officers of the British Museum were ill-paid, and by expressing his opinion that the Historical Collections were deplorably deficient.

Mr. Jesse Collings

MR. MAGNIAC said, he should not have intruded on the Committee, had not the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) given utterance to opinions which showed how much out of harmony were his views with those of other Members who had spoken on the subject of art. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that reproductions were duplicates. Now, he held that to be a cardinal heresy in connection with art. It was, in his opinion, utterly impossible to convey the same idea by a reproduction as was conveyed by an original work. Again, when the right hon. Gentleman spoke of isolated specimens only, he ventured to say that out of the National Collections, at least a dozen Collections could, without difficulty, be formed, and that these might, with great advantage, be distributed throughout the country. Then the right hon. Gentleman seemed to suppose that the persons in the Provinces who desired to benefit by the National Collections were able to come up to London. But that was absolutely impossible. He ventured to say that the views of the right hon. Gentleman were those of bygone times, and that until they succeeded in bringing these Collections to the doors of the working man, so that he might be able to see what could be done, they would utterly lose the benefit of their influence upon his art education. It was only within the last month that a magnificent collection of Japanese silks had been purchased by the French Government for the sole purpose of improving the taste of the workpeople engaged in the French silk manufacture. These Collections should be placed where working men could conveniently examine them. If works of art were to be reproduced, it was absolutely necessary to train the class whose business it was to reproduce them; and without a race of born workmen they could never do this. It was well known that in Paris and Lyons persons were found whose families had worked for hundreds of years on the same branch of art. He hoped that the discussion which had taken place would do good; and thought, at any rate, it would inform the Trustees that views on art were growing up, which had made a strong impression on the minds of the people, who desired that a distribution of artistic works should be made throughout the country. The Collections at Bethnal Green and Manchester were proofs that no niggardly spirit existed in the minds of private persons; and he hoped that an equally liberal spirit would be shown in this respect by the Governing Body of the British Museum.

Mr. W. M. Torrens

MR. DILLON understood there were many duplicates in the Museum. He saw no reason why they should not be presented to the Museums in Edinburgh and Dublin and other large towns, where they would be of the greatest possible service.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK assured the Committee that no one could be more anxious to increase the usefulness of the British Museum than the Trustees themselves, who were always glad of the valuable suggestions thrown out by hon. Members. But in the matter of the sale of prints, he would like to ask what the Trustees were to do? There was offered to them a Collection which was of very great importance and interest; but they were unable to get the grant necessary for the purchase from the Government. Under these circumstances, they decided to make a sale of a less important Collection, in order to procure others which were considered to be of peculiar interest. They would have been very glad to have obtained the money direct from the Treasury; but, failing that, they adopted the course which they thought best for the general interest. They would all agree that the Museum should be as complete and thorough as possible. It had been suggested that the duplicates ought to be distributed amongst the Provincial Museums. The Committee, however, must be mindful not to do anything which would destroy the completeness of the Collection. That would be a most unfortunate thing to do; because, supposing a gentleman came up from Birmingham, or from Manchester, and asked where a particular thing was, he would feel much annoyed to be told that it was at Manchester or at some other place. The country now knew that, so far as they had been able to acquire it, they had got in London the best and most complete Museum in the world. When they came to actual duplicates, there was no doubt they might be distributed without deteriorating the National Collection. But, so far as Natural History was concerned, it was necessary that they should have more than one specimen. To obtain a proper idea of a plant, for instance, it was absolutely necessary to have more than one specimen; they must have a considerable number, in order to study the plant properly. He would not say it was necessary to have more than a certain number. When they got beyond that number they were duplicates, and might be distributed. But the officials had got as much as they could possibly do to classify and name and study the specimens now in the Museum; and the Committee would remember that that was particularly the case at the present moment, because not only had they their ordinary duties in connection with the Museum to fulfil, but in consequence of the removal to South Kensington they had extremely onerous and exceptional duties. He thought the time had come when, in reference to the question of duplicates, they might take a somewhat wider view. They ought to foster and encourage Museums in the large Provincial cities, so that there should hardly be any important place in the United Kingdom which did not possess a Museum. He thought it was possible to start some organization for the supply of type Collections to local Museums. It would be easier for the Department to offer the types to the large cities, rather than the large cities to make their own collection, though it was desirable that the Collections should be added to by Collections made in the locality. It was hardly fair to blame the Trustees or officials because they had not done that already. It was no part of their duty. However important the matter was, it was one which the present staff of the Museum could not possibly carry out without neglecting other duties. Before he sat down, might he be allowed to express the hope that Her Majesty's Government would, during the Recess, consider another question—he alluded to the question of our ancient monuments? The Bill with which his name had been associated was one for the better preservation of ancient monuments, which were, to a certain extent, in the custody of the Trustees of the British Museum. The measure was successful in passing the House of Commons in the spring of this year; but it came to an end in the House of Lords when Parliament was dissolved. But scarcely had the present Parliament assembled when the noble Lord the Member for North Northumberland (Earl Percy) brought forward a Motion on the subject, which seemed to have given rise to some little misapprehension. The noble Lord and the hon. Gentleman who seconded the Motion, and, indeed, all who supported them, were anxious that our ancient monuments should be preserved. Hon. Gentlemen generally, he was persuaded, were similarly anxious, and would, no doubt, as the last Parliament did, approve of the Bill by a large majority. When he (Sir John Lubbock) had the honour to come back to the House, he naturally had to consider whether he should attempt to re-introduce the Bill. But, in a broken Session, it seemed to him useless to make the attempt.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am afraid that if we get up a discussion upon ancient monuments this Vote will not be passed for a considerable time.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he had no desire to enter into the whole question, but simply to express the hope that Her Majesty's Government would consider the question during the Recess. He did not wish to say in what form they ought to consider it. It would not be desirable that he should do so at the present moment; but he thought that as the matter had been intrusted to the Trustees of the British Museum, he would be allowed to express a hope that the Government would take the subject into consideration. In conclusion, he would say that the Trustees would give the various suggestions that had been made their most careful consideration, for their one desire was that the British Museum should continue to be, what it was now, a Museum worthy of this great nation.

MR. PULESTON desired to protest against the course pursued very frequently in the House by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), for he believed that in the management of the British Museum they ought not to be penny wise and pound foolish. It was not pleasant to know that an hon. Member was able to get up in his place and tell them that the Trustees were absolutely obliged to sell a valuable Collection of prints and other things in order to secure possession of another Collection. Yet it was true that in order to get for the Museum a Collection which was deemed too valuable to lose the Trustees had to sell some things of almost equal value. To illustrate further the sad straits to which the Trustees were put, he might mention that a short time ago the very valuable Collection of the United States Consul in Cyprus was offered to them at a price very much below that for which they were afterwards sold in New York. The rumour was that the Trustees regretted so much to have been unable to see their way to purchase the Collection that they were afterwards ready to send, or did send, to New York, with the view of purchasing some of the duplicates at an extravagant price. Such was the statement made at the time, and the reason assigned why the Trustees did not buy this very complete Collection, and one of peculiar interest to us now, was that the Treasury refused to grant the money necessary for the purpose. Finding, subsequently, that they had missed such a valuable opportunity, the Treasury would have been willing to have paid more than double the amount for that portion that came under the denomination of duplicates. Hon. Gentlemen might carry the principle of economy a little too far, and especially when it was applied to so great and conspicuous a National Institution as the British Museum.

MR. HINDE PALMER had only one remark to make, and he thought it would be quite as relevant to the subject under discussion as the question of ancient monuments. A great deal had been said about the working classes having access to the works of art in the Museum. Now, there was another Museum to which that observation more forcibly applied, and that was the Patent Museum at South Kensington. He mentioned this, because he found that in the Vote before them was comprised the Vote towards the Natural History Collection there. When he constantly pressed, in a former Parliament, to have a Patent Museum properly constructed and accessible to the people, he was always told that when a Natural History Museum was built, there would be ample space in the same building for a good Patent Museum. He now wished to ask his right hon. Friend the Vice President (Mr. Mundella) whether he could give them any information as to the progress made?

MR. THOMPSON wished something could be done to instruct a large class of people who visited the Museum. He had noticed that the persons who visited the Museum upon great holidays, like Bank Holiday, were most profoundly ignorant of everything they saw. It was lamentable to see the people wandering through those beautiful halls looking scarcely with any interest upon what they saw, and passing away without having received any information. He ventured to suggest that some persons—the officials, for instance—might take an opportunity, three or four times every day, to explain to the visitors the contents of the rooms over which they presided. He was speaking now on behalf of a large class of people; but he himself had felt the value of instruction such as this. He remembered that, some three or four years ago, he spent about half-an-hour in the jewel room of the Museum. He was leaving, when he was met by an old friend, the attendant in the room. He said to him—“Would you not like to see the things here?” He replied that he had seen nothing to interest him; but the attendant said—“If you will come back, perhaps you will.” He did go back, and the man, by information given in the simplest but most fascinating manner, kept him interested for a couple of hours, and it was with very great regret he left the room at all. He thought that if the officials would make a point of doing this at stated periods, a vast amount of instruction would be imparted in a very familiar way. They knew that now, if a father were to suggest to his son that he should visit the British Museum, he would be answered—“Oh, not to-day, papa.” But if his suggestion were acted upon, such a visit would be a pleasure instead of being, as now, very irksome. Information might be given in a popular and pleasing form, and then a great boon would be conferred upon the people who visited the Museum.

Mr. A. M. SULLIVAN thanked the Trustees of the Museum for a vast and serious improvement they had effected of late years. Some years ago he drew attention to the length of time which was taken in procuring books for the readers who frequented the Library of that Institution. In this matter he spoke on behalf of the vast numbers of Library students and writers to the Public Press who resorted to the reading room of the British Museum, and he maintained that there was no department of that Institution which daily contributed to the public life of the country so much useful information as the reading room. He felt it right to thank the Trustees, through his right hon. Friend (Mr. Spencer Walpole), for the improvement effected in that department. Formerly, the time occupied in procuring a book for a reader was 25 or 30 minutes; but now it had been reduced to 10 or 12 minutes. Nothing but great exertion and organization could have secured that great reform, and what was the result of that great improvement? In 1875, when he called attention to the matter, there were numbers of men who had a couple of hours at their disposal, and would have liked to have spent them in study in the Library of the British Museum; but in consequence of the time occupied in procuring a book they would not go at all. He was able to state that now, since increased facilities had been afforded for study, the attendances in the reading room of the Museum had increased by 30 per cent.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that before the Vote was put, he must reply to one or two questions which had been asked him. In the matter of the sale of duplicates, it was only fair to the Trustees to say that he did not imagine they were anxious for the sale. As they had heard so much about the subject that night, it would be quite possible for hon. Gentlemen to have formed a very exaggerated idea on this point. As he understood it, there was no forced sale of duplicates, and it was only the special circumstances of last year which induced the late Treasury Board and the Trustees to make the sale. Hon. Gentlemen would remember that last year the general expenditure was a little larger than usual, and that it was very inconvenient for the late Government to find additional grants. It seemed to him they were all proud of the Museum, which would vie with any in the world. And, after all, he could not believe that that House had in any way laid itself open to the charge of a want of consideration. In respect to the question of residences for officials in connection with the new Natural History Museum, he had to say that it was not one to be regarded from a pounds, shillings, and pence point of view. He admitted that any official who had a residence in the neighbourhood of South Kensington, and lost thereby, ought to have sufficient remuneration. The matter was most carefully considered by the Government in 1874, and re-considered in 1875. And they came to the conclusion that no residences ought to be built, chiefly on account of their anxiety to minimize, as far as possible, any danger of fire. If they wished to guard the Collections at South Kensington to the utmost extent, and especially against fire, they must provide residences for the officials distinct from the Museum. It was not requisite to have the residences absolutely on the spot. That being so, he thought there were sufficient houses in South Kensington in which the officials could reside, and he saw no reason why an allowance should not be made to them. He had been asked a question with respect to the Ancient Monuments Bill. It was most unlikely that that very interesting subject would escape the attention of Her Majesty's Government during the Recess. At any rate, he would do his best to bring it before them. The question of the Patent Museum was of great importance; but he did not think it would be wise, without sufficient consideration, which the present Government had not been able to give, to embark upon a series of most expensive buildings.

Mr. FINIGAN had not intended to say anything upon this Estimate; but his attention had been called to the absence of his hon. Friend the Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy), who had intended, had he been present, to move an Amendment to this Vote. The Amendment appeared a very reasonable one. No one could possibly visit the Museum without being struck with the terrible condition of the gilded railings which ran from east to west. It was a fine thing, indeed, to have a colossal pile of buildings situated on—what was unusual in England—a noble site. The buildings had a noble frontage; but when one was compelled to look through a sort of prison bars at the objects of interest in this home of art, industry, and science, one felt it was a sort of moral anachronism. His attention having been called to this, he would like to ask Her Majesty's Secretary to the Treasury and the hon. Trustees to the Museum whether they did not think it an eyesore—whether they thought it consistent with art, even the mixed art of the architecture of London—to have these gilded railings running east and west?—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must call the hon. Member's attention to the fact that that is not included in this Vote.

MR. FINIGAN said, he was happy to be corrected; but, at the same time, he thought that when the Trustees of the Museum, which was supposed to be, and which to a very great extent was, the home of science, and art, and industry, allowed such an unsightly thing as these railings to exist it was very wrong. But he would depart from that, because, as most of his hon. Colleagues knew, he was always anxious to be in Order. Attention had been called by the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings) to the fact that duplicates and works of art were necessary for the various large towns and cities of England. He was doubly obliged to the hon. Member for Ipswich. Hailing, as he did, from that centre of liberality in England—from self-made Birmingham—hailing, as he did, from that great town, and representing, as he did, the popular wishes of England on this great question of art and science, he regarded what the hon. Member said as something which ought to be listened to not only by the Members of the Government, but by the Trustees of the British Museum who were present. Art, now-a-days, in England was necessary for the development of industry, and the art of the country, they all knew, did not reside exclusively in London. Birmingham claimed, in the manufacture of iron, a large share of the pursuit of art. Liverpool and Manchester, Bradford and Leeds, and all the large centres of industry, claimed to hold their own, in these modern times of keen competition, when the accident of birth was being greatly remedied. The country demanded that whatever art England could produce by Imperial means should be fairly distributed amongst the people who had to contribute the money for it. He, therefore, thanked the hon. Member for having brought under the notice of the Committee a most urgent necessity in the interests of art—in the interests of art, because in the interests of industry. He quite agreed with the hon. Member that when England lost her facile mode of sending off cheap, but still well-made, goods, when once England lost the art of using her hand, combined with her intellect, England was outrun, not only on the Continent, but in the race of industry throughout the world. Therefore, it was a very serious thing that they should consider what the hon. Member had laid down—namely, that it was not only beneficial, but absolutely necessary, that art should be advanced throughout the country by means of the sale, exchange, or loan of these duplicates; and he trusted that the members, or, rather, the Trustees of the British Museum, would seriously consider the matter. He did not hold that these Trustees were in the position which they ought to occupy by the spirit of the constitution of the House; and he thoroughly repudiated the idea of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) in suggesting that the country should rest content with the existing Trustees. The hon. Member's views were supposed to rest on a liberal basis; but, looking at his suggestion, it did not seem as though he were arguing quite in accordance with his principles. They should have for every Institution in the country a representative and responsible Body—a Body responsible to that House; and he, therefore, trusted the Government would consider the advisability of altering these Trusteeships, and making them more in accord with modern ideas by making them thoroughly representative.

Mr. Finigan

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question is—

MR. FINIGAN said, he would not delay the Committee much longer.

["Divide, divide!"] He would allow the Committee to divide when he had exercised his right. He, as one living in England, and as taking a deep interest in the arts and sciences, and as one using this Museum, claimed to be heard on the side of modern progress, and not on the side of Whig ideas, or old Conservative notions. Attention had been called by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Thompson) to the necessity which existed for having, on Bank Holidays, and other holidays, someone to explain the various treasures, lying dormant and speechless, whilst the people passed through the different Galleries. This was a very wise idea, and he thought that if there were any hon. Members connected with the arts and sciences who would give their time, or who would pay some officers to devote their time, to delivering short, popular lectures on the different sciences and art connected with the Museum it would be a good thing. It was perfectly absurd to suppose that the numerous visitors to the Museum from the country, or from the suburbs of London, by once walking through the immense Galleries, teeming with scientific wealth, could learn anything whatever of what was to be learned there. But it was quite possible if they had a sort of national programme drawn up, announcing that there would be a lecture on this subject and that, at a certain time, the public would attend them, and learn something of the great treasures lying within the Museum. He hoped they were not far distant from the day or period when the British Museum, and when every Institution supported by Imperial rates, would be thrown open every Sunday, and the people in this way made familiar with them. He should not wish to see continue that dark Conservative system which now prevailed in regard to the Museum; but he desired to see substituted for it that open and life-giving system of modern Liberalism, which could only be represented truly by opening to everyone the art and scientific treasures for which the nation paid.

Mr. LEEMAN did not propose to occupy the attention of the Committee for any length of time. He merely wished to say, with reference to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Puleston), that the hon.

Member seemed to be under a misapprehension with regard to the sum of money raised by the sale of duplicates to which he had referred. It was only fair to the Committee to say that, as a matter of fact, the sum raised by the sale of duplicates was £2,000. The sum asked for the Collection to which reference had been made was £8,000. With regard to the question he had put to the Government early in the evening, it was not proposed to press the matter further at present. But the country in general had the matter deeply at heart, and the Trustees of the Museum might be assured of this—that the public would not let it drop.

Mr. BIGGAR said, he had had the advantage of hearing the whole of the discussion on this matter, and it really seemed to him to be most important, and he was surprised that the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury was not more impressed with it. The most important question in connection with the Vote was that with regard to duplicates. What was the advantage to the nation of the British Museum as it at present existed? It was extremely good as a show place for visitors who came to London; but it was scarcely ever visited by the residents in London, or by the great bulk of the inhabitants of the country of all grades of society. In point of fact, it might as well not exist. He would appeal to the Government and the Trustees of the Museum to make it much more for the public advantage than it was at present. If the authorities would give, as it was now suggested they should, duplicates of all the curiosities in the British Museum to the Provincial Museums of England, Ireland, and Scotland, the result would be that the whole country would have an opportunity of seeing them, and of, more or less, educating themselves; and when country people came to town they would appreciate the originals when they saw them. What was the state of things now? A visitor came to London with a ticket available for, say, 14 days. He came up to London anxious to see the sights of London. Amongst other places, he went into the British Museum; but he could not afford to spend more than from half-an-hour to a couple of hours there. So far as the educational benefit to the visitors was concerned, there could be none at all in such a case as this. To illustrate what he meant, he would refer to an instance which had come within his own observation. Years ago he took a friend of his to see the Museum, and this friend, after the visit, carried with him no idea at all of what he had seen. They walked through the Galleries, and saw the different sights in the space of half-an-hour. All his friend could say, when he went back to Ireland, was that he had seen the British Museum; but if he had had an opportunity of seeing duplicates, casts, and engravings of the different things exhibited in the Museum at home, his taste would have been educated, and he would have appreciated his visit to the National Collection. The hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Finigan) had mooted the question of the opening of the Museum on Sunday. To his (Mr. Biggar's) mind this was a matter of great importance, inasmuch as the great mass of the people had their occupations during the week, and they did not go sight-seeing, unless there was something very unusual to excite them. But on Sunday, when they had been to Church, the remainder of the day rather hung on their hands. He would really urge upon the Trustees to open the Museum on Sunday afternoon, so that the inhabitants of the Metropolis might have an opportunity of seeing what was to be seen; because the truth of the matter was, as he had said, the great bulk of the inhabitants of the Metropolis were not able to visit the Museum from one year's end to the other. The people who saw the Museum, and the curiosities it contained, now, were, first of all, the students, who took drawings of the statuary, and then the readers, who visited the reading-room. The great mass of the people of London—the bulk of them—never so much as looked inside the doors of the Museum. The sum of £118,000 to keep up this place seemed to him a very large one; but it was, perhaps, not generally known to the Committee that of that £118,000 Ireland contributed some £14,000 or £15,000. It seemed to him altogether unreasonable that they should contribute that amount to an Institution in London, simply that a few people who came from Ireland as excursionists might have an opportunity of visiting it, especially considering that affairs were conducted on so stingy a scale that, instead of making a gift of a small number of duplicates to Ireland as a recompense, they were sold for the low sum of £3,000 a-year. He thought it would be well if the authorities became more liberal in their dealings not only with the people of London, but the people of Ireland, and the Provinces, and allowed them to visit the Museum on Sundays. For, after all, these people contributed the greater part of the money. If these duplicates could be distributed as he had suggested, it would be beneficial to the manufacturing towns of England; it would be beneficial to Ireland—to some of the manufacturers in Dublin. Dublin and Edinburgh should become, more or less, show-places as well as London.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR wished to draw attention to the fact that the appropriation of money realized by the sale of duplicates of articles in the possession of the Trustees was an entire departure from the rule which governed public accounts. The Departments of the Navy, when they sold stores, accounted for the money in the proper way to the State. He could not understand what reason the Treasury could have for departing from the general rule in the case of the British Museum.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH stated that the Trustees of the British Museum were not treated exceptionally, but had to account for the money they received.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that if the British Museum could come forward and obtain £118,000 a-year for the purchase and exhibition of objects of art and science, and could supplement that sum up to a figure they thought desirable by the sale of duplicates, the Government were allowing a system which might prove dangerous. The noble Lord had said that the Trustees could not do this, and he had spoken of the sale of duplicates, when he was on his legs before, as a very unusual proceeding. In the Estimates before them the Committee would find it was estimated that £3,000 would be received this year for the sale of duplicates; and if they went back to last year they would find that a large sum was realized in the same way. The practice was not unusual, therefore.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH repeated, that the Trustees of the British Museum were treated in exactly the same way as any Government Department. The whole of the sum the Committee had been discussing was mentioned in the account for the financial year. The only sum realized last year by the Trustees was a very small one for the sale of duplicates of coins.

Mr. Biggar

Mr. DAWSON said, that in the course of a long debate which had occurred some time ago, Her Majesty's Government had declared it to be their intention to found a Museum in Dublin, and he should like, if possible, to get some expression of opinion from them as to when that promise was likely to be carried out. If the Museum were established, such duplicates as those to which reference had been made might, with advantage, be handed over to it as a nucleus. He regretted very much to see a great opportunity, which might never occur again, neglected, and these duplicates allowed to be sacrificed for the small sum they saw in the Estimates. If there were any more, he should like to see them handed over to the Dublin Museum. There was a kindred matter to which he wished to draw the attention of the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury, who would, probably, know something about it. There were in existence some very valuable Irish manuscripts—not like the duplicates they were talking about, but papers of great value which could not be reproduced. He had been informed that some of these had been sacrificed by this country, foreign Governments having been allowed to become possessed of them by paying a little more for them than was offered by England. It would be a matter for much regret if the British Museum lost these works merely because foreign Governments had a keen appreciation of their value. He hoped the Trustees would give the matter their attention, and that, in future, no such manuscripts as those to which he referred would be allowed, owing to a principle of false economy, to go out of England, or Ireland, to which country they belonged.

Mr. SPENCER WALPOLE said, that before the Motion was actually put, he should like to say a few words in reply to important observations which had fallen from various hon. Members. On this, as on all other occasions, he had taken care to attend to the different points which had been raised—some of detail, and some of principle—in regard to this Vote. As to matters of detail, he would not go into them now, since he would have to communicate with the Trustees, when they met, with regard to them. He could promise, however, that these points would be carefully considered. The only point to which he wished to turn—because he saw it was one on which there was some misapprehension—was that with regard to duplicates. The Trustees had never failed to take an interest in this subject. When the last Act of Parliament was in progress it was pressed upon the Trustees, by the Vice President of the Council and the President of the Board of Trade, that something should be done in the matter. Ultimately, with the concurrence of the Trustees, a clause was inserted in that Act, enabling the Trustees to dispose of duplicates by gift. In consequence of that clause being put in the Act pressure was very properly brought to bear on the Trustees with reference to it, and the whole matter was referred to the Heads of the different Departments. He should very much like that their Reports should be brought, in some way or other, to the knowledge of the Committee, and, no doubt, they might be communicated when anything was mooted on the subject hereafter. In the meantime, he could only say this—that this question was a very perplexing and difficult one. When they came to consider it, they would find that they had got to examine not only hundreds, but hundreds of thousands, of different subjects in the various Departments of this great Museum, all of which must be compared carefully before they could arrive at a solution of the question, and say whether certain specimens were duplicates or not. He did not wish to go at length into the question at this moment, for he could not explain it in less than half-an-hour. He would not trouble the Committee further than to make this one remark—take simply the question of books. They had 15,000 or 16,000 so-called duplicates. But it would be necessary to examine how far they were duplicates or not. The Museum was a great depository of knowledge. It was, or ought to be, a great centre of literature and science, in which everyone could have an opportunity of studying anything and learning anything to which he pleased to direct his attention. It was, therefore, necessary that they should have not merely every book they could get; but, in many instances, it was absolutely necessary that they should have more copies than one, because, if they had not, dozens of students who required the same books at the same time would be disappointed. Then, take another case. Great Collections were given to the Museum, like "The Kings Library," "The Grenville Library," "The Bankian Library," and so on. Some of these had been given on the condition that the Collections should be preserved for the public use to all posterity. The Trustees could not touch them. Even if they were duplicates, in some instances, they must be preserved. They had to be kept for general use. He might go on to examine the question in a variety of other ways, and as regarded other specimens; but, perhaps, the Committee would take it for granted, at least under the circumstances just detailed, that it had not been from want of will, but from the difficulty of making the selection of specimens, that so little had been done in the matter of disposing duplicates by gift. With this assurance, he trusted the Committee would give him credit for earnestness when he said that he would take care that the matter was carefully brought under the notice of the Standing Committee. It might be doubtful whether they could do much; but he had no doubt whatever that they would give their best attention to the subject, and if it was decided upon to do anything in the matter it would give him great pleasure to be able to announce it.

Vote agreed to.

CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £12,836, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for erecting and maintaining new Buildings, including Rents, &c., for the Department of Science and Art."

MR. RYLANDS said, he had a Notice on the Paper that he should move to reduce this Vote by the sum of £2,000. His object in doing so was to secure from the First Commissioner of Works an explanation with respect to a matter that had been brought to his notice in connection with this Vote. He understood that the sum which the Committee were asked to vote included the amount of £2,000 paid in the form of salaries. Of course, if he had been misinformed as to that fact, his objection to the Vote would entirely fall to the ground. If, on the other hand, the information he had received was correct—that the salaries of certain officials, amounting to £2,000, were classed under the head of New Buildings at South Kensington, and did not appear in the detailed statement of expenditure—then he ventured to say, so far as his recollection went, he was entirely unaware of any Vote of that character in the whole scope of the Civil Service Estimates; and he was also prepared to say that the fact of the Vote of £2,000 being concealed under the Vote for Buildings at South Kensington was altogether contrary to the proper rules which ought to be recognized in the preparation of the Estimates to be laid on the Table of the House. How was it possible for hon. Gentlemen to consider the Estimates in Committee unless they were laid on the Table in such a form as to enable them to judge of the meaning of the expenditure? Of course, he had supposed, in voting, year after year, this sum for new buildings at South Kensington, that the money was to be expended for that purpose. But it seemed that, during the time he had taken an interest in these Estimates, this £2,000 a-year, paid in the form of salaries, had been entirely concealed from the knowledge of the Committee, as it had certainly been concealed from him. He had not himself discovered the fact; it had been brought to his notice by a statement which appeared in The Pall Mall Gazette some few months ago. He had, in consequence, made it his business to inquire whether that statement, which seemed to him absolutely incredible, was correct or not. He had been informed that it was correct. His right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works, although he applied to him for an explanation, was in no way responsible for what he was now remarking upon, because the Estimates were in the form in which they had been for some time past. Indeed, he made no charge against any Gentleman, but simply said that the Estimates had been laid upon the Table of the House in a manner calculated to mislead hon. Members. He found that £2,000 a-year were paid for salaries to the Office of Works—that was to say, that the sum represented the salaries of gentlemen engaged in superintending the erection of new works at South Kensington. He wished to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Works had under him a number of very capable and experienced officials, who had charge of buildings generally under the control of Government; and if the First Commissioner of Works were to undertake to carry out any works whatever, he presumed they would be superintended by the Board of Works officials. But in the case of the buildings at South Kensington a different course had been adopted; and, although they had an Establishment to assist in the special purpose of looking after works erected under the control of the Government, at South Kensington they had a separate Board of Works of their own. Therefore, it seemed to him that, under the present Vote, they had been paying over £2,000 a-year for an entirely separate Board of Works. He pointed out to the Committee that during the last six years the following sums of money had been spent on account of building in the Science and Art Department:—In 1875-6, £2,077; 1876-7, £3,598; 1877-8, £3,380; 1878-9, £9,335; 1879-80, £17,245; and, as appeared by the Estimates of the present year, £15,000. Out of this total of about £49,000, without the knowledge of the Committee who passed these Votes during those six years, they had paid no less than £12,000 for superintendence of the buildings. Therefore, taking the average of the first three years of the term referred to, the expenses of superintendence came to more than 67 per cent, and during the whole term to more than 32 per cent on the expenditure. He did not stand upon the exact accuracy of the figures, which were taken from the article to which he had referred; but, he maintained, it required some very efficient explanation to justify the course taken in asking the Committee to vote £15,000 for new buildings, out of which £2,000 were actually voted for the purpose of salaries. He might also say that the cost of superintendence by the Office of Works of new buildings amounted, on the average, to about 4 per cent of the cost of the buildings. But, under this Vote, they were actually paying 32 per cent as salaries for superintendence. He did not know what explanation could be given of this. No doubt, in former years, when a much larger amount of work had to be performed, there might have been some justification for those salaries. It seemed, however, that, whenever a new officer was appointed, and a new Establishment created, there existed such a great temptation to continue them year after year that it required much watching, on the part of the Committee of Supply, to insure that they were not allowed to continue beyond the time which their necessity justified. It was quite clear that the Committee could not take the Estimates of the Government as correct if they were presented in the form of the present Vote; and, therefore, he hoped for an explanation from the right hon. Gentleman of the circumstance he had referred to. He begged to move the Amendment in his name.

Mr. Spencer Walpole

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £10,836, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for erecting and maintaining new Buildings, including Rents, &c., for the Department of Science and Art."—(Mr. Rylands.)

MR. ADAM said, it was true, as stated by his hon. Friend, that the salaries of General Scott and his staff were included in the Estimate. This had always been the case, and he believed that it had always been understood by the Committee that such was the case. He did not, however, say that he could altogether defend the accuracy of including the salary of the architect in the sum which was voted for expenditure on works. He would undertake that the matter should be carefully inquired into, with the view of ascertaining whether it would not be more desirable for the future to state the salary of General Scott and his staff separately. He did not think that any charge of extravagance could fairly be brought against the Department. The fact was, his hon. Friend had looked at this in a piecemeal way, rather than as a whole. The amount paid for superintendence in single years did appear very large. But when the matter was looked at as a whole, and spread over a series of years, and when it was considered how large an amount was originally intended to be spent in building, and how uld

ant, red relive uld
; to ing een nce non the ind
the also ary ates ery ums on-uld and ice, itor rebe ria-he nad no-er-be e of idi-was lly bur ble

In-
the out, en-nad enay.
red
the ide ion nid uth ear
the pend fy,
he to on

of the fact. The Controller and Auditor General held an office of the greatest importance, and discharged his duty in a manner which any public officer would do well to imitate. He was certain Sir William Dunbar would be horrified when he found that this sum of £2,000 had been given in the way of salaries to officers without his knowledge. In his opinion, the Vote should be withdrawn for the present, in order that the Controller and Auditor General might be able to satisfy the Committee as to the circumstances in which this appropriation to salaries had come about, and the way in which it had escaped his attention.

MR. MUNDELLA said, the whole of this money had been expended on buildings in which he had great interest. He agreed with the hon. Member who had just sat down, that any money paid in salaries should not be put down as for buildings, but appear in the Estimates as a separate item. But a great deal of the money to which attention had been drawn had been spent for structural work, which it was difficult to separate from building work. The whole cost of General Scott's department was £1,830 a-year, which included the salaries of modellers, clerks of the works, and payments of that kind, amounting to £720. If the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), or any Member of the House, would go to South Kensington Museum, they would at once see that not only had General Scott prepared drawings of the necessary architectural work, but that he was having work done, and that models in terra-cotta were being made as well as work of a structural character. He was satisfied that no charge of extravagance could justly be laid against the Department, but could not approve the mixing up of salaries with the cost of building. Hon. Members must remember that the present Government were, in no sense, responsible for the present Estimates; but they believed that the employment of General Scott had effected the saving of something like £4,000. He was obliged to say that the buildings had not proceeded as fast as he desired, and there were still a number of sheds and lobbies that presented a disgraceful appearance.

MR. BRADLAUGH asked if he was to understand that £1,110 out of £1,830 in General Scott's department, included in the Vote of £15,000, was for artists' models and decorations?

MR. MUNDELLA said, that was so.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR thought the Committee ought to have full information as to the details of all expenditure of this kind before they consented to vote a penny of the public money. He had objected to the mode in which the Estimates had been framed ever since he had been in the House of Commons, inasmuch as the salaries paid to individuals were not shown in the Vote, but were mixed up with sums paid to other individuals for works. No doubt, the account of the disbursements ought to show their respective payments; but the Controller and Auditor General was subordinate to the Treasury, by Act, so far as accepting the accounts as stated by the accounting officer, and he could not go beyond that Estimate. The noble Lord below (Lord Frederick Cavendish), was naturally jealous of the arrangements ordered by the Treasury, and stood up for the form of accounts which the Department he represented had established; but, at the same time, he (General Sir George Balfour) had given attention to the subject of Civil Service accounts, and he knew that, so far from getting such clear statements of that branch of expenditure as would place matters in as clear a light as the expenditure of the Army and Navy, they had the Civil charges lumped together in one sum, made up of different kinds of payments. In this case both the salaries to superintendents and expenses for the cost of works were so lumped together, that the Committee was unable to see what was paid to any particular person in the shape of salary.

MR. RYLANDS hoped the Committee would distinctly understand that he was not casting blame upon anybody. He was quite aware that the Estimates were prepared before the present Government came into Office, and he had no complaint to make of the course they had pursued; but, in regard to all future Estimates, it should be understood that they should set forth the salaries distinct from the sum required for works. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mundella) had explained that in former years, indeed, up to within the last two years, General Scott did very valuable work in his department, and the amounts paid to him had not been excessive. The point, however, to which he wished to draw the attention of the Board of Works was this—£15,000 was charged for new buildings, and upon that expenditure they were called upon to pay a sum of £2,000 as the salary of the director of the works.

Mr. MUNDELLA: No, no; my hon. Friend is not correct.

Mr. RYLANDS understood that that was so.

Mr. MUNDELLA said, the salary was only £720; the rest was for structural works.

Mr. RYLANDS asked, if he was to understand that the charge was not in reference to the new building?

Mr. ADAM said, there was a clerk at a salary of £1,100 a-year.

Mr. RYLANDS said, that showed how important it was that the Committee should have this explanation. He was quite satisfied with the explanation which the First Commissioner of Works had given, and he would, therefore, withdraw the Amendment.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the real point of the objection was this—that if they lumped together salaries and money voted for buildings, they made it the direct interest of the officers receiving such salaries to secure that the buildings should proceed at the slowest possible rate, in order that they might continue to receive their salaries for the longest possible period. That was the objection he entertained to the present system. He referred to the position of the Controller and Auditor General. He believed that that officer would strongly resent any attempt on the part of the Treasury to control him. In the Report on Public Accounts, put in by the Controller and Auditor General, there was a statement to the effect that as he was responsible, he must be allowed a considerable amount of discretion. It was perfectly certain that this officer did not know last autumn that this money went in the shape of salaries, and he had, over and over again, in Votes for other Departments, objected to the system adopted here. He, therefore, could not have known what was being done in this particular case.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. FINIGAN would not detain the Committee for more than a few moments;

Mr. Rylands

but he thought the Treasury Bench had not given a satisfactory answer to his hon. Friend the Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor); and he hoped, before the Vote was passed, that something would be done in the matter. He was surprised to hear from the hon. and gallant Gentleman who sat behind the Treasury Bench (General Sir George Balfour) that Sir William Dunbar was a mere machine for the purpose of registering the deeds and votes of the Members of the Treasury Department. That was a very sad thing, because he had been under the belief that the hon. Gentleman was really a bond fide officer, told off and paid for the purpose of keeping the different accounts right; and he was sorry to hear, on such good authority, that the hon. Gentleman was a mere registering machine. He hoped the Committee would get some satisfactory assurance on this point. He was happy to hear from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mundella), whom he was sorry not to see in his place, that the Government proposed next year to spend a large sum of money on the building at South Kensington. The right hon. Gentleman had just told the Committee, with perfect correctness, that the present building was a mere shed. He only hoped that the money would be appropriated in that way, instead of being spent upon wars in Afghanistan, or upon the police in Ireland. It would be much better to spend it upon art and science, in order that the arts of peace might be cultivated instead of the arts of war. He hoped, before the Vote was passed, that the Committee would receive some explanation as to the precise nature of the duties of Sir William Dunbar.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out that this is not the occasion for discussing the duties of the Auditor General. We have not before us a Vote in regard to his office.

Mr. BIGGAR did not know if he was right or not; but it seemed to him that the practice of voting money for one object in Committee of Supply, and spending it upon another, was an exceedingly improper proceeding. There was too good reason for believing that the same thing was carried out in other Departments; and it was really not creditable, on the part of the Committee, to give their sanction to it. He did not mean to say that fraud often took place; but it certainly afforded an opportunity for irregularities which ought not to exist. As an illustration of what he meant, he might mention that he was told it was the custom in the Votes for the Navy to vote so many men for the Service of the country, and then to vote so much per week as wages, and that then it was the practice to give a certain number of men less than the sum voted, and others much more. That, he thought, afforded a good illustration of the irregularity of the system on which the House of Commons voted money in Committee of Supply, and it would be well if it were altogether re-modelled. He regarded it as a vicious system of management to retain particular gentlemen as standing architects for particular work. He thought that all the architects in the Public Service should be in the Department of the First Commissioner of Works, who should superintend the whole of them, and have them all under his control. General Scott seemed to have been badly paid in some years for the public work he did; but in this particular year, instead of having had one architect, they appear to have had several. Then, again, General Scott, in another year, instead of having much to do, literally had nothing at all. In one year he had only to spend a sum of £70, and for spending that sum he received a salary of £720. It was a system that was thoroughly absurd, and could not be defended. What ought to be done by the Commissioner of Works was that he should take general General Scott under his control, and see that his time was properly occupied. If there was not sufficient employment for him, let him go to some other Department, and occupy his time there. He had no wish to attack General Scott, and presumed that that officer was paid well for his services. Personally, he was unable to say whether he was paid too much or too little; but there ought to be something like continuous service, seeing that General Scott was a fixture in the public employment. If he found himself uncontrolled he would regard his present employment as a permanent occupation, and would not attempt to do any other work.

SIR ANDREW LUSK had no desire to enter into this discussion at any length; but if there was one thing more than another which he should like to see studied in this country it was science and art. He was sorry to hear his hon. Friends niggling and finding fault in so many ways with this particular Vote, because they had now been trying for many years to do their best, both in and out of the House, for the encouragement of science and art. They might find fault with the Army and Navy if they liked, and with many other things connected with the administration of the public money; but he did not like to see them throw cold water upon science and art. Science and art should be encouraged, as much as possible, in the interests of the people; yet they heard what the Vice President of the Council said, that the building at South Kensington was a mere shed, a miserable structure, and they had not availed themselves of the opportunities they had had of doing the best they could to improve it. He rather blamed the last Government for the state in which matters now were; but for many years things had not been what they ought to have been. He appealed to his hon. Friends not to show that they were animated by any penurious feeling in the matter, because what was done was for the good of the people, and in the best interests of the community at large. He knew very well that the public would not sympathize with any interference with this Vote. He had looked carefully through the Vote, and there was nothing in it that he could find much fault with. If they wanted to encourage science and art they must vote the necessary means, and not rest content with ignorance or blindness, and think that it was bliss. He hoped they would now pass the Vote, and go on to some other one. If they desired to manifest a spirit of economy in regard to the other Votes he was quite ready to go with them.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he had brought the bad form of showing the Civil Service expenditure under the attention of the Committee, because he thought it was desirable they should know that the statement of the disbursements did not show what they were really paying for. He had certainly not desired to speak of such an able public officer like Sir William Dunbar as a mere machine or a mere tool of the Treasury. God forbid that he should ever seek to cast any reflection upon so distinguished a man. He valued the long and useful services of Sir William Dunbar much too highly, and fully believed that this gentleman would be the last to consent to hold a position reduced to such an objectionable condition. But he thought the Committee of the House of Commons ought to insist upon having every detail of charge so clearly stated in the Estimates that Members should be able to know what they were voting. It was quite impossible that they could know what the exact expenditure to be voted was so long as Estimates remained as they then were. These should be so prepared that they ought to be able to see at a glance what was the exact sum paid for General Scott's salary, as well as for everything else in respect to the sums paid to other individuals.

MR. FINIGAN regretted that he should have misunderstood the hon. and gallant Member opposite (General Sir George Balfour) in speaking of Sir William Dunbar as a mere registering machine, and he would at once withdraw the expression. He repudiated the lecture which the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Andrew Lusk), the Aldermanic Member, had given them upon their proceedings in connection with this Vote. He thought it would be as well if the hon. Member would give some of his advice to the Civic Council, of which he was a member, and try to induce them to adopt a better administration in regard to the City Trusts. ["Question!"] The question which they were discussing was not that of the encouragement of science and art. They were there for the purpose of seeing that the public money was properly spent; and, so far as he was personally concerned, so long as he could find a legitimate excuse or reason for questioning the Estimates, he should consider that he was only doing his duty in continuing to call the attention of the Committee to them. A love of art and science was all very well; but there were other and more fitting occasions for manifesting it. He wished to know whether, in the Vote now about to be taken, they were to understand that, while this large sum of money was to be given to the Kensington Museum, an equal, or relatively equal, sum would be given towards an art building in Ireland? Surely the hon. Baronet would now see that he was really interested in art, not only in England, but in Ireland. He trusted, therefore, that the hon. Baronet would withdraw the observations he had made.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(3) £6,600, to complete the sum for Lighthouses Abroad.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR thought that, with regard to this Vote, it was necessary he should ask the noble Lord the Financial Secretary to the Treasury whether he had good grounds for supposing that the figures which appeared in the Estimates under sub-head A, were really approximately correct, because the history of this Vote was one of inaccuracy and looseness, and strange and startling variations? The expenditure had seldom been anything like the estimated cost put before the Committee. In order to show that he was not speaking without book, he would direct the attention of the Committee to a Report issued by the Committee of Public Accounts in 1878. He did not know that it was possible for anyone, however hostile he might be to the administration of the Department, to use stronger language than was contained in this Report. The Committee said, upon Vote 23 for Lighthouses Abroad—

"The special attention of your Committee has been called to the very unsatisfactory character of the Estimates which were presented to Parliament for the Bird Rock Lighthouse, Bahamas."

It would be found, by reference to page 57 of the present Estimates, that the expenditure upon the Bird Rock Lighthouse was still continued. The Committee continued—

"The Treasury refused to sanction the application of sums of money on other sub-heads, in aid of the excess of £3,940 18s. 9d. incurred under sub-head A for that work, until all the circumstances had been submitted to your Committee. It was explained by the Accounting Officer for the Vote that the delay of more than four years in beginning the work after the funds had been provided by Parliament had been due to causes beyond the control of the Board of Trade. The original Estimate in 1866 of £10,000 for the entire works appears to have been prepared without sufficient consideration of the nature of the proposed site, or of the delay and difficulties that would probably occur in building on such an exposed and isolated situation."

A new and revised Estimate of £17,500 was framed in 1875, nine years later, by the present Inspector of the works—

General Sir George Balfour

nearly doubling the amount. The Committee said that that revised Estimate was framed—“Within nine months of the fixing and lighting of the apparatus, when these causes of increased expenditure should have been fully ascertained and allowed for.”

This Estimate had, however, been exceeded by the sum of £7,214; the total cost having been £24,714, so that this work, for which the estimated cost was £10,000 in the first instance, and in connection with which not a single rock was moved for years, ran up in the second Estimate to £17,500—and that, too, nine years after the works were supposed to have been begun—and finally amounted to £24,714. He thought, when the details of the third Estimate were made up they ought to have been shown to the accounting officer, seeing that the previous Estimate of £17,500 was made within nine months of the completion of the works. The Committee went on to say—

“The explanation furnished by the Inspector of this great error in his Estimate is the delay of six months in the completion of the work, owing to bad weather, and the consequent large increase upon the wages and maintenance of the men employed. Your Committee cannot but think that the two Estimates were both prepared without due care and forethought by the officers appointed by the Board of Trade, although the difficulty of controlling expenditure on works carried on at a great distance from this country must be great. The Board of Trade must be held responsible for the Estimates presented by it to Parliament, and it will be its duty to take all possible precautions against the repetition of such errors as those now under consideration.”

These were the deliberate and authoritative words of the Public Accounts Committee as to the antecedents of this Vote; and he wished, therefore, to ask the noble Lord the Financial Secretary to the Treasury if he would give the details by which the sum now asked for of £9,500 was made up, and whether that sum included any new works for which original Estimates were sent in this year?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH pointed out, that the works in connection with these lighthouses abroad were carried on at very great distances from this country, and in very inaccessible places. Many of them were in positions that were very exposed, and it would be impossible to frame Estimates that could always be correct. He had no reason, however, to believe that the Estimates which appeared in the present Vote would not be found to be correct.

MR. FINIGAN wished to ask the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Board of Trade, before the Vote was passed, what was the explanation of a Vote which appeared in page 57 for the salary of the Inspector for the Bahamas? This appointment was at present held by an officer in the Royal Engineers, who had been seconded. What was the meaning of that Vote?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY presumed that it had reference to the position still held by the Inspector in the Royal Engineers; but he could not quite say what it was. It was not an item which came under the cognizance of the Board of Trade.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR explained, that an officer in the Army would sometimes receive a portion of his pay for services rendered in this way.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR was afraid that there was a mistake of some kind. He found in the Report of the Controller and Accountant General, mention made of an officer, Captain Brockley, who was receiving pay for these services in 1878 and 1879. His successor, Captain Simpson, also appeared to have received pay for services in the Bahamas. He wished to know whether these officers were receiving pay when seconded, and how it was that they came to receive Army pay at all?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH believed the fact, in the case of the present Inspector, was that he did receive Army pay up to a recent date; but in October, 1879, his salary was paid as Inspector, and he had since received no Army pay.

Vote agreed to.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present—(4.) £13,717, to complete the sum for Diplomatic and Consular Buildings.

MR. M'COAN said, he should wish to make a few remarks on the Vote, not with the view of opposing it, but in the hope that he might elicit from the Government some useful information with respect to it. A sum of £2,717 was asked for the Embassy Houses at Constantinople and Therapia, and for Consular buildings; and as he had a personal knowledge of those buildings, he desired to point out that although their extent was considerable, the sum set down in the Estimates for their maintenance for a year appeared to him to be excessive. The buildings in question included the Embassy House in Therapia, the Embassy House or Palace in Pera, and the Consular Courts in Galata, another quarter of the European suburb of Constantinople, the whole of which buildings were comparatively new. The chief building of the group was the Embassy House at Pera, which was virtually a new structure, having been completely restored after the fire which had destroyed its predecessor in the same spot some 15 years ago. He could not, therefore, conceive why it should be necessary to expend upon it any large portion of the sum of £2,717; and the same remark applied to the Embassy House at Therapia, which was a new wooden building. The Consular buildings, being also new, could not, it seemed to him, stand in need of any considerable expenditure this year for their maintenance. But, passing from the main item which he had mentioned to the sub-heads, he found that for new works and alterations at the Embassy Houses at Pera and Therapia, and in connection with the Seaman's Hospital at Galata, the sum asked for was £305. That was, he admitted, a small sum when spread over those three separate groups of buildings, and, no doubt, its expenditure could be readily explained and defended. He might, however, observe that £250 were required for the Seaman's Hospital at Galata, and he could not understand, unless it was proposed to enlarge the the buildings, why that amount should be necessary. The Vote included, in addition, an item of £450 for the salary of a superintendent of works, and that was a matter on which he should like to be enlightened. He wished to know who the person was by whom that salary was received—whether he had been sent out from England by the Board of Works, or whether it was some local person who was employed in the capacity of superintendent. He was all the more anxious to have an answer to his question upon that point, because, a few years ago, the duties of the position were performed, and the salary attached to the post drawn, by a gentleman who was then Vice Consul at Galata, who had no special qualification for structural work of any kind; but who, owing to the friendship of our Ambassador at Constantinople at the time, was pitch-forked into the situation; and he could not say that the result of the appointment was at all satisfactory. The scandal, however, to which the circumstance gave rise brought about its correction by the removal of the gentleman to whom he referred, and the substitution for him of an employé of the Board of Works, who was sent out from London. He wished, therefore, to know whether the person who now filled the office of superintendent was an employé of the Board of Works or not, because if the duties were discharged by a local person, such an appointment would be regarded as unsatisfactory, and must challenge remark. He felt bound, he might add, also to notice the absence of some items of expenditure which ought, he thought, to find a place in the Vote. There was no provision, he perceived, made for the insurance of the buildings of which he had been speaking, and which were very large and valuable. In that respect the buildings belonging to this country at Constantinople stood in a perfectly exceptional position. The Russian Embassy House there was insured, and so was the new German Embassy, as also the Italian Legation; indeed, all the buildings belonging to foreign Countries in Constantinople, except, perhaps, those of the minor Powers, were protected by insurance, and it was, in his opinion, a great mistake not to extend the same protection to the British buildings. When the Embassy at Pera was burnt down, 15 years ago, an outcry was raised when it was found that the large sum of £50,000 or £60,000, which its restoration involved, had not been covered by insurance. He might further mention that not only was that the case, but that the place was left most disgracefully denuded of all means of protection against fire. There was, in connection with the building, an old fire-engine which had been stowed away in one of the out-offices; and when it was brought out on the breaking out of the fire, it was found that the old hose was entirely honey-combed, with the result that the whole apparatus was perfectly useless. He was aware that a statement to the same effect as that which he had just made was contradicted at the time in the House of Commons; but the contradiction was in opposition to what he knew from his own personal observation to be the fact. He had been induced to make these remarks, because he felt that if those buildings at Constantinople were allowed to remain as they were then, unprotected, there must be somewhere a great neglect of public duty. He should be glad, therefore, to hear from the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Vote how the matter stood? He should like to be informed, also, how the money asked for was to be divided among the several places named?

Mr. M'Coan

Mr. ADAM said, that taking into account the number of buildings which they had to provide for at Constantinople, he did not think the sum asked for in the Vote for their maintenance in proper condition was at all excessive. The sum which had been voted the year before for the purpose was £2,680, and the increase this year amounted to only £37. Some alterations were required in the Embassy House at Pera, and at Therapia, and further outlay had become necessary for painting the Secretary's house, and for the renewing of window shutters and other repairs. In the Seamen's Hospital at Galata, also, it had been found expedient to make some alterations, acting upon the report of the medical attendant there. As to the superintendent of works, there could be no doubt that an European officer of some weight was required at Constantinople to look after the buildings which belonged to the British Government; and he was happy to be able to inform the hon. Member that the gentleman who now held the position of superintendent in that capital was not a local person, but a thoroughly competent officer, who had been sent out by the Board of Works, and whose services were of great use. It would be impossible, he was afraid, to dispense with such services, seeing the great number of valuable buildings which had to be looked after. The other day an earthquake had occurred at Smyrna, and the gentleman of whom he was speaking had to go there to report on the occurrence—a fact, which would serve to show the Committee that a man of understanding and weight was required on the spot to deal with the duties which he had, from time to time, to discharge. As to the question of insurance, perhaps the hon. Gentleman was not aware that the British Government did not insure any of its buildings, but was its own insurer; and he did not see, therefore, why the buildings at Constantinople should be placed on a different footing. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would be satisfied with this explanation, and that the Committee would agree to the Vote.

Vote agreed to.

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS.

(5.) £11,748, to complete the sum for the Board of Supervision for the Relief of the Poor, and for Public Health, Scotland.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he wished to ask whether in Scotland poor children were allowed to enlist in the Army, and whether their relations were allowed to come before the Board and express their consent, or otherwise? He knew that in England children were allowed to enlist as band-boys in the British Army without their relatives expressing their concurrence.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the President of the Local Government Board would be better able to answer this question than he could, and, therefore, he asked the hon. Member to raise it again on Report.

Vote agreed to.

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

(6) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £102,416, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for such of the Salaries and Expenses of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, Court of Appeal, and of the Supreme Court of Judicature (exclusive of the Central Office), as are not charged on the Consolidated Fund.”

Mr. RYLANDS said, he did not wish for a moment to raise any complaint against the gentlemen who occupied the office of Official Referees. Hon. Members were constantly placed in a difficulty when discussing the question of salaries to public officials, in being met by the imputation that they were casting some reflection upon the officers themselves. Now, he had no such intention. The question of the appointment of the Official Referees was one which had occupied the attention of the Committee on several previous occasions, on every one of which there had been almost universal testimony on the part of legal gentlemen that the scheme under which these Official Referees had been appointed had proved to be to a great extent a failure. He had laid this question before the Committee in 1878 while the late Government was in Office, and the then Attorney General (Sir John Holker) admitted that the Official Referees had entirely disappointed the expectations under which they were appointed by the Judicature Act. At that time he proposed a reduction in the Vote, and the late Attorney General said—

“The question now before the Committee was one of expenditure, and he did not see how the office of the Official Referees could be abolished without some arrangement being made for compensating the officers. All he could suggest was that if it was found that these gentlemen's time was not fully occupied, and if it should be thought that they were paid a large sum for doing a small amount of work, the best way would be to suggest that these gentlemen should be utilized for other offices.”

That view was generally accepted by the Committee. But the present Secretary of State for War (Mr. Childers), who supported his (Mr. Rylands'), views on that occasion, reminded the Attorney General that the Official Referees, being under the ordinary conditions of the Superannuation Act, if they retired, would only be entitled to £300 a-year. One hon. and learned Gentleman, not now a Member of the House (Mr. Bulwer), said, so far as the Official Referees were concerned, he protested against the view that their appointment was satisfactory. The hon. Member for Coventry also said—“Every one must agree that the present system was a failure.” He had, in 1878, moved for a Return on this subject, and it entirely confirmed the information contained in the former Return with regard to the amount of business done by these gentlemen. It appeared that Mr. Verey was occupied during the year ending April, 1878, on portions of 59 days. He did not give the number of hours occupied by each reference, but it would seem that it was not very great. The next gentleman, Mr. Dowdswell, held sittings on a total of 71 days. Mr. Anderson stated that he was occupied during 647 hours, and the remaining Official Referee was occupied 491 hours in the course of the year. Now, he knew perfectly well that it would be said it was no fault of these learned gentlemen that they had not more business, and that they were ready to do more business if it was brought before them. That, however, was not a matter for the Committee to deal with. But they were entitled to say that if the Legislature made a mistake in passing the Act under which four gentlemen were appointed to duties for which there was no public necessity, the sooner they were removed from their official position the better. At any rate, if it was found impossible to occupy four gentlemen, it might be practicable to dispense with the services of two of them. But unless a larger amount of work was got through by these learned gentlemen, it appeared to him altogether out of the question to continue paying their salaries to the extent of £6,800 a-year. He had a letter from a barrister, who could speak disinterestedly, inasmuch as he did not practice in the Courts, and who confidently stated that the failure of the system had arisen from the objection of the Judges to refer cases to the Official Referees; that the Judges referred cases to Queen's Counsel as a matter of favour, and if the parties refused to act in accordance with the Judges' recommendations, they were almost certain to place themselves at a disadvantage; and that, in such cases, it resulted that the business which ought to be done by the Judge himself, or by one of the Official Referees, might extend over years. The writer went on to state that, in consequence of this, his clients had been put to a great amount of expense. He would put the matter impartially. Here was a case where, by, perhaps, a mistake in the draughting of the Judicature Act, they called into existence four Official Referees, and certainly for several years they had done a very small amount of public duty. He was quite willing to allow that there might have been a change for the better in the case of one or two of them. But he certainly thought that if four Official Referees were not required, the country ought not to be called upon to pay them salaries; and it was not an answer to that proposition to urge that these gentlemen had been put into their position by Act of Parliament. But if Parliament had appointed officers who were not required, it was time the Committee reconsidered the position, with a view to a smaller number of officials being retained. He, therefore, begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Mr. Rylands

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £95,616, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for such of the Salaries and Expenses of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, of the Court of Appeal, and of the Supreme Court of Judicature (exclusive of the Central Office), as are not charged on the Consolidated Funds."—(Mr. Rylands.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he was not surprised at his hon. Friend referring to this matter, because there was no doubt, at the time specially alluded to by him, good ground of objection existed to the salaries paid to the Official Referees, as well as to the small amount of work done by them. But he could assure his hon. Friend that the circumstances had now entirely changed. During the present year the four Official Referees had been fully occupied, almost all of them having sat on every day during the legal year, except in the Vacation, and some having been unable to get through the amount of work provided for them. Formerly, the fees charged were somewhat heavy; but a change had been effected, and one single fee of £5 was now paid by the suitor, however long a case might last. Before that change was made, rather than go to the Official Referees, parties used to go to special Referees, whom, of course, they had to pay. In consequence of the amount of work which now came before the Official Referees it would be impossible to dispense with the services of any one of them without causing delay in the discharge of business.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, there was no class of public officers more hard worked than the Official Referees were at present, or who did more public service. It had been observed by his hon. and learned Friend that, under the present system, suitors could get the most complicated litigation conducted throughout several days successively for the uniform charge of £5. But the work of the Referees was not confined entirely to London. They heard the evidence of witnesses in the country, and thereby saved the great cost of their having to be brought up to London. This, it would be seen, was a great advantage in the administration of justice. It was quite true that these officers at one time had not the same amount of business to do, and that had, no doubt, misled the hon. Member for Burnley. He should mention that the Referees at present had only power to investigate cases, and make a report to the Court upon them; but he believed a Bill had nearly passed both Houses of Parliament to confer upon them not merely the power which they had under the Judicature Act, of making certain inquiries preliminary to investigation by the Court, but also that of determining cases which came before them by way of reference. That, again, would have the effect of increasing the business of the Referees and facilitating the administration of justice. He hoped his hon. Friend would not think it necessary to press his Motion to a division, because he believed he would see, after the explanations which had been given, that there no longer existed substantial grounds for so doing.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS said, some years ago he was not prejudiced in favour of the Official Referees, and he had expressed his opinion against them in that House. But, since then, his experience had entirely altered his views on the subject. It was only fair to say that the former impression he entertained had been entirely falsified by events. He agreed with the Solicitor General in saying these gentlemen were now giving entire satisfaction, and he had to recall the opinion he had formerly expressed. It was only just to say that the Official Referees discharged their duty in a most satisfactory manner, and he should be very sorry if anyone in the House were to cast any reflections upon the services rendered by these gentlemen.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, he had no wish to insist upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Burnley going to a division. He rose to express his dislike at hearing so many learned lawyers justifying this Vote. The hon. and learned Member for Denbigh (Mr. Watkin Williams) had, year after year, told the Committee that the Office was of no use whatever. Was the change in the views of that hon. and learned Gentleman due to the fact that he had changed sides in the House? He hoped, in future, when this Vote was under consideration, that the Committee would not be told, first that the office was of no use, and then that it was of the greatest use to the public.

MR. BIGGAR said, he would suggest that if the office held by the four clerks referred to in the last item of the Vote was a sinecure, it would be judicious to transfer them to the Office of the Referees, whose business would thereby be facilitated.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the case of the Official Referees had a special bearing on the Vote to which considerable opposition had been taken a little while ago. The hon. and learned Gentleman sitting opposite (Mr. Watkin Williams) had changed his opinion on this subject during the last few years. But he was not the only Gentleman who had done that. The present Attorney General bitterly complained of the Office two years ago. He spoke of the work as work which the Referees professed to perform, and said that the public money would be squandered upon them, adding that all this time suitors were complaining that they could not get their cases heard. The late Attorney General said, in reply, that he must admit that these gentlemen had not much work to perform; but he thought they should have a certain amount of time in order to vindicate themselves, after which, if the result was not satisfactory, he should deem it his duty to communicate with the Lord Chancellor on the subject. He thought the difficulty in regard to those gentlemen would be met by paying them separate fees for cases brought before them, and so enabling the suitors to estimate pretty accurately the amounts which they would have to pay.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, the only person who got any advantage from the change was the suitor, inasmuch as the Official Referees were paid fixed salaries, and would have no interest in protracting proceedings. The remonstrances which had been made had brought about an improvement in the existing state of things; and, therefore, he could not think it fair to charge those who formerly made the remonstrance with anything in the nature of inconsistency.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. MONK called attention to an item in the Vote which struck him as being of a very extraordinary character. He alluded to the sum of £2,000 a-year for the payment of the stockbroker to the Court of Chancery. His experience of the Court of Chancery was that if any moneys were to be invested in the Funds through the agency of the Court, the suitor had to bear the cost, and the stockbroker had allowed to him a certain amount for brokerage. The same thing occurred when Stock was sold by order of the Court; and he could not, therefore, understand the principle on which the stockbroker was to be paid a salary in addition to a commission which he received in the ordinary course of business.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) admitted that there were certain anomalies existing in reference to various offices connected with the Court of Chancery, and said that it would be attempted to remedy them as soon as the present incumbents of certain of the offices vacated them, by means of a process of consolidation.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH hoped the question in reference to the stockbroker would not be pushed further, as the question of payment by salary in lieu of fees had not yet been decided, and might be prejudiced by a discussion, at the present juncture, of the general principle.

MR. HINDE PALMER wished to point out that though £6,000 was charged upon the Consolidated Fund for the salary of the Lord Chancellor as Head of the Chancery Division of the High Court, that branch of his Office had practically, since the passing of the Judicature Acts, become a sinecure, in that the Lord Chancellor seldom or ever sat in the Court of Chancery as Head of the Profession. He made these remarks because he believed the present Lord Chancellor, when his attention was called to the subject, would be willing to assist in the Court of Appeal in a manner different from that in which the late Lord Chancellor acted, and so there would not arise the block in the business of the

Sir Andrew Lusk

Appellate Court which had occasionally arisen in comparatively recent times.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR hoped the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury would see his way to reduce the Vote by the amount of £1,600 which was paid as salary to one of the Examiners and the Purse-bearer to the Lord Chancellor. He, therefore, moved to reduce the Vote by that sum.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £100,816, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for such of the Salaries and Expenses of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, of the Court of Appeal, and of the Supreme Court of Judicature (exclusive of the Central Office), as are not charged on the Consolidated Fund."—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that many of the offices to which exception was taken would be abolished as soon as they ceased to be occupied by the present holders; but as long as the existing members held their positions, he did not see how the offices could be done away with unless large sums were paid as compensation.

MR. HINDE PALMER pointed out that, at the present moment, there was only one Examiner, the former one having received an appointment as Official Referee, notwithstanding which fact his salary was still charged upon the Consolidated Fund.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he could not admit the force of what had been said by the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury as to the question of compensation, inasmuch as there could be no demand for compensation were there was no vested interest.

MR. GREGORY said, his impression was that the office of second Examiners had been filled up. But even if it was not so, and the Amendment of the hon. Member was agreed to, it would become necessary to appoint a special Examiner at considerable cost.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, there had only been one Examiner for the last two or three years, and he objected to the proposal on the present occasion to vote the salary of a second one.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he was not aware that there had been a vacancy in the office.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS pointed out that if the Vote was passed, and there did not happen to be a vacancy, there would be no additional charge upon the taxpayers. As regarded that, the House was now in Committee of Supply, and not of Ways and Means; and if there was found to be no necessity to appropriate the money to this particular purpose, it would not be so appropriated.

MR. MONK thought the Amendment ought to be passed if the office did not exist, because it was unfair that imaginary reductions should be made in the estimated expenditure through taking Votes for non-existent offices in one year, and in the following year taking credit for the amount which it had never been necessary to expend.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he was not prepared to discuss the niceties of the procedure in Committee of Supply, and Committee of Ways and Means; but he certainly failed to see how the taking of an unnecessary Vote in Supply could fail in the long run to involve an unnecessary charge on the taxpayers.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD thought there was no doubt as to the fact of vacancy in the office of Examiners; but maintained, at the same time, that the creation of the office, ab initio, was a mistake. The Vote was, in his opinion, altogether unnecessary.

Question put, and agreed to.

(7.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £68,996, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Central Office of the Supreme Court of Judicature; the Salaries and Expenses of the Judges' Clerks and other Officers of the District Registrars of the High Court; the remuneration of the Judges' Marshals; and certain Circuit Expenses."

MR. THOMPSON moved to reduce the Vote by the sum of £2,740, which was set down as the remuneration of Judges' marshals. He had not the slightest objection to young gentlemen being brought up in the knowledge of their Profession at the feet of eminent Judges; but he could see no reason why they should be paid for the advantages which they so gained. Those who had been on the Circuits must have seen those marshals doing nothing and getting paid for it, to the intense gratification, no doubt, of their less fortunate brethren at the Bar. They would all, no doubt, regret, to a certain extent, doing away with an office of that kind; but they had now come to a period when it was desirable to reduce the expenses of the country as much as possible, and he thought £2,476 was too much to pay for the work which the country got out of these officers. He therefore moved, and he hoped the Committee would agree with him, to reduce the Vote by that amount.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £61,256, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Central Office of the Supreme Court of Judicature; the salaries and expenses of the Judges' Clerks and other Officers of the District Registrars of the High Court; the remuneration of the Judges' marshals; and certain circuit expenses."—(Mr. Thompson.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he thought his hon. Friend who moved the Amendment (Mr. Thompson) had not altogether remembered what the duties of the marshals were. He thought the sum voted in respect of those officers was really not unreasonable. It was true that they cost £75 or £60 each while the Judges were on Circuit; but it must be remembered that their travelling and living expenses on Circuit were paid by the Judges. He would remind the Committee that during the time the Judges were on Circuit, they had numerous duties to perform, and it was not a very agreeable thing for the Judges to have to spend a considerable portion of their time in lodgings. The Judges' marshal had unquestionably duties to perform. He had to make an abstract of the record in every case that stood for trial, and an abstract of the depositions in criminal cases; and hon. Members who knew the amount of work that was thrown upon the Judges, and the number of hours they had to sit in Court, day after day, would not consider it an unreasonable thing that such an official should be allowed to perform these duties for them. Therefore, it was not correct to say that the office was a sinecure, and it was also a mistake to say that barristers were never appointed to it. It was a very common thing for the Judge's marshal to have received a legal education, and some of them had practised several years at the Bar.

Mr. Thompson

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS said, he was very glad to have the opportunity of stating that, in his opinion, this was an office that ought to be abolished. The Judges who went down on Circuit had to go through a number of forms. They had to wear red cloaks, and most disagreeable things on their heads, and to have a great parade of officials, and carriages, and javelin men, and they had to go to church, whether they liked it or not. They had to have the attendance of trumpeters, and marshals, who were paid by the State for doing duties which the Judges would rather do for themselves. He, therefore, asked the Committee to consider whether these things should not be abolished. The Judges went down to discharge certain duties as lawyers, and to preside over the Courts, and their dignity and importance depended, not upon all this show, but upon their learning and ability, and the manner in which they discharged their duties. He objected to wasting time and money in absurd shows for the delectation of the vulgar and ignorant, and thought the sooner all this rubbish of javelin men, trumpeters, and carriages was done away with the better. He would like, also, to see abolished the absurdity of the Judges attending church and hearing their chaplains preach Assize sermons. [Cries of "Oh!"] He expected to hear those exclamations; but he regarded the going to church as a part-and-parcel of the unnecessary ceremony and expense, and he wished to see the Judges sit in the country in the same business-like manner as in London. When they sat at Westminster, they did not have all that paraphernalia; they went to do their work, and each had a clerk, and they did their work to the satisfaction of the country. Therefore, he entirely agreed with the Amendment, and regarded the abolition of Judges' marshals as the commencement of a sweeping away of a lot of old-fashioned rubbish which did no good at all. Although he had two brothers-in-law who were Judges' marshals, he should vote for the Amendment.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, he could not at all agree with the hon. and learned

Member for Carnarvonshire (Mr. Watkin Williams), who, in objecting to any public ceremonial in connection with the arrival of the Judges at Assize towns, showed a considerable want of knowledge of human nature. In London, Judges were not distinguished from other people in the street, but in the country it was altogether different; and he believed the habit of meeting them in state and ceremony had a very good effect, and to abolish that custom would be prejudicial to the dignity of the administration of justice. He dared say the time might come when they would be able to do away with everything of the kind; but before that could happen the whole country must be educated up to a very much higher standard than was likely to be attained within the next century at least. He had witnessed what the marshals had to do in Court, and could confirm the statement of the hon. and learned Solicitor General that they really were of great service. Their duties could not be performed at the same rate by anybody else. They acted as secretaries to the Judges, and were the medium of communication between them and the gentlemen of the country, besides preparing abstracts of the records and other matters. He should, therefore, support the Vote.

Mr. GORST said, he would not have interposed in the discussion, had not the hon. and learned Member for Carnarvonshire (Mr. Watkin Williams) addressed the Committee from the Opposition side of the House below the Gangway, and thus created a probability of the "Fourth Party" being held responsible for his sentiments. He hoped the Government were not going to deal with the very twopenny economy that was proposed by the Mover of the Amendment (Mr. Thompson). The marshals acted as a kind of private secretaries to the Judges; and although, if it came to what was absolutely necessary, all private secretaries might be dispensed with, it was considered that a man had a certain accession of dignity when he had a private secretary, and he thought no one need grudge that to the Judges. No doubt, they found the marshals exceedingly useful; and they had not so many officers at their disposal, or so many luxuries in any way, that these need be denied.

Mr. BIGGAR understood the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gorst) to say that this was a trumpery Vote. But he (Mr. Biggar) thought £2,746 a-year was a very substantial sum. He did not see why the duties performed by the marshals should not be performed by the Judges' clerks, who were selected by the Judges themselves, to their own satisfaction. At the same time, he considered that a little bit of show was not objectionable. Formerly, when he saw the Judges in their wigs and gowns, he used to be very much impressed by their wisdom and learning; but he did not now experience the same feeling when he heard how the hon. and learned Gentleman spoke in that House. However, seeing what the marshals cost, and that there was nothing to distinguish them in Court from private gentlemen, he thought they might very well be done away with, and that they did not add much to the dignity of the Judges.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 36; Noes 115: Majority 79.—(Div. List, No. 99.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(8.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £68,115, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Registries of Probates, and Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, &c. in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice."

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he wished to draw attention to the fact that in connection with this Vote there had been, some years ago, some serious defalcations by a man named Holbeck. When these defalcations were discovered by the Treasury, they appointed two well-known officers to investigate the circumstance, the result being that they satisfied themselves as to the amount of the defalcation. The investigation was carried back to the 1st April, 1876; but the officers also satisfied themselves to that period. As, however, the accounts of the previous years had been finally passed, the Lords of the Treasury did not carry the examination to any earlier date. It seemed an extraordinary thing that, when the alleged defalcations were found to be real, upon investigation, the Lords of the Treasury should content themselves with ascertaining that to be the fact, and write off a considerable amount, without satisfying themselves that they had got to anything like the beginning of the fraud, and be content to leave matters as they were, without any further investigation. He hoped some explanation would be given on the subject. As, however, the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury did not answer the observations he had made, he begged to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £186.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £57,929, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Registries of Probates, and Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, &c. in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice."—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the reason why he had not replied to the observations of the hon. Member was that he thought some hon. Gentleman opposite would probably have recollected the circumstances referred to, which occurred under the late Administration, and given an explanation. He trusted the hon. Member would not put the Committee to the trouble of a division.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the present had seemed the proper occasion to refer to the subject. It appeared to him that when a fraud was discovered in a Public Department, and the Treasury did not take the trouble to trace the whole history of the fraud, and ascertain the exact amount of the defalcations which had taken place, it was only proper, when the Committee were asked to vote money in connection with the Department in which the fraud was perpetrated, that some observations should be made and some explanation asked for of what appeared to be a neglect of duty on the part of the Treasury. However, as the noble Lord had said it was not the present Government who would be answerable for the state of things he had referred to, he asked leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that those who heard the statement of his noble Friend with regard to the Business of the House would probably think there was sufficient work to occupy the attention of the Committee. The measure referred to by the hon. Member was, no doubt, of considerable importance; but the Government, he thought, would do well not to introduce it this Session.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he wished to point out to the Committee a singular instance of the carelessness with which the Estimates and Accounts submitted to Parliament were drawn up. In the Report of the Controller and Auditor General of last year, there was an explanation of the savings in the item of salaries in connection with the County Courts, which was accounted for by the business of the Courts having fallen off. Then there was an explanation of the excess on extra receipts, which was accounted for on the ground that the business of the Courts had increased. So that, on the same page, there were two official statements contradictory of each other. That showed that the Accounts were often prepared with the greatest possible carelessness.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, if the hon. Member had gone a little further he would have found that the Accounts in question had not been so carelessly prepared as he supposed. There were two Estimates, and after the first had been prepared it was found that the business of the Courts had increased.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(9.) £6,945, to complete the sum for Admiralty Registry of the High Court of Justice.

(10.) £8,466, to complete the sum for Wreck Commission.

(11.) £22,834, to complete the sum for London Bankruptcy Court.

(12.) £285,281, to complete the sum for County Courts.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, last year the late Government introduced a measure amending the Acts relating to the County Courts. It passed the House of Lords, and was read a second time in the House of Commons. The measure was, in his opinion, a good one, and the fact that it was not passed had caused the continuation of unavoidable illegality with regard to certain charges in connection with this Vote. As the Home Rulers had undertaken the responsibility of displacing the late Government, and of placing a Liberal Administration on the Government Bench, and as that Administration had developed a marvellous faculty for assuming all the work introduced by the late Government, he hoped they would do so with regard to the Bill he had referred to. There was no reason why the same Bill should not be passed through Parliament that Session, and, perhaps, the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury would say whether it was the intention of the Government to do so.

Vote agreed to.

(13.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £3,328, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Land Registry."

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, this Vote had been seriously challenged by the Committee last year. He saw on the Front Bench opposite one or two hon. Gentlemen who took a great part in the debate which arose on that occasion, when it was stated that no work whatever was done in the Office of Land Registry; that for a period of 10 years the officers had received their salaries, and had absolutely done nothing. There was no one who contributed more to that debate than his right hon. and learned Friend now the Home Secretary, and his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War. Those two right hon. Gentlemen condemned the Vote in the strongest language that could possibly be used. The right hon. and learned Home Secretary remarked that his impression was that the Land Registration Department practically did no work at all; it was one of those unfortunate failures of law reform due to the fact that land legislation was permissive; he believed land legislation would not be successful until it was made compulsory. The right hon. and learned Gentleman went on in that strain, and finished by saying that he could not see why some reform should not take place in the office; at all events, so many clerks ought not to be appointed. The present Secretary of State for War had also opposed the Vote. He said that the Committee should fully understand the question before the money was voted; gentlemen who had for 10 years done nothing should be discontinued in their office. It was replied that the gentlemen in question had very little to do; but, on the other hand, it would be well to await the Report of a Committee which would probably contain some suggestion. The Committee had reported; but it appeared that the gentlemen who held the office would have nothing more to do than they had before. He ventured to say that the case ought to be taken into consideration by the Government. When they were in Opposition they clearly pointed out that they would vote for a large reduction of the Vote. He now called upon them to carry out those promises; and in order to test the sincerity of right hon Gentlemen opposite, he should move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £1,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £2,328, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Land Registry."
—(Sir Walter B. Barttelot.)

MR. CHILDERS said, his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had challenged him with reference to what he had said last year upon the subject of this Vote. He would state, most unreservedly, that he had not changed in the opinion he had expressed last year, and that the present Government would be under the responsibility of dealing with the matter. They did not consider the constitution of the Office satisfactory, and he trusted that next Session they would see their way to give effect to the opinion expressed last year.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he hoped the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) would move the reduction of the Vote by £2,500, which he thought would be more satisfactory to the Committee. The office had been established in connection with the Act passed by Lord Cairns, which it was well known was a complete and utter failure.

MR. INDERWICK said, as far as he could form an opinion, very little work was done in the Office; but he could not close his eyes to the fact that, before many years had passed, it would be necessary that the House should pass some Act dealing with the great question of the land of this country, and simplifying and cheapening its transfer. For that purpose, it would be necessary that there should be an Office of the character of that now in Lincoln's Inn Fields. If a Land Transfer Act were passed, there would be an Office ready to undertake duties in connection with it. On general principles he supported the views of the hon. and gallant Baronet. But he would support this Vote, in the sincere trust that before many months, the Office might have a great deal of work in hand for the benefit of the country.

MR. GORST said, he was sure the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War must be conscious of the extreme lameness of the answer given to the Committee. Nothing could be more positive than the pledge under which the Government came into Office. They said they would propose this year a very considerable reduction of the Vote now before the Committee. But they had now been more than three months in Office, and yet they had not made up their minds upon a course to which they were thoroughly pledged last year.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, the Vote could not be abolished, except by Act of Parliament, as the hon. and learned Gentleman was no doubt aware. He admitted that the present land system was a very bad one. What was wanted was something that would make the registration of land a reality, and it would certainly be premature to abolish this Office; and, having done so, to give the officials, in the way of compensation, something like the full salary they were now receiving for the rest of their days. He would remind his hon. and learned Friend that the Registrar was a gentleman of great ability, who gave up private practice, which brought in as much as the salary received by him under this Vote.

MR. GREGORY said, he could confirm the remarks of the hon. and learned Solicitor General as to the practice of the gentleman who accepted this Office. The Motion of the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) was, in fact, a Motion for reduction of salary, and involved this—that after a gentleman, who had practised at the Bar, had sacrificed his professional prospects, he should be deprived of his Office by a Vote of the Committee, if the Office failed in its operation, and that, too, without compensation. This involved a large and general principle, and he thought the Committee should consider well before they adopted the proposal. It might be that the Office had not had the effect originally expected from it. If that were so, it might be a reason for abolishing the Office; but, surely, the holder of the Office was entitled to compensation for the salary of an office to which, practically, he had been appointed for life. But he ventured to say that the Office was not altogether a useless one. A certain amount of work was done there, and he could answer for it that the officials were most anxious to carry on their work as well as they could, and give every facility to the public. If there was little to do at the Office, it was not the fault of the Office, but of the Legislature. He had been a Member of a Committee upon the Land Question, who had made recommendations that would materially increase the functions of this Office; and if those recommendations were carried out, he ventured to think it would be necessary to continue the Office, but on a greatly improved basis.

MAJOR NOLAN said, as a general rule, he voted for economy; but in this particular case he should certainly vote against it, because he believed that one of the greatest tasks the Government had to perform was to simplify the sale of land. He thought the sale of land should be as simple a matter as the sale of a ship, and as inexpensive as it was in the Colonies, where it could be transferred at the cost of a few shillings. The Government were almost pledged to the policy of simplifying the transfer of land; but if they were to agree to the abolition of this Office, everyone would think they had thrown that policy over. He wished to express his views on this subject, because he had a great distrust of the opinions of lawyers, who, he found, used all their knowledge and power to muddle the question. If the transfer of land were placed on the same footing here as in other countries, we should very soon have a free and simple sale of it. This country would not be settled until there was a free sale of land, and he was perfectly certain that Ireland would not be settled until that was effected. He thought it would be injudicious to make any reduction, and he hoped the Vote would pass without further opposition; indeed, he trusted that next year the Government would be able to ask for a large Vote to carry out an established policy in connection with the free sale of land.

Mr. Inderwick

MR. RAMSAY said, that an assurance had been given by the Secretary of State for War that the Government were prepared to deal with the question, and propose a Bill for the consideration of Parliament. That would tend to increase the business that those gentlemen had to transact; and, although he was in favour of retrenchment as a rule, he did not think they ought to do anything in this case to prevent the prospect of a satisfactory solution of the question being arrived at. After they had received such an assurance from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, he hoped the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) would see fit to withdraw his Amendment, seeing that the salaries of these gentlemen must be paid, and that they were now informed by the Treasury Bench that something would be done.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL hoped that his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) would go to a division in the matter. He was quite unable to understand the course adopted by hon. Gentlemen opposite. When they were in Opposition they voted for the reduction or the abolition of the Vote; but the moment they found themselves on the Treasury Bench they voted for its retention. He thought the reasons given by the hon. and learned Solicitor General in favour of the Vote were anything but sound. The hon. and learned Gentleman said they could not do away with the Office without giving compensation to the officials. Now, the question of compensation was another question altogether, and must be dealt with separately, and it was not a matter for Committee of Supply. Then the hon. and learned Solicitor General said—"You had better vote the sum this year, because it is possible that in a year or two's time the Office may turn out to be useful." No more extraordinary reason was ever given in support of a Vote. This was an Office in which no other work had hitherto been done. The Act which created the Office had been a complete and dead failure. The Government of the day were always refusing to give attention to the representations that were made to them upon the matter; and now they had the extraordinary spectacle of a Liberal Government, who went dead against the Vote while in Opposition, and declared their hostility to it year after year, the moment they got into Office having not a word to say against it, and electing to go on as before. If the hon. and gallant Member went to a division he would obtain considerable support; and if he withdrew the Amendment, he (Lord Randolph Churchill) was perfectly certain that matters would continue to remain in the same unsatisfactory state.

MR. D. DAVIES remarked, that if the Office was going to be kept open until it became useful and registration was made compulsory, a great deal of grass would continue to grow on the sill of the door, as he understood that it did now. He did not believe that Parliament was going to pass an Act to compel people to register their lands for many years to come. The landowners had a great objection to it. He had bought land years ago, and he had found that some of the owners refused to take the money for it because they declined to show their titles to the land they held. The landowners, as a rule, were very proud, and, having mortgages on the land, they were not anxious to produce their titles. He had certainly known that to be the case in reference to land purchased for railroads. He did not sympathize with the objection, and he would not have the slightest hesitation in registering the little land he held. He did not complain very much of the expense, except in regard to the stamps. If they took that off, it would very much cheapen the conveyance of land. It was said that it was expensive to convey land. He knew that it was, and that it was difficult also. Before now, he had bought half an acre of land for a railway for £50, and he had been obliged to pay £250 for the conveyance of it. Yet he had sold a quarter of an acre to a man, for the purpose of building a house, that did not cost him half-a-crown beyond the stamp. There were simply three or four lines on a bit of skin. It was all very well to console themselves by saying that the Office would be wanted, because they were going to make it compulsory on people to register their landed property; but that state of things was not likely to be brought about for a long time to come. A year or two ago, when the Conservatives were sitting on that side of the House, he had predicted that they would never consent to the compulsory registration of land. They were a very proud and haughty race of people; and if they were required to register their land, the fact that there were mortgages upon it would soon be disclosed. He should not like to see the present Liberal Government, powerful as it was, attempt to enforce compulsory registration. They would be certain to be defeated in that House; and, therefore, he should be sorry to see them attempt it. The hon. and learned Solicitor General had thrown out a hint that the Office might be wanted in the course of another year, and had given the Committee to understand that the Government were likely to introduce a Bill for the registration of land. Under these circumstances, if the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for West Sussex divided against the Vote, he (Mr. Davies) would support him.

MR. W. FOWLER was sorry he had not heard the whole of the debate; but he thought few of them would agree with his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Davies) with regard to the utility, or rather the non-utility, of the register. In this country, he believed they would never get a really cheap transfer of land until they had a proper register, and until they had a register so managed that there should be no incumbrance upon the land, and no transaction in regard to it except those which were put upon the register. He agreed with the hon. Member in one thing—that the landowners of this country were not fond of compulsory registration; but he would tell the Committee how he thought the registration might be made practically compulsory. If they were to pass an Act that, after a certain date, all transactions in connection with land should be placed on the register, and that no other transactions should prevail, he thought they would find that the land generally would come upon the register without a compulsory law. A great many people did not care to register their titles, because no transactions took place with regard to the land they owned, and there was no occasion for registration; but when they came to deal with the land they should be compelled to put it on the register. At present, they had not got a good map, and that was the first thing they should look forward to.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. Member that the point for the Committee is not the question of registration, but that a particular sum of £3,328 be voted for the service of Her Majesty.

MR. W. FOWLER said, he had no wish to travel out of the record, and he had only referred to the matter as it had already been alluded to. He understood that what the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for West Sussex urged was that it was of no use to pay for that which did no good. They were, therefore, asked to reduce the Vote, and not to grant the Supply asked for. He could not say that he agreed with that proposition, because, if the Vote were rejected, it would be taken to imply that they thought the register was of no use. [Cries of "No!"] He was not prepared to agree to that. He had long held that the Act of Parliament was a nullity, and that it would always be a nullity. Until they arrived at a more thorough understanding upon the question, and more courage was shown on the part of Parliament, they would not have a proper register. Parliament had never shown any courage on the subject. Why should not land be dealt with as ships and Consols were dealt with? There was no difficulty in registering a ship, because the ship was on the register, and all the trusts were left outside of it. So he would have the owners of the fee of land on the register, and let the trusts remain outside just as they did with trusts of railway shares. He was sorry, although he agreed on many points with the hon. and gallant Baronet in regard to the question, that he could not vote for the reduction of the Vote, because he feared that the rejection of the Vote would convey a wrong impression. For his part, he held that registers were most valuable things. In Australia such registers were found to be most useful. There could not be a doubt among those who understood the question that in Australia, and even in Scotland, registers were most useful. There might be difficulties about registration; but he believed that all that was wanted was a thorough understanding of the question, and that they should act on the principle laid down in the Report of a Committee, 11 or 12 years ago, upon which, however, nothing had ever been done. If they had the courage of their opinions, they might soon have a thoroughly good register. On that occasion he should give his vote for the Government, although he was ready to protest that they ought not to go on voting that money, which did so little good, for a moment longer than could absolutely be avoided.

Mr. D. Davies

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, he was very sorry to stand in the way of the Vote. The hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) began by saying that he (Sir Walter B. Bartelot) wanted to reduce the salaries of the Registrar, who, he said, was a most excellent man. Now, he (Sir Walter B. Bartelot) had not a word to say against the Registrar. He believed him to be an excellent man. But the question they had to consider was a plain and simple one; and he was surprised to hear his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway (Major Nolan) come out with his land reform scheme, and say that he was a man who liked to pay beforehand for what he desired. That was exactly what was proposed to be done in this case. They had the sum of £4,511, which had been paid for 10 years for an Office which had done nothing. It might be true, or it might not be true, that the Government were going to bring in some great scheme of reform with regard to the land; but it did not follow that the business would go into that Office. It might be given to another Office, or the present Office might be re-modelled and reformed with larger salaries, in order to give work to new people, or the Office might remain absolutely the same. What he said now was this—that, at the present time, the Office had done no work. He had not touched the salary of the Registrar, or the Assistant Registrar; but there were a number of clerks who might be transferred elsewhere, and whose salaries might be curtailed. There could be no possible objection to doing that; and he should like to know—for he saw a good many hon. Members sitting below the Gangway on the other side of the House, and, notably, the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Bass)—he should like to know if, when in his business, the hon. Member found that his subordinates had scarcely anything to do, what was the first course he took? The first thing he would do would be to curtail his expenditure by turning off one or two of the gentlemen who had nothing to do. That was what he (Sir Walter B. Bartelot) was asking the Committee to do in this case, and he thought it was a very fair proposal. Last year, the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) got up and said that, unless the Conservatives moved the reduction of the Vote, it was because they were disinclined to do anything contrary to the wish of the Government in Office. He called upon the hon. Gentleman to say the same thing now. There was nothing half so pleasant as when the House took matters of this sort into their own hands, and told the right hon. Gentlemen on the two Front Benches that economy must be practised. They might depend upon it that, when a general feeling of this sort was manifested, the House was right, and the right hon. Gentlemen on the two Front Benches were wrong. It was the only way of testing the sincerity of hon. Members who passed the Vote last year; and he would certainly press the Amendment.

MR. RYLANDS said, that before the hon. and gallant Baronet had appealed to him, it had been his intention to rise and address a few remarks to the Committee upon that Vote. What was the Vote? It was one of a rather remarkable character. Two Acts of Parliament had been passed which had created a considerable staff of officials who were highly paid; but now it was found that, practically, those gentlemen had nothing to do. It certainly appeared to him (Mr. Rylands) that to call upon Parliament to vote, from year to year, a sum of money amounting to more than £5,000, for an Office in regard to which nothing was done, was a positive, public scandal, and a discredit to the House. He had said so in former years, and he said so now. His hon. and gallant Friend said they ought not to be led away upon a false issue. He quite concurred, in regard to the registration of land, that it was a matter which required to be put upon a proper and extended footing. That was one of the questions which Her Majesty's present Government had to deal with. His hon. Friend behind him (Mr. D. Davies) seemed to think that there would be no such question raised, and that any such measure would not receive the sanction of the Committee. He thought it could be shown by the language his hon. Friend used that he had not paid much attention to the great questions involved in the subject. He believed that Her Majesty's Government would deal with the question next year. Certainly, if they continually put off dealing with questions that were pressing for solution, he would be able to see no difference between them and the late Government; but he was quite sure that they would do nothing of the kind. He believed they would deal with the question; but still, he might ask, was that any reason why they should continue to vote an Establishment of that sort? He did not think that it was any reason at all. He thought they ought to deal with all questions that came before the Committee without any reference to what might be proposed hereafter by Her Majesty's Government. No doubt, when they came to deal with the question of registration in a future year, there would be a proper desire manifested to vote such sums as might be necessary to give effect to such legislation as might be passed. In the meantime, if the Vote was pressed, he should not have the slightest hesitation in voting, as he had done before, for the reduction of the Vote, in order to show his sense of the extremely objectionable character of a Vote of that kind, involving the continual payment of salaries where no services were rendered.

MR. THOMASSON expressed a hope that the gentleman of great abilities who had been alluded to would have something found for him to do, even if it were not in the way of land registration. He thought it would be a great pity that his abilities should be lost entirely to the country. He did not know whether, as many hon. Members seemed to suppose, this gentleman had really been doing nothing for the last 10 years, or whether he had been doing something in his own interest. In the latter case, he thought he might well do with a less salary from the public.

Mr. Rylands

MR. FINIGAN said, he was himself very much in favour of the registration of land, not only because the registration of land would make titles much more easy, but because it would also prevent fraud. He was certainly of the same opinion as the hon. and gallant Baronet who had spoken from that side of the House (Sir Walter B. Barttelot)—that if they wanted to do anything they must press the Government home, and press them practically. He had been for a long time waiting to see the Law Officers of the Government rise in their place, and say something definite with regard to the question—something that should have some reason in it. They had been told that this land registry was an improper registry, because it had no business whatever to do; at any rate, comparatively speaking, it had nothing to do. Now, in Middlesex and Yorkshire, where the register was more complete than in other districts, they found that a very good system of registry existed; and he really hoped that the Liberal Members who were not thoroughly tied to the Government, and who in times past opposed the Conservative Government, because they considered that such a Government did not study the interests of the people, would be found voting not for or against the Government, but for the carrying out of a real and practical principle. He should very much like to hear something definite stated by the Government before the Vote was carried to a division; otherwise, he would certainly vote with the hon. and gallant Baronet behind him. He was prepared to vote with any hon. Member on questions which raised practical considerations of this kind.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that two grounds might be put forward by those who were in favour of reducing a Vote. One was, that the vote in favour of reduction might be practically acted upon; and the other was, that the attention of the Government might be called, as a matter of policy, to the circumstances of the Vote. In regard to the first objection, no one had, in this instance, suggested that it could be carried into practical effect by a proposal to reduce the Vote. The Estimate was an Estimate of the late Government, and it was submitted to the Committee by the late Government as a proper Vote to be passed.

What would be the effect now of reducing the Vote? They would simply take away the sum which ought to be paid to those who had already acted as officers, for they would reduce the salaries of those gentlemen without having, at the present moment, any means of utilizing their services in any other direction. He gathered, however, that the principal object of moving the reduction of the Vote was to call the attention of the Government to the necessity of making an alteration in the course that had been pursued. Last year, when they were dealing with the subject, an hon. Member on the then Opposition side strongly urged the necessity of dealing with the question; but no answer was obtained from the late Government. His hon. Friend the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) went so far as to say that, if the Government still declined to deal with the land registration question, he would not support the Vote again; but all the declarations that were made failed to obtain from the then Government any pledge upon the subject. They had now these Estimates submitted to the Committee by the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury, and they were Estimates prepared on behalf of the late Government. But there had been a statement made already on behalf of the Treasury that evening. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Childers) had stated that the subject was under the consideration of the Government, and that some measure would be submitted in connection with land registration next year. If nothing was done next year, then let hon. Members seriously consider what ought to be done with the Vote; but, so far, no practical opportunity had been given to the Government for dealing with the question. The suggestion that they should diminish the Vote was not dealing with the policy of the Government, but with the status of certain officials in the Office. He asked that they should not consent to a reduction of the Vote until they were fully acquainted with the intention of the Government in regard to the matter.

Mr. GORST said, that if they followed the recommendation of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, the power of the Committee over the Estimates would be absolutely a farce. He wished to state what was the real issue before the Committee in that particular case. There was an Office which had been retained for about 10 years, in which it was admitted nothing whatever had been done, and which was simply a burden upon the finances of the country. Some hon. Members, who were now Members of the Government, said last year that they would never vote for the charge again. They had now come into Office, and yet they proposed the same Estimates which, when in Opposition, they condemned as an incumbrance upon the finances of the country. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) did not propose that they should cut down the salaries of the officials, but that Parliament should not vote the expenses of the Office, such as the salaries of the clerks and the lighting and warming of the offices. He merely proposed to cut down the expenses of an Office which had been perfectly useless during the last 10 years; for if the Committee of Supply was not able to make such a reduction as that the sooner it ceased to exist the better.

Mr. BRIGGS should have thought that the explanation given by the Government would have been sufficient to convince the Committee. An hon. Member below the Gangway had appealed to independent Members to reject the Vote. He hoped that the hon. Gentleman considered that he (Mr. Briggs) was independent enough. His hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), who always voted in favour of economy, backed the hon. and gallant Baronet opposite on the present occasion. He (Mr. Briggs) should, however, like to point out to the Committee a point which struck him as one of importance. If they voted for what was virtually the abolition of the Office, although the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) would not confess it, they would actually be defeating what his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley sought to accomplish—namely, economy. For if they abolished the Office, what were they going to do? They must allow the gentlemen who were in the Office to retire upon pensions—[“No, no!”]—so that, really, they would have to retire almost upon the full amount of the salary they were now receiving. It had been pointed out that they could not transfer the officers to any other branch of the Public Service at present; and he, therefore, thought that by doing what the hon. and gallant Baronet opposite wished them to do, they would be virtually defeating the object they were anxious to secure—namely, economy in the expenditure of public money.

MR. BIGGAR wished to make one remark upon what had fallen from the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Briggs). He thought the hon. Member had made a mistake with regard to the practical effect of the Motion proposed by the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot). That Motion was that the sum of £1,000 should be taken off the Vote. That would draw the attention of the Government in a substantial way to the matter, and would induce them to bring in a Bill next Session to settle the vexed question of land registration. It certainly seemed that the clerks and officials who were retained in the Office were very liberally paid. There were three clerks who had £1,000 among them. Surely, it would be easy to transfer these clerks to some other Government Office, so that there need be no compensation at all. If the Government did not seem disposed to do that, and the officials were not paid, there would be little reason to fear that all the influence they possessed would be used, both directly and indirectly, to bring pressure to bear upon the different Members of the Government in order to get the important question of land registration pushed on and satisfactorily settled. He was certainly inclined to agree with the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) that the control of the House over the Vote in Committee of Supply was, after all, nothing more than a farce if they were to continue for 10 years to pay salaries to gentlemen who did nothing whatever in return. The most sensible way to procure a bonâ fide reform was to reduce the salaries of the different officials.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) reminded the Committee that the Government had given a distinct pledge that the matter should be considered with the view of either abolishing the Office, if it was found that it was not needed, or, if it were continued, giving the officials in it some distinct work to do. Last year the Government would not give any such pledge; and, although that was so, the hon. and gallant Baronet opposite (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) and the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), both of whom had waxed so eloquent upon the subject to-night, followed the Government into the same Lobby.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he did not see how, under the present arrangement, the contemplated saving could be effected. He, therefore, hoped that the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) would be satisfied with having entered his protest, and not press his Amendment to a division.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General was not so fair now he was sitting upon the Treasury Bench as he used to be. It was admitted that, formerly, the hon. and learned Gentleman was one of the fairest men in debate that could possibly be. It was absolutely true that he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) voted with the Government last year; but why did he do so? Because it was stated by the Government that, last year, the salaries could not be altered, but the question should be considered this year. The hon. Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) then said that everyone who had listened to the debate must feel that the Office had not done the work which was expected of it, that the House made a mistake when it established it, and that the expenditure ought really to be stopped. When a Government official said that they were bound to believe him. The expenditure had not been stopped, and the present Government had not tried to stop it. Notwithstanding all that had been said, he would divide the Committee upon the question.

MR. BIGGAR said, that this was not a question between the Members of the Government and the supporters of the late Government. It was a question to be decided by the Committee; and he appealed to hon. Gentlemen to do right, and reduce the Vote. It seemed to him that a much better pledge was obtained from the late Government than had been got from the present Government. The present Government merely said through the hon. and learned Solicitor General that they would consider the question some time between this and next year. That seemed a very weak pledge. He would like to hear some Member of the Government say they would abolish some of these sinecure officials.

Mr. Briggs

MR. MAGNIAC remarked, that, perhaps, the present occupant of the Opposition Front Bench (Mr. R. N. Fowler) would tell them why the late Government had included this Vote in their Estimate.

MR. CALLAN observed, that it would be only fair to answer the inquiry of the hon. Gentleman by informing him that the hon. Member (Mr. R. N. Fowler), who was the only occupant, at the present moment, of the Front Bench, was not in the last Parliament; and, therefore, he was not answerable for the acts of the late Government.

Question put.

The Committee divided: Ayes 39; Noes 141: Majority 102.—(Div. List, No. 100.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(14.) £18,690, Revising Barristers, England.

(15.) £9,501, to complete the sum for the Police Courts, London and Sheerness.

MR. RAMSAY said, that the Vote had been brought up in the same position as last year. He did not know whether any explanation would be afforded why that was so, or whether any prospect would be held out that they would soon see the omission of the charge from the Estimates. The matter was under the consideration of the late Government, and he desired to know whether Her Majesty's present Ministers had it under consideration?

MR. ARTHUR PEEL supposed that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ramsay) was of opinion that this ought not to be a national charge, but one borne by the local funds in London and Sheerness. He was not aware that any pledge was given by the late Government that the removal of the incidence of the charge would be considered; but he did know that a Vote was taken, in which there was a majority of 36 against an Amendment having for its object the removal of the charge to the local rates. The same arguments applied now as then—namely, that London and Sheerness were really something more than ordinary localities, and that, therefore, the expenses of the police courts ought not to be borne by the local rates. In the case of Sheerness and Chatham, there was an additional reason why this charge should be thrown upon the Imperial Exchequer. There were situated Government Dockyards; there men came from all parts of the Kingdom, and the expenses thrown upon the police were very great. He was not aware that his hon. Friend referred to any other point of objection. If the objection to the charge was based solely upon the ground that this ought to be a local, instead of a national, charge, he could not hold out any hope to the hon. Gentleman.

MR. WHITWELL hoped the hon. Member (Mr. Ramsay) would persevere in his opposition to the Vote.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, that before the Vote was taken, he wished to ask the hon. and learned Attorney General, whether the Treasury had any authority, in the case of a fine paid by a criminal, no portion of which fine was, by statute, to go to an informer, to direct that the fine, after it had been paid by the defendant, and while it was in the hands of the Under Sheriff, should, by simple letter from the Treasury, be directed to be paid to a private individual? He knew of such a course having been taken by the late Government, and that was why he put the question.

MR. RYLANDS said, he did not think the arguments advanced by the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Arthur Peel) in any way went to justify the retention of the charge upon the nation at large. The property of such places as Sheerness and Chatham ought to bear its fair share of the local burdens. The system under which this charge appeared in the Estimates was open to great objection, and the Committee ought not to allow any increase of it.

MR. RAMSAY remarked that the ground upon which he asked for a reconsideration of this charge was that it was unfair to charge the taxpayers of the country in order to relieve the ratepayers in either London or Sheerness. Whatever the right hon. Gentlemen occupying the Front Bench might do or think now, there were some of them who last year saw a very dangerous principle involved in this charge. He did not feel that anything had been said by the hon. Gentleman which could possibly justify Her Majesty's Government in continuing the system. The Metropolis might well bear the expenses of the police courts, and the nation ought to be relieved of this particular taxation. He could not see why, if they paid for the police courts in London and Sheerness, they should not do it in regard to all the large towns in the Kingdom.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in answer to the question of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), said, there would not be power to pay over a fine, as such, to an informer; but he was not prepared to say that it might not be paid over for services rendered.

Vote agreed to.

(16.) £226,705, to complete the sum for the Metropolitan Police.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR remarked that the Vote included a sum of £600, in the shape of salaries and expenses to the Chief Commissioner and two Assistant Commissioners of Police for superintending the police in connection with the Dockyards and military stations. He wished to know what amount of time those three officers devoted to such service, also the number of officers of the Metropolitan Police who acted as detectives in plain clothes in the carrying out of the Contagious Diseases Acts?

MR. ARTHUR PEEL, in reply, said, that the Dockyard Service entailed a considerable amount of work upon the Chief Commissioners and Assistant Commissioners of Police; but he was unable to give the hon. Member the exact data he wanted. He was free to admit that the system of extra payment for extra work was objectionable. It would be much better, he thought, if the officers mentioned were paid a lump sum for their services. He could not tell what number of police were employed under the War Office.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Disguised in plain clothes, and paid out of the Army Funds while performing police duties.

MR. ARTHUR PEEL: It does not come under this Vote.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR was sure that if the hon. Gentleman would make inquiry he would find that a large number of police were employed at the expense of the War Office. The Metropolitan Police in Dublin were similarly employed at the expense of the War Office in detective duties.

• Mr. Ramsay

MR. ARTHUR PEEL: But not under this Vote.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that was so; but their pay was charged under the present Vote while they were acting in the service of the War Department. The Chief Commissioner and Assistant Commissioner were really employed on their extra duty but a very short time; and he put it to the Government whether there was any justification for so large a charge as £600 for an occasional visit on their part to the Dockyards?

MR. FINIGAN wished to know whether the Government considered themselves pledged, after what had fallen from the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, to alter the mode in which the officers were paid?

MR. ARTHUR PEEL replied, that the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury and himself were convinced that the present system of payment was of a doubtful character, and that they would consider whether it would not be better to pay the officers a lump sum annually. He could say no more than that.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR suggested that in England the police should be made use of in connection with the taking of the Census. They were to be so employed in Ireland. A good sum might be saved in that way, which would, otherwise, be paid to enumerators and other officials.

MR. ARTHUR PEEL would remind the hon. Member that the police were not wholly paid out of taxes, but were partially paid out of the rates, so that the Government had not unlimited control over them. It might be said, roughly, that half the cost of the police was defrayed out of taxes, and half out of rates. Moreover, the question of what persons should be employed in the taking of the Census was one for the authorities who were intrusted with the direction of the work, and not for the Government generally; and it might not be advisable to take the police from their ordinary duties.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, that in Dublin, where the police were paid in the same way as in this country—namely, partly out of taxes and partly out of rates—members of the force were to be employed to prepare the Census statistics. If such a system was wrong here, it could not be right in Dublin; or if right in Dublin, it surely could not be wrong here. He was not surprised that his hon. Friend should have called attention to such an anomaly.

Vote agreed to.

(17.) £897,248, to complete the sum for the County and Borough Police.

Mr. J. R. YORKE begged to move a reduction of the Vote by £1,000, in order to call attention to the present condition of the system of police superannuation. Great dissatisfaction had existed amongst the members of the police force of the country in connection with this subject for many years past. The literature of the question was very voluminous, and he did not propose to enter into it at any length. He would content himself by referring hon. Members, who wished to have detailed information, to the Report of the Select Committee of 1877, who had gone into the subject in a very exhaustive manner. The main facts, however, he might state for the information of the Committee. The system of superannuation was instituted in 1839, and made compulsory in 1856. The arrangement was that the Quarter Sessions should invest, for the benefit of the men, the money derived from a stoppage of 2½ per cent on their pay, the fines paid by drunkards, the proceeds of the sale of old clothing, &c., and the solvency of the fund thus formed was guaranteed by the police rate. That was the arrangement in counties. Pretty much the same state of things was established in boroughs; the watch committees of municipal bodies being intrusted with the relief of injured or worn-out constables. By the 11 & 12 Vict. Town Councils were enabled to set up a fund, and in 1859 that also was made compulsory, the source of income being the same as in counties. The same scale of pensions and retiring allowances was arranged for both counties and boroughs. By way of supplement gratuities were granted; but these were only obtainable—and that was one of the grievances of the men—on the recommendation of the chief constable. Widows got one year's pay, if the husband had served three years, and children, if left orphans, got nothing at all. Another point to be noticed was this—constables promoted from one force to another only counted one-half their time of service in the first corps, and even to enjoy that privilege it was necessary that they should have served seven years, and that they should have been promoted on the recommendation of the chief constable. By the 28 Vict. gratuities might be granted for a limited period in lieu of superannuation or retirement; and at the end of that period men could, if they pleased, rejoin the force, in which case they were entitled to count half the time they had been away. If they were incapacitated, or over 60, they were allowed to retire. He now came to the grievances of which the men complained. In the first place, they might be recommended for not more than two-thirds of their pay if they had served 20 years or upwards. They were not in the position of soldiers or sailors, who had a right to a pension after a certain number of years service. It depended upon the will and pleasure of the chief constable whether they were to be dismissed empty-handed, or whether they were to have a retiring allowance. If they were under 60, a certificate from the chief constable was required. The system was unsatisfactory in another way. Supposing A and B joined the force together, A being 20, and B 30 years of age. A had to serve 10 years longer and pay more into the funds than B before he was entitled to his retiring allowance. Unless he was invalided he was not allowed it until he was 60. That was a point which required consideration. It was also a hardship that widows should only get one year's pay, if the deceased had paid into the fund for three years, and that children, if left motherless as well as fatherless, should get nothing. The case of the children indeed was especially hard, for, if they had lost both parents, they were surely objects of greater compassion than if they had only lost their father. A constable, moreover, might have aged parents who also would be left penniless. His attention had been called to this subject by a case which had come under his notice in the county of Gloucester—namely, that of constable, a widower, who died in consequence of a severe cold caught in the performance of his duty. He had three children, and they were left entirely destitute. The case was so hard that a subscription was raised for them by the magistrates. In the Colonies, the police were treated on a much more liberal footing, as a case which had come under his notice would show. A man passed from the Scotch into the Australian Service. In two years his health gave way, and he was sent home at the public expense, and with £200 in his pocket. The Australian Government, it appeared, made provision for the widows and orphans of policemen who died in its service. The chief constables were very capricious, and the men complained that the certificate which was essential to a Government superannuation allowance was often refused without good cause. In the county of Denbigh, a sergeant named Jones applied for superannuation, and the chief constable, hearing that he intended to open a public-house in his own district, refused his certificate. The matter resulted in a compromise, Jones being allowed to take a public-house in the adjoining county. Such instances of caprice being not uncommon, the men complained that they were never certain of getting their superannuation. At Quarter Sessions in his own county, he (Mr. J. R. Yorke) had heard it mentioned as an objection to a man receiving a retiring allowance that he had some private property. He had objected to that being taken into consideration; but the matter had been over-ruled, although nothing could be more absurd than to say that policemen, like Cabinet Ministers, should not be allowed to get a retiring allowance, unless they were prepared to swear that they required it to keep up their position. Another grave hardship the men suffered from was, that only one-half of their past service counted on their being transferred from one force to another, whether on promotion or not. The Committee was probably not aware of the large number of separate forces now existing in England and Wales. There were no fewer than 224, and it was quite evident that no healthy system of superannuation could be established while that state of things continued. Some three-fifths of that number only reckoned 20 men a-piece; 62 numbered 10 men; 22 numbered not more than three; and in one case, one solitary constable constituted a "force" by himself. It was evident that as men obtained promotion they must migrate from one force to another, and all who did so forfeited one-half of their time.

Mr. J. R. Yorke

Another grievance was, that when a constable died within 12 months of his superannuation, no provision was made for his widow or any other relative. To crown all, no appeal was allowed. The Committee of 1877, however, recommended that, after 15 years' service, a man should have a right of appeal against the decision of the chief constable to the police, or watch, committee of his district or borough. Generally speaking, what the men complained of was the state of insecurity in which they found themselves. They contributed largely to their funds; but they had no idea as what they would ultimately get, or whether they would get anything at all. The funds themselves were, for the most part, in an unsatisfactory condition. They were generally decreasing; and in one or two cases they were so nicely balanced that the collapse of a single constable would be enough to upset them. The Committee, under those circumstances, recommended that the rates should be made primarily responsible for the fund, the contributions of the one being paid in aid. That was inverting the present order of things; but the result was practically the same, the rates being ultimately responsible in any case. Although one of those who had always objected to the public burdens upon the rates being augmented, he could, therefore, give that recommendation his cordial support. There was a singular agreement between the changes asked for by the men and those recommended by the Committee. They hardly differed in a single particular. Both parties agreed that, after 25 years' service, constables should be entitled to retire on an allowance of two-thirds of their latest rate of pay, and that, if unfitted for further service after 15 and under 20 years' service, they should receive an allowance of one-half. The Committee, however, did not exactly agree to the scale which the men asked for. He could not sit down without reminding the Committee of the manner in which this question had been, time after time, shelved. It was raised, 12 years ago, when Lord Cranbrook was at the Home Office. In 1874 the late Home Secretary (Sir R. Assheton Cross), soon after his accession to Office, received a deputation from the men, and promised that the matter should receive immediate attention. In 1875 a Committee was appointed. In 1877 it was re-appointed, and made the Report to which he had referred. Since that time the matter had gone to sleep again; but a representative meeting of the men, held in June last, had revived it, representations having been made in connection with it to hon. Members of that House. It would be seen, by the evidence before the Committee, that all the chief constables agreed in their action. They said the service would be much more attractive if the superannuation allowances were of a more satisfactory character. It must be remembered that the service was one in which the men were exposed to peculiar danger and violence, and that it was just one of those cases in which they ought to be able to look forward to a good future if their strength should give way, or if their vigour were destroyed by an accident. These men had not protruded their grievances upon observation by violent demonstrations, such as were indulged in by some people; but that was no reason why the Committee should neglect the humble Petition which they had again and again addressed to the Home Office, and to which he had endeavoured to call the attention of the Committee.

MR. ARTHUR PEEL did not think his hon. Friend need make any excuse for introducing that subject, because, as he had stated, the matter had been something like 12 years before the House; and in 1877 a Report, going fully into the whole question, was laid upon the Table by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross), who was then the Secretary of State for the Home Department. He (Mr. Arthur Peel) did not know why, during the three years that had elapsed since 1877, the late Government did not think proper to take up the matter. He did not wish to bring any charge of neglect against the late Government; no doubt, the urgency of other Business prevented them attending to the claims of the constables of the country. But if they were unable to deal with the matter in the three years they were in Office since the presentation of the Report, he hoped he need make no excuse for the inability of the present Government to deal with it in the three months they had been in Office. He quite agreed with the hon.

Gentleman (Mr. J. R. Yorke) that the way in which this body of men had brought the matter before them gave them an additional claim upon the attention of Government. They had urged their grievance in a most respectful manner. The hon. Gentleman had stated the case most succinctly. Among other grievances alleged by the men, he had dwelt upon the operation of the present law, whereby the past service of a constable, on changing his force, was only reckoned if he had already served seven years, and if his promotion from one force to another had received the sanction of both authorities, and that even then he was only entitled to carry half of his previous service into his new force. Reference had also been made to the unprotected nature of the widows and children of the men when they became incapacitated, and the men demanded an absolute right to a pension at a given period of age. His hon. Friend had stated that the county superannuation funds were in a very critical position. That was borne out most clearly by the evidence before the Committee, and it was pretty clear that these county funds resembled some of those local benefit societies, upon whose solvency the gravest doubts were justly entertained. In his opinion, one of the alternative schemes mentioned by the Committee—namely, a great scheme of amalgamation, swallowing up all the local superannuation funds—was too vast and complicated a financial operation to be likely to work successfully. There was another point to which he would like to allude. Let them suppose that the local funds were liable to be exhausted by the demands upon them. It would be very unfair that this should be allowed before any aid was given to them from the rates, or from some other source. Some system must be devised by which the charge would be spread over a series of years, so that the present demands for superannuation would not have the effect of pressing unduly upon the existing funds. It was quite obvious that the local funds must, in any case, be supplemented from some source; but he would not pretend, at that moment, to say whether that should be done out of local or public funds. There was also the question whether the claim upon the funds should be in the absolute discretion of any one official to decide upon. That man might chance to be some capricious person, owing to whose conduct the men might lose many advantages. The difficulty, however, might be met by giving the men a right of appeal—a right of appeal to some other body as to whether the decision arrived at in any particular case was a just one or not. His hon. Friend was good enough to say that he would move the reduction of this Vote, not with the idea of testing the opinion of the Committee, but rather for the purpose of ventilating the subject. He hoped the hon. Member would not press his Motion to a division after what he (Mr. Arthur Peel) had stated. He trusted he had induced his hon. Friend to believe that he had considered the points which had been raised, and that it would be the duty of the Home Office, at the earliest opportunity, say, in the Recess—if they were to have a Recess—to take the matter into their serious consideration. He was sure he might say that nothing would be more agreeable to the Home Secretary than to do something which would promote the interests of a useful body of men who deserved well of the public, and who, in the execution of their duty, were exposed to manifold kinds of risk.

MR. GOURLEY said, that as the law now stood, superannuation allowances in the country were voluntary on the part of the magistrates and municipal authorities. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Arthur Peel) would be aware that in the Metropolis there was a compulsory superannuation allowance to the police force, and that the Committee which had sat upon the question came to the conclusion that some such system which now prevailed in the Metropolis should be made compulsory throughout the country. He hoped the Government would see their way next Session to introduce a Bill which would meet the just demands of this valuable and serviceable body of men.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS wished to bear his testimony to the fact that the police themselves had always introduced this matter in a very proper spirit, for their claims had always been couched in respectful language. There was no doubt that the Report which the Committee made upon this matter was a very elaborate one; but the vastness of the scheme which was propounded in that Report was not calculated to hasten, at all events, legislation. This subject was seriously entertained by the late Government, although they had not had the time to bring it before the House. He had no doubt some measure dealing with it would eventually have been introduced, and he was glad to see that the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Arthur Peel) had given the question his consideration. What had fallen from the hon. Gentleman was quite true; what was wanted was a fund; but the important point was, where was that fund to come from? In the last Parliament there was the greatest possible aversion to make further charges on the rates, and his hon. Friend would find that when he came to propose that he would have to face that difficulty. The local rates had been greatly increased of late, and throughout the length and breadth of England and Scotland there was the greatest possible objection to throwing additional burdens upon the ratepayers. Some funds were wanted, and, in the long run, they would have to consider whether they would supplement the existing funds to make them last a little longer. If, to do that, they did not come upon the rates, they would have to come upon the Treasury. The main difficulty in the case was where they had to get the money from. He quite agreed that it was hard that a man should lose his right to a pension if he left one force to join another; but, in that event, his hon. Friend would find he had to deal with a different set of ratepayers, and that the second set of ratepayers were not willing, as a rule, to pay a pension what they considered ought to be paid by the first set. All he could promise the hon. Gentleman was, that whenever the Government did come to deal with the matter, they should have all the assistance that it was in his power to render.

Vote agreed to.

MR. FINIGAN desired to point out to the Committee, before they proceeded further, that they had now been sitting many hours, and that his experience in the House taught him that after half-past 12 o'clock it was a very wise and prudent thing to report Progress. The Government had made as much headway as they anticipated, and he would move that the Chairman do now report Progress.

Mr. Arthur Peel

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Finigan.)

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, they had no wish to be relieved of their labours yet. He trusted that the Committee would sit a short time longer.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 7; Noes 133: Majority 126.—(Div. List, No. 101.)

(18.) £263,697, to complete the sum for Convict Establishments in England and the Colonies.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, they had now got 16 Votes in Supply, an amount of progress which must make the heart of the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) glad. He hoped the noble Lord would now, he having fared so splendidly that evening, and looking to the number of important measures standing in the Orders of the Day, consent to report Progress. He (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) did not care to move that the House do now adjourn, for he thought that the noble Lord, with that good grace which became him so well, would accede to the wishes of several hon. Gentlemen.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, his hon. and learned Friend had made an appeal to him to look at the Orders of the Day. He had looked at them, and found that, in almost all cases, they were distinguished by the little "a." He would, in return, appeal to his hon. and learned Friend that after all, as the Business of the House must be conducted in a spirit of mutual accommodation, whether it would not be a graceful act on the part of the minority to allow them to proceed?

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN quite agreed with the noble Lord that some concession was due to the large majority in the recent division; but in regard to the matter of the little "a," he had to say that its appearance on the Orders only suggested that they ought to have made their Motion before half-past 12 o'clock. As far as he personally was concerned, he would not at all object to take some more Votes; but he trusted, nevertheless, that the noble Lord would remember that some of them had been watching Supply the whole of the evening, and assisting the noble Lord as well as they could.

MR. FINIGAN pointed out to the noble Lord that the large majority which he, amongst others, was asked to consider, had not been in the House throughout the night. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen cried "Oh, oh;" but it was a fact that the Front Benches had been for the most part of the evening comparatively empty, while for two or three hours there had not been a single Conservative Member present. He did not think it was fair to ask those hon. Gentlemen who had been present the whole of the day to sit much longer. He was, however, open to any reasonable proposition; and if the noble Lord would state how far he wished to go they might come to terms.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON remarked that the question was one to be decided not by the number of Votes to be taken, but by the amount of discussion likely to arise upon them. It seemed to him it would be quite fair to continue the consideration of the Estimates a short time longer.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the Government had not much right to expect forbearance from the Irish Members who formed the minority in the last division. The Irish Members had not received from the Government very much in the shape of forbearance this Session. The only Irish measure which was promised in the Queen's Speech, and which was worth discussion—namely, the Borough Franchise (Ireland) Bill—was thrown over on the first opportunity.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the hon. Member that the Question before the Committee was a particular Vote.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he was quite prepared to go on a little longer. At the same time, he was quite prepared to support any of his hon. Friends who moved to report Progress at any time. Amongst the details of the Vote there used to be an item for forage, which had disappeared. He wished to know how forage was now provided for. The proceeds of prison labour, he observed, figured as £15,000 in a small foot note. Could the noble Lord inform the Committee how those proceeds were obtained, and why it was that they had fallen to their present figure from £23,000, at which they stood the year before last?

MR. HOPWOOD confessed that there was something appalling to his view in the fact that so many thousands of persons were confined in our convict prisons. The main question for the Committee, it seemed to him, was not how much those persons cost, but how their number could be diminished. He wished to know to what extent the views of the Commission on Prisons had been acted upon in reference to the subject of inspection. To every man in that Committee, inspection, surely, was a matter of supreme importance. He believed the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire and one or two others had been appointed Inspectors of Prisons; but that was not enough to satisfy the public mind. On the staff of those immense establishments there were, no doubt, many men who could be intrusted with dominion over their fellow-creatures; but there were also many who, in his (Mr. Hopwood's) opinion, could not be. What guarantee had they that force, and violence, and cruelty were not practised? It might be said, why concern yourself about the inmates of convict prisons? Well, he did so, because he believed there were persons there who ought not to be there, because they were innocent—others who were there through influences which might very well be prevented for the future; and he believed proper inspection would reveal that. The sentences inflicted all through the country were unnecessarily long. At the Surrey Sessions, not long ago, a man received 22 years' penal servitude in the shape of accumulated sentences, and such cases were not uncommon.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. and learned Member was going beyond the immediate question.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he had no intention of offending; but, with all respect to the Chair, it seemed to him the length of sentences was cognate to the question before them. He would, however, defer his remarks on that subject till another occasion. At present he would merely ask for information as to the inspection of convict prisons. Those establishments were under certain Commissioners; but he had no confidence in any body of men in that position, unless the fullest publicity was given to all their proceedings.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL concurred in the views of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr.

Hopwood). The Royal Commission undoubtedly discovered many defects in the convict establishments of the country, and attention had been called to the subject by one or two works recently published. In the matter of inspection, the prison system seemed particularly to require amendment. The Commissioners gave notice of their coming, so that everything could be prepared for them. Now, inspection, under those circumstances, was reduced to a mere matter of form; it was not calculated to render the officials of the prisons continually careful and cautious in the performance of their duties, and in the observance of the rules laid down by the Home Office. He wished to know what were the intentions of the Government in regard to the classification of prisoners. There was no question which had a more important bearing than that with respect to the repression and prevention of crime. It was perfectly monstrous that young persons should, on their first offence, be sent to Portland or Dartmoor, to herd during their term of penal servitude with the worst of their kind—men who were perfect devils in human form. If they were kept apart many of them might reform, and on leaving the prison become respectable members of society. As it was, they were sent to prisons without the slightest chance of amelioration being given them. He was glad the question had been raised, and he hoped to have from the Secretary of State some assurance that it would receive his careful attention.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN felt bound, at the risk of repeating himself, Session after Session, to remind hon. Members that without a system of really independent inspection, the most humanely devised rules might become the instrument of tyranny. What was required was a system of extra-official inspection without notice by medical officers. He did not mean the ordinary medical officers of the prison, but independent men. The interests of authority and the interests of society would always be sufficiently well attended to by the governors and officials of the prisons; but there was a danger of the interests of humanity being overlooked. He was sorry to say he had known instances of the greatest cruelty in some of those prisons which were hermetically sealed to the outer world. He wished at once to say that he made no charge against individual medical officers of prisons; but he protested against the medical officer of a prison being a mere prison official. There existed formerly, in Ireland, a system of management in convict prisons which was a credit to the Government of the day. There was a medical inspection by some of the highest men of the Medical Profession in Ireland. The Government, however, he was ashamed to say, after some experience of the system, found it more convenient to have the medical inspection performed by men who were not so independent. Those independent medical men were removed, and prison doctors of the usual kind appointed in their stead. He cast no aspersions upon these prison doctors; but no one could say that they were men of the stamp of the late President of the Irish College of Physicians, or that their position was such as to enable them to combat successfully the cruelties which were sometimes practised within prison walls. He would not weary the Committee by detailing matters which had come under his own notice; but he would say, as the result of his observation of prison management—and it was tolerably reliable, for he had been connected with the Governing Body of one of the prisons of Dublin—that unless inspection of a non-technical or non-official character were provided, cases of great severity and great hardship would occur even under the most humane regulations. He felt it right to support the suggestions of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Hopwood), especially now that the prisons were no longer subject to the supervision of the country gentlemen of England, which, although desultory, was always independent and humane. The tendency of the official mind under the constant strain of responsibility for the safe custody of prisoners was to become narrow and contracted, and to shut out entirely the humanizing influences that prevailed out-of-doors.

Mr. ARTHUR PEEL said, he was convinced the estimate of the value of prison labour as at present arrived at was somewhat fallacious. That was altogether a very difficult question to deal with, inasmuch as the work was performed under peculiar conditions as compared with that done for the open market. He entirely admitted the desirability of an independent inspection of prisons. It would be very unfortunate if the idea became prevalent that within prisons anything like tyranny was practised. All kinds of exaggerations and all kinds of surmises would be indulged in. It was, however, a mistake to suppose that, under the Prisons Act, independent inspection had been abolished. It was the earnest wish of the Home Office that the Visiting Justices should not abdicate their functions in regard to prisons. They had been encouraged in every way to continue their visits, both by the late Home Secretary, and by his right hon. and learned Friend who now held Office. They had been repeatedly told that, under the Prisons Act, they had very large and very important duties to perform, amongst others that of investigating the complaints of prisoners, and of acting as an independent medium between the prisoners and the outside public. The convict establishments, likewise, were visited by a body of independent gentlemen of the highest standing and character, and the functions of those gentlemen were by no means a sinecure. The Home Office had spared no pains to obtain the services of the best men in that capacity, as the official Correspondence would show. The Report of the Royal Commissioners laid great stress on the classification of prisoners. Their recommendations on that point, he had reason to believe, were being attended to as far as possible by the Prison Commissioners. But, however easy it might seem in theory to form distinct bodies of prisoners, it was very difficult in practice. There might be circumstances in each case which rendered a hard-and-fast classification extremely difficult; and he was not sure that the existing accommodation of convict prisons would permit of it. The subject, however, was receiving the careful consideration of the Home Office. With regard to prison labour, he might just add that the system hitherto pursued had not been such as to lead to any very satisfactory conclusions respecting it.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL observed, that the difficulties of classification might be lessened if the opinion of the Judges as to a prisoner's character were ascertained. The Judge who tried a case would generally be able to give the Home Office pretty correct information on that point.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had instructed the Prison Commissioners, when he was at the Home Office, to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners with the least possible delay. The question of classification was the first submitted to their attention; and it was, they would all agree, a very difficult one. Convicts differed materially from each other. Prisoners unused to crime might, no doubt, be corrupted by associates who were worse than themselves. At the same time, the greatest care in such matters was required to prevent any suspicion of favouritism. That a convict should have been at one time a gentleman was no reason why he should receive different treatment from his fellow-convicts. If any such impression got abroad, it would be fatal to all confidence in the justice of sentences. Besides, there were practical difficulties to encounter of a very serious kind. Before leaving Office, he thought he saw his way to separating, at all events, the least criminal prisoners from others who would be likely to contaminate them, and he hoped to hear from the Government next year how far it had been possible to carry that scheme out. The hon. and learned Member for Meath (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) had alluded to medical officers; and in consequence of what had taken place he, when he was at the Home Office, thought it wise that there should be an independent Medical inspection by an experienced man, and the Home Office did appoint a Medical Inspector. No doubt he belonged to the staff; but that was not likely to influence him in any of his actions. He had express instructions to see that all the sanitary arrangements were carried out, and was to exercise a general superintendence over all the medical officers in the various prisons. While he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) was at the Home Office, the gentleman appointed Inspector had secured the entire confidence of the medical staff in all the prisons, and in many cases he had introduced reforms of the very greatest value; in fact, the whole medical system was being administered with immense good. He had to thank Lord Campbell and the Gentlemen composing the Committee who sat upon the question for all the inquiries they made, and it had been a matter of great satisfaction to see that the different reforms were carried into effect. He trusted the Home Office would not relax their efforts in this good work.

MR. MONTAGUE GUEST hoped the Home Office would turn their attention to the case of the military convict prisoners, who were sentenced for purely military offences, and were put upon the same level in our convict prisons with men who were convicted of the most heinous offences. He thought they ought to be distinguished from these convicts. At present there was no difference made between them and any other prisoners. It would be desirable, if possible, that there should be separate establishments for military convict prisoners. The effect of the present system was to brand those men, who were guilty only of military offences, as convicted felons, and put them on the same footing, when ticket-of-leave men, as those who had committed the most terrible crimes.

MR. DILLON did not understand the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Arthur Peel) to reply to the observations of the hon. and learned Member for Meath (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) as to medical superintendence. The present superintendence was perfectly useless, for he (Mr. Dillon) had heard, upon the best authority, that prisoners who suffered from ill-treatment had, in reality, no opportunity whatever of appealing against the evil they were suffering from. The Government might consider that hon. Gentlemen were wasting the time of the Committee in discussing this question; but it was better they should know that a strong feeling did exist upon this point. The whole of the question of effectual superintendence and inspection of penal servitude prisoners was one surrounded by the greatest possible difficulty, and he believed that the only way out of the difficulty was that suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Meath—namely, that attached to each prison there should be at least one medical man of the highest standing, who should have the right to visit the prison at any time he liked. The right hon. Gentleman the late Home Secretary (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had said that the question of medical superintendence had been taken into consideration, and that the plan suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Meath had been acted upon, but had broken down signally. They had instead appointed an officer residing in London, who was to have the run of all prisons. From his (Mr. Dillon's) and his hon. and learned Friend's point of view, such an official would be of no value whatever, and his appointment gave them no confidence that the evils of which they complained would be remedied. They must recollect that the happiness and comfort of prisoners might depend upon the disposition of one individual. It might happen that once in the course of a century they would get a philanthropist in the pay of the Government, and, in that case, the prisoners would be properly cared for. As a rule, however, they got men as superintendents of prisons who simply drew the salaries and did nothing for it, and the suffering of the prisoners might not come under observation. He would not occupy the time of the Committee longer on this question; but only say that this grievance was a real, and not an imaginary, one. The suffering of prisoners in some cases was of the most intense character, and he would content himself by giving one illustration. The case was not generally known, but it occurred some five or six years ago. A turnkey in one of the convict prisons so persecuted prisoners, and permitted cruelties upon them, that one prisoner, more clever than his companions, mixed poison in his drink one day and the man died. He (Mr. Dillon) knew of the circumstance from a man who was in the secret. The cruelty which led to such an act as that really required investigation; and the Government, if they wished to economize time, would make some explanation which would be satisfactory to hon. Gentlemen.

MR. WODEHOUSE said, that in the matter of the classification of prisoners, the exact recommendation of the Royal Commission was that all prisoners against whom no previous conviction had at any time been recorded should be kept in a separate class. If it was discovered that a man had got into this class accidentally, it was recommended that power should be given to the Directors of Convict Prisons to remove them to their proper class. It would be seen, by reference to the annual Report of the Directors of Convict Prisons, which was issued very shortly after they received the Report of the Royal Commission, that they there say they would at once take steps to carry into execution the Commission's recommendations; and though he had no official knowledge of the fact, he believed that they were now being carried into effect. It had been said by more than one speaker in the course of the discussion that 'convict prisons were hermetically sealed to the public. He did not suppose any hon. Gentleman desired to throw open convict prisons to the gaze of the curious, or of any person who chose to enter them. That seemed to be an impossible arrangement. Even the visits of the Royal Commissioners or Inspectors, from time to time, had a more or less disturbing effect upon the discipline of the convicts; and, therefore, it was desirable that those visits should not occur at too rapid intervals. It must be borne in mind that persons were constantly leaving the prisons for the freedom of the world; and if they felt they had suffered any serious wrong while imprisoned they would most probably have recourse to the newspapers. If abuses, then, existed in the prisons, there was ample opportunity for the public to become acquainted with them. The Royal Commission, of which he acted as Secretary, went to most of the convict prisons, examined into them most minutely, and saw prisoners apart from either of the prison officials, and pressed them to complain of anything in their treatment which they thought in any degree harsh or unjust. The prisoners spoke with perfect freedom, and by some complaints were made. The net result, however, of all the inquiries of this body of independent Royal Commissioners was, that they reported that the system of penal servitude was, on the whole, satisfactory and free from grave abuse. Convicts had the opportunity of complaining of medical officers; but, on the whole, they bore testimony to the extreme kindness with which they were treated by these gentlemen.

MR. FINIGAN desired to point out a fair mode of ascertaining the results of the prisoner's labours. He knew it was a very awkward matter to find out what each prisoner's labour was actually worth; but he thought that might be done by ascertaining what the value of the work would be if performed outside the prison. In Austria, Hungary, and in France there prevailed a very excellent system of employing prisoners, so as not to interfere with the out-door general labour. Prisoners there were allowed, after they had some certain necessary work imposed upon them by law, to engage in any artistic or other work congenial to their own minds. That practice might with advantage be adopted in this country, for then the prisoner would have some little money with which to face the world when he was released.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, it would be very satisfactory if the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Arthur Peel) could give them, at any rate, an idea of the approximate amount earned by the prisoners. He observed that there was a new charge in the Vote of £200 for superintending the Medical Department. He did not know whether the £200 was for the medical officer, who was resident in London. But it seemed to him a very small sum to pay a medical officer who occupied any position of note. The next point to which he wished to draw attention was the sum of £305 for the Fine Fund. This fund was conducted on the most extraordinary principle. Practically, in all convict prisons, the officers were told off to detect one another. As soon as one officer happened to find an unfortunate fellow-officer in a fault, he could get him fined, and the amount was handed over to the Fine Fund, which, at stated periods, was distributed among the officers. That was a system which had been condemned by a great many authorities, and he should like to know whether it was intended by the Government to put an end to it?

MR. ARTHUR PEEL was not able to give an entirely satisfactory answer in reference to the Fine Fund; but he would inquire into it?

Vote agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock;

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

CENSUS (IRELAND) BILL.—[Lords.]

(Mr. W. E. Forster.)

[BILL 284.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 and 2 severally agreed to.

Mr. Finigan

Clause 3 (By whom the account shall be taken)

MR. LITTON moved, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 26, to leave out the words "religious profession," prior to the Census Act of the year 1860. He explained that no Return as to their religious profession was required from the people of Ireland. In 1860, the words "religious profession," which stood in the English Bill of that year, were struck out after debate without a division; and then, curiously enough, they were inserted in the Irish Bill, which had been brought in without them. He failed to see why, in this matter, a distinction should be drawn between England and Ireland. It might be argued that, in 1860, it was a matter of interest to have a Return of the religious profession of the people of Ireland in view of the condition of the Established Church in that country. A large majority of the Irish people were Roman Catholics, and they were naturally anxious that their numerical superiority should be clearly brought out. But the Irish Church having been disestablished, the political reasons for a religious Return no longer existed in Ireland, where all creeds were on the same level, and it was most desirable that religious rivalry should not be encouraged. Hence his desire to assimilate the Irish Census Bill to that of England. There was, in fact, no possible reason why the people of Ireland should be called upon to state their religious views in the approaching Census, while the people of England were not. Both in England and Scotland the idea of a religious Census had been repudiated. Under these circumstances, he thought the Government would act wisely in abolishing what would only be an apple of discord in Ireland, especially as in so doing they would be placing Ireland in the same position as the other portions of the United Kingdom.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 26, to leave out the words "religious profession."—(Mr. Litton.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'religious profession' stand part of the Clause."

DR. KINNEAR supported the Amendment, which he believed was in accordance with the views of the great majority of the Presbyterians of Ulster.

MR. BIGGAR hoped the Committee would not entertain the Amendment, which really emanated from the Presbyterians. Now, the Presbyterians, some of them at least, were a very estimable body; but they were in a very great minority in Ireland, and they did not like the fact brought out. The Roman Catholics formed three-fourths of the population of Ireland; but the Presbyterians endeavoured to give themselves the appearance of being numerous, by counting their communicants, and their seat-holders, &c., over and over again. Sometimes their game was to make their numbers appear as small as possible, in order that their contributions to the Sustentation Fund might be proportionately less.

MR. SHAW hoped the Amendment would not be pressed to a division. The Bill was perfectly satisfactory to the people of Ireland. Probably, it would have been as well never to have commenced the religious Census in Ireland; but, now that it had been established, there was no objection to continuing it. As a Presbyterian, he confessed that the Members of his persuasion were a small body in Ireland; but they made up in quality what they lacked in quantity. He believed all Bodies in Ireland were satisfied with the religious Census. Even his hon. Friend the Mover of the Amendment (Mr. Litton) had in view, he (Mr. Shaw) believed, not the abolition of the religious Census altogether, but an enumeration of Church-goers on Sunday, the result of which would be to make everybody go to church on a particular day, man, woman, and child, whatever the state of the weather and whether they liked it or not.

MAJOR NOLAN said, the religious Census had always given perfect satisfaction to the great majority in Ireland. To the Roman Catholics it had been of inestimable advantage. He believed they would never have got Disestablishment without it; and by showing their great numerical superiority it had been instrumental in securing them many appointments which had been monopolized by the Presbyterians. The people of property in Ireland, as a general rule, were Protestants, and they naturally appointed their co-religionists to offices of which they had the patronage, so that a small minority of the population had more than their fair share of good things.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, he could see no justification for the State concerning itself with what a private citizen's religious opinions might be. As for the second Amendment, to which allusion had been made, the Committee were under no obligation to adopt it. They might content themselves by placing Ireland in the same position as the rest of the United Kingdom. He confessed he was a little surprised to find that hon. Gentlemen from Ireland, who usually complained that their country received exceptional treatment, should, in this instance, be found supporting a provision which placed it on a different footing from England. Parliament did not want to know whether Ireland was Roman Catholic or Presbyterian; the information was not required for any civil or secular purpose; and, therefore, he felt bound to support the Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not accept the Amendment; but he should be deceiving the Committee if he did not acknowledge that, personally, he should prefer not to ask Irishmen, any more than Englishmen or Scotchmen, what their religion was. The majority of the Irish people were evidently in favour of a religious Census, although the reasons for it which existed previous to Disestablishment had, in a great measure, disappeared, and their wishes in that matter had to be consulted. He should not be sorry if, in 10 years time, a different feeling prevailed. He regretted to find that the question of religion was so often brought to the front in Ireland; it was the first thing his attention was called to when an office had to be filled up.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE supported the Amendment. He objected to a Census of religious profession for Ireland, as he should object to one for Scotland, if it were proposed, and that on the simple ground that it was inquisitorial and outside the right of the State. He held that this was a question on which the objection of a minority, who were actuated by conscientious motives, ought to be deferred to, especially as it was proposed that the Return should be enforced by a penalty.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN insisted that this was a matter in which the Irish people themselves ought to be allowed to be the judges. The advocates of equality between England and Ireland did not carry out their principle to its logical conclusion, otherwise they would object also to the employment of the Dublin Police in the Census taking. If a religious Census were now proposed for the first time he was not sure he would vote for it; it was extremely inquisitorial; but, at that late hour, he appealed to the Committee not to make so important a change in the Bill as was proposed, especially as it might arouse the susceptibilities of the Irish people. He could not share the views of his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) with regard to the Presbyterians, who, he was quite sure, were animated by conscientious motives. He believed their reason for objecting to the Bill was the tendency of men who were nothing in particular to put themselves themselves down as Episcopalians.

MR. LITTON, as an Episcopalian, said, his feeling was that the question of religious differences in Ireland ought not to be the subject of State inquiry or interference.

MR. WILLIS supported the Amendment, holding that the question of whether a man was a Protestant or a Roman Catholic was one which affected himself alone. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would take no account of such differences in making his official appointments, and that he would consent to the Amendment, for they had reached an age in which a profession of faith was not required by Roman Catholics or Episcopalians. It was time to desist from such a practice, which was condemned by the majority of persons in Ireland. He hoped the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Litton) would press his Amendment to a division.

MAJOR NOLAN believed there was not a Census in the world, save that of England and Scotland, in which the religious profession of the people was not accounted for. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Litton) had stated that it was inquisitorial; but, surely, he proposed a greater inquisition when he proposed that on the 3rd of April the people attending places of divine worship should be counted.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 39; Noes 14: Majority 25.—(Div. List, No. 101.)

Mr. A. M. Sullivan

MR. LITTON, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 27, after "persons," to insert—

"And also an account in writing of the number of persons attending the respective places of public worship, distinguishing such places on Sunday, the third day of April aforesaid," said, that he had been induced to put his Amendment upon the Paper in pursuance of a Resolution agreed to at a recent general assembly of the Presbyterian Body. After the observations which had been made, he would not trouble the Committee by pressing the Amendment to a division.

MAJOR NOLAN strongly objected to his constituents being put to the annoyance of being counted in church. Let the Presbyterians do it, if they chose; but he did not see why all men and women, with their children and babies six months old, should be required to swarm into a place so that they could be counted.

MR. CALLAN said, there was no reason at all why the people of Ireland should undergo this annoyance in order to please that illiberal and pretentious Body, the General Assembly. Now that the great Liberal Party was in power, that Body seemed to put itself forward as the patron general of Ireland as well as the General Assembly.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, his objection to the Amendment was as strong as was his attachment to the first proposition of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Litton). He trusted they would not be called upon to divide.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 4 to 6, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 7 (Penalty for refusing to answer, or for giving false answers).

MR. SERJEANT SIMON observed, that in this clause a great principle was at stake. To impose a penalty upon the minority would be unjust. No man had a right to demand to know what his religious belief was; and the Government, he contended, had and could have no such right. If the majority of Irishmen, for reasons which he could understand, were willing and even anxious to declare their religious profession, it required no penalty to compel them; but it would be a grievous wrong to impose it upon those who conscientiously objected to do so. He would, therefore, move to add at the end of the clause words providing that no person should be subject to such forfeiture for refusing to state his religious profession.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, at end of Clause, add "Provided always, That no person shall be subject to such forfeiture for refusing to state his religious profession."—(Mr. Serjeant Simon.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MAJOR NOLAN supported the Amendment. He did not wish the Census to be an inquisitorial matter.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that he would be glad to support the Amendment, because there were many people who did not know what their religious professions were.

MR. BIGGAR remarked that the Established and Presbyterian Churches in Ireland would intentionally make the clause inoperative by neglecting systematically to exhibit their numbers. Unless some penalty was imposed for the purpose of obtaining a religious Census they would have all the Catholics stated; but the other sects would neglect to describe themselves. The result would be that the Return would be one-sided, and would fail to give a correct idea of the religious views of the people.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he did not see how it was possible to resist this Amendment. No doubt, there were some persons who had very strong objections—almost conscientious objections—to stating their religious profession, and those objections ought to be respected.

MR. DAWSON opposed the Amendment, on the ground that the imposition of the penalty would secure the result desired.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, that if a person had a conscientious objection to stating his religious profession, he would be the last man in the world to desire that he should be fined for failing to do so. It would lead to a little bickering for the next 10 years between Catholics and Protestants; but, so far as the House was concerned, they need take no notice of it. There was one advantage in a religious profession Census which seemed to have been lost sight of; it had the effect of showing what amount of Mormon emigration there was from Great Britain and Ireland to America. No one would say that that was not a matter, statistically speaking, of great importance. He believed that from Ireland 11 Mormons had emigrated to America.

MR. SEXTON, in order that the Census might be complete, suggested that there should be a column showing the number of persons who declined to state their religious profession. None of the religious sects would then be able to make erroneous statements as to abstentions.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 8 and 9 agreed to.

Clause 10 (The person taking the accounts to certify and affirm as to their correctness, and deliver them to the officer appointed to receive them. Such officer to transmit them to the Office of the Chief Secretary).

DR. LYONS, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 4, line 5, after "Ireland," to insert "such other persons as the Lord Lieutenant shall appoint for that purpose," said, it was very necessary that the Census should be carried out according to the wishes of the great majority of the people, and his Amendment would tend to secure that end. He trusted the Committee would pass it unanimously.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 5, after "Ireland," to insert "such other persons as the Lord Lieutenant shall appoint for that purpose."—(Dr. Lyons.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. SEXTON remarked, that the Amendment as it stood did not quite meet the objection; but, taken in conjunction with the statement of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) that one Catholic Commissioner would be appointed, it might safely be adopted.

MR. W. E. FORSTER observed, that a Catholic Commissioner would be appointed. The Committee was aware that the Bill was brought forward in the early part of the year, and there seemed to be reason for confining it to the Registrar General. There was, however, a strong feeling in Ireland in favour of a religious Census; and although there might be a great deal said for and against having such a Census, they were inclined, in deference to that feeling, to make proper arrangements to secure a bond fide expression of religious profession.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 11 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

CENSUS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—[Lords.]

(Mr. Arthur Peel.)

[BILL 286.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 4, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Householders' schedules to be left at dwelling-houses. Occupiers to fill up the schedules and sign and return them to the enumerator. Penalty for neglect).

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN hoped provision would be made for taking a Census of the Gaelic-speaking people in Scotland. Scholars not only in this country, but in Germany, would look upon such a Return with great interest. From an educational point of view, it would be essentially useful to have such a Return; and he hoped the Government would give them some indication that they would carry out his suggestion.

MR. W. HOLMS said, that personally he had no objection to such a Return being made; but he believed the speaking of Gaelic was greatly diminishing in Scotland.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN confessed surprise at the remark of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. Holms), remembering, as he did, that the countrymen of the hon. Member had subscribed £12,000 to found a Gaelic Chair in the National University.

Mr. W. E. Forster

MR. DAWSON remarked that they were assembled to promote, amongst other things, great educational objects; and, from an educational point of view, it would be well to have the column suggested.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the service of the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881, the sum of £10,818,274 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock;

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

House adjourned at a quarter after Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 10th August, 1880.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Married Women's Policies of Assurance (Scotland)* (188); General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Provisional Order (Forfar Gas)* (189).

Second Reading—Committee negatived—Third Reading—Lord Plunket's Indemnity*, and passed.

Committee—Report—Kinsale Harbour* (178).

Third Reading—Exchequer Bonds and Bills*: Artizans and Labourers Dwellings (Scotland) Provisional Order (Leith)* (155), and passed.

REPORTING IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS —REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE.—RESOLUTIONS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES) wished to ask, whether there were any drawings of the alterations proposed to be made in the Gallery for the reporters; and, if they would be laid on the Table before the Address to the Crown was moved on Thursday next? They did not know what effect would be produced on the House by the proposed alterations; and it was very desirable that their Lordships should have some idea of what would be done. He might state that when the alterations were made in 1849 they had plans laid before them of Mr. Barry, and they were approved by the House. That was a plan prepared by the architect. Now, so far as he knew anything about the matter, they were not in a position to sanction any alterations, as they knew nothing of them; and he hoped they would have a decided plan on the Table before they were asked to come to any conclusion.

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to say that there appeared to be a little feeling in the House upon this matter, and to suggest that it might, perhaps, be well if one or more of the reporters would take notes in the side Galleries as they now existed before any alterations were made.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN, as a Member of the Select Committee on Reporting in the House, regretted that his noble Friend (Lord Sudeley) was not present; but said that the effect of the proposed alterations was explained to their Lordships when the Resolution was under discussion.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES) pointed out that in the present state of Business in the House there was not much probability of a debate; and, therefore, a fair trial in the side Galleries could not be had. They had been told that the reporters could pass from one side of the House to the other in 40 seconds; but he believed, from information which had reached him, that they could not move about in that way during the taking of their reports.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN approved of the suggestion of the noble Earl the Leader of the House, which could not possibly do any harm.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH said, although some of their Lordships might not be heard in the Reporters' Gallery, it would be the fault of the speaker if not heard in the front row of the Stranger's Gallery, a noble Lord, in addition to himself, having tested it on one occasion when the House was full.

LORD DENMAN said, that there was no evidence that the reporters themselves wished to abandon their present position. He suggested that the Peers should be asked whether they wished to abandon their Galleries. It would surprise the House to see the place usually occupied by their Royal Highnesses the Princess of Wales and the Duchess of Teck occupied by strangers, and possibly opposite to them the Queen of Beauty herself—in a full House.

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND said, that in the present state of the House, and at this period of the Session, it would be out of character to consider the matter further.

[The subject then dropped.]

AFGHANISTAN — MILITARY OPERATIONS—THE DEFEAT BEFORE CANDAHAR.

QUESTIONS. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD DORCHESTER, in rising to ask the Under Secretary of State for War or Her Majesty's Government by whose nomination or authority the appointment of Brigadier-General Burrows was made to command a brigade of the British Forces before Candahar; and what were the antecedents of that officer's professional career to justify such nomination to a very responsible command in presence of an enemy? said, that he felt some little difficulty in giving Notice of the Question, seeing that the India Office was no longer represented by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) in that House, and that he regretted considering the present troubled state of India. He felt, however, that the Question of which he had given Notice was one upon which their Lordships and the public generally had a right to expect some clear and explicit information, looking at the telegraphic news which had reached this country from India. The 66th was one of the bravest regiments in the Queen's service, and had been highly distinguished in the past—as it no doubt was on this recent occasion—and an English force should not be allowed to fall, surrounded by a Native force, without some explanation to the country. A very great and deep feeling of sorrow had spread through the county from which the regiment took its name; and it would tend to enhance the military spirit in the country, and men would be induced to enlist in the Army, if, when a disaster occurred, it was known how it had been brought about, and that the regiment had not been commanded by inexperienced, and, perhaps, incompetent, men. No British soldiers had ever been exposed to greater dangers from a warlike and treacherous foe and a hot climate than were our troops now in Afghanistan. The Bengal Army, the Madras Army, and the Bombay Army were three distinct Armies. Such an arrangement might have been necessary in former times; but in these days of telegrams it was unadvisable, and the question arose whether the Army of India should now be overhauled. He believed that, in addition to the three Armies maintained, there was a British Frontier Force, in which, if he were not mistaken, the appointments were made by the Governor General himself, independently of the Commander-in-Chief of the Bengal Army, or the Governor General of Bombay, or the Governor General of Madras. Now, the English Army, within the last 25 years, had been engaged in one very serious war, and three trifling and less serious wars against the black races, and there were officers who had served in the various India Armies with more or less distinction, and who had shown great capacity for command; and it surprised him not a little when he heard that the vanguard of the Afghan Army was allowed to penetrate 70 or 80 miles beyond the reserve force at Candahar in the direction of Herat—to penetrate into a rocky and mountainous country, and intersected by watercourses, which offered as many impediments as a rocky and mountainous country could to the progress of troops. He confessed it did surprise him very much when he heard that a force of British Artillery, Cavalry, and Infantry had been allowed to advance under the command of an officer who, from all the records he had been able to search, had no military experience whatever—[“Oh! oh!”]—except such as the orderly-room and the Staff of the Bombay establishment might have provided him with. [“Oh, oh!”] It would be felt, from his position in that House, that he would not say anything which would detract from the character of an absent man—as, when he himself was a soldier, he knew how difficult the position of men in the Army was who could not defend themselves, or had not friends in that House, or who could not communicate with anyone in this country. But that was not now the question. There were several brigades and divisions at present in Afghanistan which were commanded, if he was not very much misinformed, by men who had had no recent experience, and little, if any, experience at all of war. Those men would discharge their duties with great zeal and ability; but they were not best qualified for actual employment before the enemy. [“Oh, oh!”] He would repeat that, notwithstanding the remonstrances of noble Lords on the Treasury Bench. It was hard upon those soldiers who had served in the field to be commanded by those who had not seen active service. He did not know how the Under Secretary of State for War would justify the appointment of men who had not had experience in the art of war. It was not an unfair comparison to make when he asked how could a man command a ship at sea who was not a sailor? He was about to put the Question of which he had given Notice without any knowledge whatever of Brigadier General Burrows, or of the authority by which he had been placed in high command at a period of the greatest difficulty. He might add that this disaster to soldiers wearing the British uniform was the worst that had occurred during the last 40 years; and he thought that the country would require ample explanation of all the circumstances. He was not actuated by any personal feeling whatever in asking the Question; and he repudiated the remonstrances of the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Under Secretary of State for War, who chose to cry “Oh, oh!” simply because he (Lord Dorchester) said that experienced soldiers should be employed before the inexperienced.

Lord Dorchester

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that before his noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for War replied, he wished to express his opinion that by his Question, and the observations with which it had been prefaced, the noble and gallant Lord had made an unjust and ungenerous attack on an officer placed in a position of much difficulty. Some of the bravest and most competent commanders had sustained defeats and suffered disasters. It was always held that Parliament should be extremely cautious before they blamed any officer before he was fully heard. It seemed to him that that House especially should be careful not to impugn the character of any officer before he had been heard; and he regretted the course which had been taken by the noble and gallant Lord, as the officer might feel that he was condemned before he had been heard. It was right that there should be a full and careful inquiry into this disaster; but they should not, before such an inquiry, pass an adverse opinion upon Brigadier General Burrows merely because a misfortune had overtaken him. These observations would apply to both naval and military officers.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH was understood to say that he would not impute to any officer, senior or junior, blame in this matter, because the conduct of those in command would, no doubt, be thoroughly sifted; but he felt that the whole force was altogether inadequate for the duties which it had to perform. It was well known that soldiers were sometimes politicians, and were guided by other than military considerations.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he must echo the sentiments of the noble Duke, and protest that it was the most unfair and ungenerous Question which he had heard put in that House, and before they had any accurate or full details as to how far the catastrophe took place; and without having Brigadier General Burrows's own account of how it occurred. The noble and gallant Lord had, if not explicitly, at any rate implicitly, criticized the conduct of the General who had had the grave misfortune of commanding a body of men who had suffered an unfortunate defeat. On behalf of Her Majesty's Government and the War Office, he did not deprecate inquiry of the most searching character; but he did deprecate the ungenerous condemnation of an officer, implicitly or explicitly, before they were fully acquainted with the facts of the case, and before they knew what the officer had to say for himself.

LORD DORCHESTER: I beg leave to deny having brought any charge whatever against that officer.

THE EARL OF MORLEY: If the noble and gallant Lord's observations and Question had any meaning, they implied that the officer who had commanded the brigade was unfit for his post; and, under cover of a Question pointed at one General in particular, the noble and gallant Lord implicitly, if not explicitly, brought charges against a number of other gallant officers commanding forces in Afghanistan. He (the Earl of Morley) did not wish to go into the question. The facts of the unfortunate defeat at Candahar were as yet unknown—all the information we have consists of a few brief telegrams—and on such evidence it was most unfair to criticize the conduct of the commanding officer, or by Question such as had been put to him to throw any doubts upon his competency for command. Indeed, he declined to go into a discussion of the qualifications of Brigadier General Burrows. The only answer he had to give to the Question was that Brigadier General Burrows was nominated by the General Commander-in-Chief at Bombay, and that the appointment was confirmed by the Governor of the Presidency. He believed he would best consult the wishes of the House if he did not add anything further to the answer he had given to the noble and gallant Lord.

LORD DORCHESTER said, he must state that he had not, either explicitly or implicitly, made any charge against any officer; and he called upon the noble Earl the Under Secretary of State for War to name in what quarter of the globe, in what country, in what war, and in what circumstances he had brought an accusation, either implicitly or explicitly, to use his favourite expression? He disclaimed any intention whatever, in asking about the appointment of the General under whose command the catastrophe had fallen, of making any charge against him. He must state that much in self-defence, as he did not expect to hear that he had made ungenerous charges against him.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK thought the observations made by his noble Friend (the Earl of Morley) were quite justified; because if the Question of the noble and gallant Lord had any meaning, it meant that, in a military point, Brigadier General Burrows had misconducted himself, and that somebody was responsible for having made such an appointment. If the Question did not mean that, it meant nothing whatever. He (the Earl of Northbrook) did not believe that his noble Friend's objection to the employment of Staff officers would be generally approved, for there could be no doubt that some of the gallant officers who had distinguished themselves in this war had come from the Staff. One of the most remarkable instances of that was General Sir Frederick Roberts, who was for many years engaged on the Staff of the Commander-in-Chief in India to the great advantage of the Service.

ARMY—LORD STRATHNAIRN'S
NOTICES.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET, referring to a Notice in the Order Book in the name of the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Strathnairn) touching the conduct of the late War in South Africa, said, it was a Notice which impugned the character of Lord Chelmsford. He might say that he had no acquaintance with that noble and gallant Lord; but this Notice had been on the Notice Paper ever since the 13th of July, and it was desirable that when a noble Lord's character was attacked there should be a distinct day named for bringing on the Motion. To the Notice was appended the words—"No day named." Not only the noble and gallant Lord, but the War Office and other persons were left in suspense; and, therefore, the Motion should be brought on, or abandoned altogether.

LORD STRATHNAIRN said, that as regarded the delay, it arose first because the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Chelmsford) wrote to him to ask him to put off his Motion, as he would be away from town for some 10 or 12 days, and, therefore, he complied with the noble and gallant Lord's wish; but it arose, secondly, because he had moved for some Returns in reference to long and short service in the Army, and he had not been able to obtain them. Those Returns related to enlistment in the Army and to the operations of the Mutiny Act—

EARL GRANVILLE rose to Order, stating that upon the Motion for the adjournment of the House the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) complained of a Notice of Motion on the Paper, which appeared to attack the character of a noble and gallant Lord, not being brought on. The Notice conveyed the idea that it was a Motion of censure upon a distinguished General. [Lord STRATHNAIRN: No, no!] The noble and gallant Lord was not saying a word about his Notice of Motion; but making a very able speech upon long and short service in the Army, which was very undesirable upon the present occasion.

The Earl of Northbrook

LORD STRATHNAIRN explained that when he brought forward his Motion he wanted to make his case as strong as he could; and, therefore, he moved for the Returns which he had referred to. He had expressed to the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Chelmsford) the utmost desire to meet his wishes, and he had told him he might, if he liked, see the whole of his speech in draft; but the noble and gallant Lord would be exculpated, as he was the victim of a mistaken, ineffective, and unmilitary system of Army organization. It was the system which he desired to complain of, and he did not intend to blame any officer of any rank. He was, however, anxious to meet the wishes of the noble Duke, and would bring on his Motion as soon as he could.

House adjourned at Six o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter before Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 10th August, 1880.

The House met at Two of the clock.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—Lord Claud John Hamilton, for Liverpool.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—Resolutions [August 9] reported.

WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee—Resolution [August 9] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Consolidated Fund (No. 2)*.

First Reading—Lord Plunket's Indemnity*.

Second Reading—Drainage and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Provisional Order (No. 4)* [301]; Census [285].

Committee—Hares and Rabbits [194]—R.P.

Committee—Report—Bastardy Orders* [305].

Report—Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 3)* [278]; Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings (Dublin) and Waterworks (Armagh)* [282].

Considered as amended—Census (Scotland) [286].

Considered as amended—Third Reading—Census (Ireland) * [284], and passed.

Withdrawn—Game and Trespass * [239].

QUESTIONS.

CRIMINAL LAW—ASSAULTS UPON CHILDREN.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If, on consideration, he can see his way to pass a short Act declaring that in cases of indecent assault upon young children consent shall not be a valid defence?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he was glad to see that the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) had on the Order Book of the House a Bill to deal with the question raised by the hon. Member, and he (Sir William Harcourt) should do everything he could to facilitate its consideration.

POST OFFICE—THE AUSTRALIAN MAILS—THE RETURNS.

MR. CHEETHAM (for Mr. J. K. Cross) asked the Postmaster General, What amount of postage has been received during the first six months of the current year on letters, newspapers, books, patterns, and other postal matter, conveyed to Australia by the "Orient" line of steamers, and of this amount how much has been retained by the Post Office, and how much paid to the Orient Company; what number of passages have been made between Brindisi and Bombay, by the Peninsular and Oriental Company's Mail Steamers, since 1st of February of the present year, when the new contract came into operation; how many of those passages have been made by ships which had incurred penalties for unpunctuality prior to 1st February 1880, and in how many of these passages has the contract time been exceeded; and, whether similar information can be given respecting the Peninsular and Oriental Steamers plying between Galle and Australia?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, in reply to the Questions that have been addressed to me by my hon. Friend, I beg to state:

—1. That the amount received during the first six months of the present year by the Post Office for all postal matter, including letters, newspapers, book packets, &c., conveyed to Australia by the steamers of the Orient Company, has been £1,843. Of this amount £390 was paid to the Orient Company, leaving £1,453 as the amount retained by the English Post Office. 2. So far as the records have yet reached the Post Office the number of voyages between Brindisi and Bombay which have been made by vessels of the Peninsular and Oriental Company since the 1st of February of the present year, when the new postal contract came into operation, has been 21 outwards and 23 homewards. 3. Of the 21 outward voyages all, except three between Suez and Bombay, and of the 23 homeward voyages all, except two between Bombay and Suez, were made by ships which had incurred penalties for unpunctuality during the time the old contract was in operation. 4. In 10 out of the 21 outward passages the contract time was exceeded. The excess varied from 50 minutes to 53 hours 53 minutes, and the average excess was 23 hours 34 minutes. In two of the voyages, where the contract time was exceeded by 25 hours 42 minutes and 53 hours 53 minutes respectively, the vessels were detained by the Government at Suez and Aden to take in stores for Afghanistan. 5. In 14 out of the 23 homeward voyages the contract time was exceeded. The excess varied from 50 minutes to 44 hours 15 minutes, the average being 18 hours 31 minutes. 6. In consequence of the contract for the Australian portion of the Service—namely, that between Galle and Australia—being under the control of the Colonial Government, I cannot supply all the information which my hon. Friend asks for in the last of his Questions. I think, however, such information ought to be forthcoming; and I have asked the Australian Government to furnish us with regular information as to the time of arrival and departure of the Australian mails, and I have no doubt such information will be readily given. With regard to the time of arrival of the homeward Australian mail at Brindisi, I find that of the 11 voyages since the 1st of February, of which we have records, the contract time was exceeded in six cases. The excess has varied from three hours 40 minutes to 34 hours 10 minutes, the average being 18 hours 27 minutes.

DISTRESS (IRELAND)—ASSISTED EMIGRATION.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether there is any relief fund available for assisting emigration from the distressed districts in Ireland, and who are intrusted with the administration of such fund; if there be no such relief fund, whether Her Majesty's Ministers contemplate the appropriation of any public moneys or means at their disposal for the above purpose; and, if no such means are at their disposal, whether they intend to propose that Parliament should afford assistance for such emigration?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, under the existing Irish Poor Law Acts the Board of Guardians of any Union may strike a rate for assisting persons in the Union to emigrate. They may also raise a bulk sum for that purpose by borrowing upon the credit of the rates. Prior to the present year such loans had to be repaid in a period of seven years, and bore interest at such rate as might be agreed on between the Guardians and the lenders of the money. But by the Relief of Distress Act of last Session the Board of Works in Ireland were empowered to lend a special sum for this purpose to Boards of Guardians at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent interest, repayable in 10 years; and by the amending Act of this Session these terms have been made still more favourable in the case of Unions in which Orders of the Local Government Board ordering extraordinary out-door relief to be granted are in force. In such cases the rate of interest is reduced to 1 per cent, and the period of repayment is extended to 12 years. The payment of the first instalment being postponed for two years, such loans can only be contracted with the sanction of the Local Government Board.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—SUPERANNUATION OF MEDICAL OFFICERS.

MR. MELDON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is the case that the medical officer of the Crossgar dispensary district in the union of Banbridge, having, after forty years' service, applied for superannuation on the ground of broken down health, the guardians at a meeting summoned to consider such application, passed a resolution—

Mr. Fawcett

“To record on the minutes their approval of the manner in which the medical officer has filled such office for a period of forty years, but that the guardians cannot add to the rates by granting any retiring allowance;”

whether the passing of such a resolution under the circumstances fairly carries out the principle of the Medical Officers' Superannuation Act; if the Local Government Board can or will interfere in the matter; and, if the Government will promote or support a measure to make the superannuation of Poor Law Medical Officers, in proper cases, compulsory on Boards of Guardians?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, the facts as stated by the hon. and learned Gentleman are true. It is, no doubt, a case of greathardship; but the Guardians did not think fit to make the allowance, and the Local Government Board have no power to interfere in the matter. I think I have stated before, in reference to an inquiry as to the superannuation of officers, that the subject was one which occupied largely the attention of the Government, and I hope we may be able to deal with it next year.

POST OFFICE (SCOTLAND)—POSTMASTER OF INVERARY.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked the Postmaster General, if it is true, as stated in the Scotch newspapers, that Mr. Sibbald was dismissed from the office of Postmaster of Inverary, and that the reasons for his dismissal were withheld from him; and, whether the Government have any intention of granting the prayer of his Petition to the House, and that of the provost and numerous inhabitants of Inverary, that the secret charges which it is understood have been made against him should be publicly investigated?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, in order to make my answer to the Question addressed to me by the hon. Member for Wigtownshire intelligible, I may, perhaps, be permitted to state that with regard to all postmasterships of less than £120 a-year in England, and with regard to all postmasterships of less than £100 a-year in Ireland and Scotland, the appointment is made by the nomination of the Treasury, and not by the Postmaster General. The postmastership of Inverary became vacant when the late Government was in Office; and being less in value than £100 a-year, the Lords of the Treasury of the late Government nominated Mr. Sibbald. Following the invariable course, a careful inquiry was made by the local surveyor as to Mr. Sibbald's qualifications; and the Report of that inquiry was, I believe, the very first Paper that was submitted to me after I was appointed to the Office I have now the honour to hold. This Report was very unfavourable to Mr. Sibbald; but there was some local feeling on the subject, and I somewhat departed from the ordinary rule, and I ordered another and a more careful inquiry to be made on the subject. The result of that inquiry was still unfavourable to Mr. Sibbald's appointment; and, this being the case, I felt that there was no course open to me but to refuse the nomination. I think the hon. Baronet will see that such a public inquiry as he asks for would prove highly detrimental to the efficiency of the Civil Service.

AFGHANISTAN — MILITARY OPERATIONS—WITHDRAWAL OF BRITISH TROOPS—THE SHERPUR CAMP.

SIR WILLIAM PALLISER asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether Her Majesty's Government will consider the question of leaving a detachment in charge of the Sherpur Camp until the result of General Sir Frederick Roberts's expedition is known?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I think that I have already informed the House that, in the opinion of the Government, it is not desirable to interfere with the discretion of the competent military authorities in command in India and in Afghanistan with reference to the details of military movements. I believe that the position of Sherpur cannot be occupied with safety by a detachment of less strength than 6,000 men of all arms. In the circumstances, I fail to see what advantage would be gained by leaving a detachment of that strength at Sherpur when the rest of the Army has returned to Gandamak.

SIR WILLIAM PALLISER: Sir, I regret exceedingly the Answer which the noble Lord has given to my Question; and as I do not think I can be accused of having unnecessarily trespassed upon the time of the House, I should like to say a few words upon this very important matter. With the view of putting myself in Order I will conclude with a Motion. ["Oh, oh!"] I am aware that the course I am taking is one not generally approved; but I think the question is such an exceedingly grave one, and the time is so short, that I trust I may be excused. Her Majesty's Government have announced that the decision to evacuate Cabul has been taken in accordance with the advice, or, at all events, with the concurrence of General Sir Donald Stewart. Now I beg, most unhesitatingly, to say that such advice is in direct variance with the first principles of military warfare and of military strategy. I may be asked what business I have to set up an opinion against that of Sir Donald Stewart? I do not wish to set up my own opinion; but I have taken the opinion of a considerable number of military officers for whose judgment I entertain the highest possible respect, and one and all agree with me that I am perfectly right in the view I have taken. It so happens that I have studied at an Institution which has introduced into the Army such men as Sir Garnet Wolseley, Sir Richard Colley, Sir Evelyn Wood, Colonel Buller, and others; and I am certain that all these officers would, if present, corroborate what I have to say. We were always taught that when an Army is invading an enemy's country the first thing to do is to establish a secure base of operations. We have in the camp at Sherpur a magnificent base of operations. Sir Frederick Roberts has started from Sherpur with an Army of 8,000 men and 12 guns, to march for upwards of 300 miles through an enemy's country. We are told—but I hope it is not the case—that the guns are not the regular field guns, but that they are only light mountain guns; and it is calculated that it will take him from 25 to 30 days to complete the march. He has to pass two fortresses, one at Ghuzni and another at Khelat-i-Ghilzai. He will then have to meet with an Army estimated at 20,000 men, with 36 field guns. What will be the first

...which has been in precipitate retreat from Afghanistan. I would, however, ask what possible harm could be done by our remaining at Sherpur a few weeks longer, or, even for a few days; at any rate, until we have what has happened to General Roberts at Ghazni? We are told that the Afghans have been most officious in rendering us every assistance in clearing out of Sherpur; but I confess that I have the ship for me—Times Dancer at disposal. I beg to move the adjournment of the House; and I beseech the Government, with all the energy I am capable of, to give a little more consideration to this grave question.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Sir William Pulteney.)

Sir WALTER B. BARTHELOMEW: Sir, I had no notion that my hon. and gallant Friend was going to bring this question before the House; and I quite admit that a very great responsibility rests on any private Member in bringing a Motion of this kind, at this particular time, before the House of Commons. But I am bound to say that the noble Lord who is at this moment the Leader of the House has not satisfied the general public feeling in regard to the state of Afghanistan. A large Force has been detached from the Army which occupied the Sherpur fortifications and the ground around Cabul and sent to the relief of Candahar. There can be no doubt that great anxiety does exist among soldiers as to the safety and security of the order was given to that Army to advance to Ghazni on their way to Candahar, at that moment when the rest of the Army to India was being sent to the relief of Candahar. How has it been that all our disaster has occurred? It was because General Roberts was 75 miles away from any support whatever. At Candahar our troops were similarly without support; and I sincerely hope and believe that no di-

...We cannot... The... which has been in... precipitate retreat from Afghanistan. I would, however, ask what possible harm could be done by our remaining at Sherpur a few weeks longer, or, even for a few days; at any rate, until we have what has happened to General Roberts at Ghazni? We are told that the Afghans have been most officious in rendering us every assistance in clearing out of Sherpur; but I confess that I have the ship for me—Times Dancer at disposal. I beg to move the adjournment of the House; and I beseech the Government, with all the energy I am capable of, to give a little more consideration to this grave question.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Sir William Pulteney.)

Sir WALTER B. BARTHELOMEW: Sir, I had no notion that my hon. and gallant Friend was going to bring this question before the House; and I quite admit that a very great responsibility rests on any private Member in bringing a Motion of this kind, at this particular time, before the House of Commons. But I am bound to say that the noble Lord who is at this moment the Leader of the House has not satisfied the general public feeling in regard to the state of Afghanistan. A large Force has been detached from the Army which occupied the Sherpur fortifications and the ground around Cabul and sent to the relief of Candahar. There can be no doubt that great anxiety does exist among soldiers as to the safety and security of the order was given to that Army to advance to Ghazni on their way to Candahar, at that moment when the rest of the Army to India was being sent to the relief of Candahar. How has it been that all our disaster has occurred? It was because General Roberts was 75 miles away from any support whatever. At Candahar our troops were similarly without support; and I sincerely hope and believe that no di-

...The... which has been in... precipitate retreat from Afghanistan. I would, however, ask what possible harm could be done by our remaining at Sherpur a few weeks longer, or, even for a few days; at any rate, until we have what has happened to General Roberts at Ghazni? We are told that the Afghans have been most officious in rendering us every assistance in clearing out of Sherpur; but I confess that I have the ship for me—Times Dancer at disposal. I beg to move the adjournment of the House; and I beseech the Government, with all the energy I am capable of, to give a little more consideration to this grave question.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Sir William Pulteney.)

Sir WALTER B. BARTHELOMEW: Sir, I had no notion that my hon. and gallant Friend was going to bring this question before the House; and I quite admit that a very great responsibility rests on any private Member in bringing a Motion of this kind, at this particular time, before the House of Commons. But I am bound to say that the noble Lord who is at this moment the Leader of the House has not satisfied the general public feeling in regard to the state of Afghanistan. A large Force has been detached from the Army which occupied the Sherpur fortifications and the ground around Cabul and sent to the relief of Candahar. There can be no doubt that great anxiety does exist among soldiers as to the safety and security of the order was given to that Army to advance to Ghazni on their way to Candahar, at that moment when the rest of the Army to India was being sent to the relief of Candahar. How has it been that all our disaster has occurred? It was because General Roberts was 75 miles away from any support whatever. At Candahar our troops were similarly without support; and I sincerely hope and believe that no di-will occur, but that General Roberts will reach Candahar in perfect safety; but great responsibility will rest on the Government if they fail to secure a base of operations. If that is not done, there is nothing for General Roberts to do, in the event of a reverse, but to march on or be cut to pieces. I would ask the noble Lord to give every consideration to this matter, and, if it be still possible, to detain the Army at Sherpur—at any rate, until General Roberts shall have passed Ghuzni in safety.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON : Sir, I must decline to enter into military discussions raised in this irregular manner. I fully admit what has been said by the two hon. and gallant Officers opposite as to the heavy responsibility that rests upon the Government. The Government are perfectly aware of that, and they think they will best discharge that responsibility by leaving the management of military affairs to the military authorities in India, in whom they have confidence, and not by attempting to regulate those matters by the imperfect knowledge which they may possess here, and certainly not by discussing the details of this movement in a debate in this House. I entirely deny the imputation which I understand to have been made by the hon. and gallant Member for Taunton (Sir William Palliser), that the movement of our troops from Cabul has been dictated by political, and not by military, considerations. It is impossible for me to say that the movement of General Roberts is not attended with risk; of course, we are aware it is attended with some risk; but the retirement of General Stewart from Cabul to Gandamak has not been urged upon that officer by the Government of India or by the Government at Home from any political considerations, but has been suggested by himself as an operation most desirable under the circumstances. I have already said that we will not tamper or interfere with the discretion of the Government of India and their military Advisers. I have already, for my own satisfaction, asked the Government of India whether, in view of General Robert's removal, they thought it desirable that the withdrawal of troops from Cabul should be delayed for a certain time? I received a positive and distinct answer that, in their opinion, the movement of General

Stewart was most desirable, and was dictated by their view of the military situation. I said I am not going to enter into a military discussion without Notice and raised in this manner; but I would remind the hon. and gallant Member for Taunton, if it were necessary—and it has not been deemed necessary—that General Roberts should be left in communication with a base of operations, it would be far better that he should have communication with the Force under General Watson at Kuram Valley than with that under General Stewart at Sherpur.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, the House would feel sure that Her Majesty's Government exercised a wise discretion in refraining from entering, at length, into this discussion at the present time. For his own part, he wished to express his entire concurrence in the action of Her Majesty's Government. History often repeated itself, and it was marvellous how that had occurred with regard to the Afghan War. It would be remembered that, after the lamentable events that took place in 1841, it was determined to retreat from Candahar by way of Cabul. It seemed to him that Her Majesty's Government would follow a wise course if, still believing that history repeated itself, they determined to carry out the converse of that and retired from Cabul by way of Candahar. Knowing something of the troops that composed General Roberts's Force, he was entirely without any excessive anxiety as to the fate of that General. The Force was a magnificent one, consisting, as it did, of the flower of the Indian Army. If there were the means by which it could be properly fed, and he had no doubt that was ascertained, and if it had fair fighting—and General Roberts could hardly meet with any other, knowing the road and having his choice of positions—he felt confident that it would not run any serious risk, and that it would be quite capable of disposing of any force of Afghans that might be brought against it. He was surprised at what he could not refrain from calling the somewhat unpatriotic anxiety which had been displayed by hon. Gentlemen opposite with reference to 10,000 of the finest troops Her Majesty's Government had at their command. He repeated that he had no such anxiety himself. He had been asked what he thought would be the political effect in India of the retirement of our Forces from Afghanistan? He would say this—that in order to maintain our position, dignity, and security in India, it was more important to save our money and men, and keep our Indian Army in a state of efficiency, than to spend more money vainly and ingloriously over the Afghan campaign. He thought they would run much greater risk by staying in Afghanistan than by coming away from it.

MR. ASHMEAD - BARTLETT said, that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy had remarked that history repeated itself. He sincerely hoped that that would not be the case in regard to the present expedition. Military authorities, however, except, perhaps, those directly connected with the Government, were agreed that to cut away the base of an Army's operations was a most dangerous and hazardous experiment. He had always understood hitherto from the statements of her Majesty's present Ministers that the retreat from Afghanistan was dictated by political and not military considerations; but, at all events, he thought it would have been well to have deferred the movement from Cabul until the Force of General Roberts had passed Ghuzni. Another reason for keeping a Force at Sherpur was that they had just established an Ameer who might require their support. The noble Marquess stated, yesterday, that General Skobelev was marching towards Herat just in the same way that General Roberts might be said to be marching towards the Persian or the Russian Frontier; but he would remind the noble Lord that, two months ago, General Skobelev, with a large Army, was not much further from Herat than General Roberts now was from Candahar. The Government had taken a serious step, and one which, even if General Roberts escaped in safety, might bring trouble upon General Stewart's line of communication.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I think that the observations of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) were somewhat uncalled for when he spoke of the unpatriotic anxiety on the part of my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir William Palliser). I think the hon. Member entirely misrepresented the spirit in which my hon. and gallant Friend addressed the House. The observations, so temperately and so ably made by my hon. and gallant

Sir George Campbell

Friend, in no way justified any remark of that kind. My hon. and gallant Friend feels strongly on this subject, and it is undoubtedly one on which everyone—even the noble Lord himself admitted it—must feel considerable anxiety. What my hon. and gallant Friend was chiefly anxious to ascertain was whether the movement now in progress on the part of the Force which has been occupying the neighbourhood of Cabul is a movement dictated purely by military reasons, or whether it was one dictated by political reasons. We have an assurance from the noble Lord that it has not been dictated by political but by military considerations; and the noble Lord has stated that those military considerations have weighed with those who are responsible for the conduct of our military affairs in India, and that the Government are prepared to accept the full responsibility of the decision at which they have arrived. In those circumstances, I do not think that we can do otherwise than leave entirely on the Government the responsibility they have so assumed. The House must feel that that is a serious responsibility; but that, at the same time, it is one with which we cannot properly or usefully interfere. I think that my hon. and gallant Friend, in raising this question as he has done, has given a word of caution in an admirable spirit, which ought to command the sympathy and the attention of the House; and I am glad to hear from the noble Lord that the movement which is being undertaken is one that is dictated and guided purely by military considerations, and on the authority of the proper military Commanders. That being so, I doubt whether we can conveniently or properly discuss the question, which I do not think my hon. and gallant Friend is open to the slightest degree of censure for having introduced. On the contrary, I think he deserves thanks for drawing attention to the subject.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ARMY RESERVE PENSIONS.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether men of Sections A and C of the Army Reserve, who were originally enlisted for long service, and had been transferred or recalled to the Reserve, and who were called out for active service in 1878, are entitled to receive pensions on the termination of their engagement?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to my hon. and gallant Friend, I have to state that the case of these men has for some time engaged the attention of the War Office. It must be distinctly understood that they are not the short-service men who constitute the Reserve in its normal condition, and who, except when discharged for disability, have no claim whatever, in any circumstances, to pension. The men to whom my hon. and gallant Friend refers are long-service men; and, in my opinion, some of them, although not technically entitled to pension, have claims which ought to be satisfied. I propose, early next Session, to introduce a Bill asking Parliament to grant the necessary powers to the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital which they have not at present.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—THE MACMAHON TELEGRAPH.

MR. MONTAGUE GUEST asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether sufficient time has elapsed for him to consult the various authorities, with a view to the establishment of the MacMahon telegraph instruments in the House of Commons; and, if so, what is the conclusion he has arrived at?

MR. ADAM: Sir, in reply to my hon. Friend, I beg to state that it is not in my power at present to say more than that the matter is being considered. I am bound to add, however, that my inquiries, as far as they have gone, lead me to doubt the utility of placing instruments such as he suggests in different parts of this building.

DISTURBANCES (IRELAND)—THE CONSTABULARY.

MR. DILLON asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether in Ireland it is lawful for the constabulary to fire into an unarmed crowd, or to charge them with the bayonet, the Riot Act having not previously been read; and, if so, under what Act? He would also ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman, Whether he can state what measures the Government propose to adopt in order to check such acts by the constabulary?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, I am not aware that the Government

consider any check on the action of the Constabulary to be necessary. With respect to the printed Question of the hon. Gentleman, I must observe that it is entirely a general one, and the answer to it must depend on the circumstances of the particular case. The state of circumstances might be such as to render it unlawful and criminal on the part of the Constabulary to act in the way described in the Question; but, on the other hand, the circumstances might be such as to render such action justifiable and lawful on the part of the Constabulary.

MR. DILLON said, he was not satisfied with the answer of the hon. and learned Gentleman. He wished to know, further, Whether there was any law to authorize on the part of the Constabulary such action as was referred to in the Question? He had particular reasons for wishing for information on that point.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member's Question has been put and answered.

MR. DILLON wished to state that he considered his Question had not been answered. He asked, Whether it was lawful for the Constabulary to fire on an unarmed crowd without first reading the Riot Act; and, if so, under what Act? If the hon. and learned Gentleman wished him to explain this he would do so; but he had not answered his Question.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): I am sorry the hon. Member does not consider my answer satisfactory; but it is obvious the answer must depend on the circumstances of the particular case. If the hon. Gentleman will state what the facts of the case are on which he desires an opinion, I will give him my opinion on them.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked, Whether the hon. and learned Gentleman was prepared to say that any circumstances would justify the Constabulary in firing into an unarmed crowd where the Riot Act had not been read? He confessed he had not heard of such a case.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): Certainly, Sir. An unarmed crowd might be taking life or endangering life, and then it would be justifiable to fire on them.

IRELAND—THE HOME RULE MEMBERS.

MR. TOTTENHAM asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been called to a report in the public press of proceedings at a meeting of Irish Home Rule Members of Parliament, held on Friday 6th instant, where a resolution is stated to have been passed to the following effect:—

“That on the conclusion of the Sessional business the Members of the Irish party should unite with their countrymen in agitation and organisation;”

and, whether he has reason to believe that such report is correct; and, if so, whether he will inform the House what notice Her Majesty's Government intend to take of such declaration?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The report from which the hon. Member quoted appears to have been taken from The Standard newspaper, where I find the words as he has given them. I find, however, from The Times and other newspapers, that the resolution passed at the meeting referred to was as follows:—

“That as soon as the Irish Members are released from their Parliamentary duties they should place themselves at the disposal of their countrymen to advise and act with them in this great emergency.”

I do not know which is the correct report; but, assuming this to be a true version, I may say that, so far as at present advised, there is no necessity for the Government to take any notice of the action of the Irish Members.

TREATY OF BERLIN—TURKEY AND MONTENEGRO.

MR. BOURKE wished to ask a Question of the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in consequence of a statement which appeared in the public journals that morning. The statement was to the effect that, if the Corti arrangement failed, the Porte was expected to join the Powers in assisting the Prince of Montenegro to take possession of the Dulcigno district. He wished to ask whether that statement was correct? He wished also to ask another Question, which, however, he would put down for Thursday, if the hon. Gentleman required Notice of it. It was, What was the nature of the assistance intended to be given by the Powers; and whether the Powers had in concert arranged what was to be its character?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in reply, said, the statement referred to was substantially correct. With regard to the further Question, he would give such answer as he could on Thursday; but he did not know whether the feeling of the other Powers on the subject would enable him to fully answer it at present. He would take this opportunity of answering a Question put some time ago by the hon. and gallant Member for the County Cork (Colonel Colthurst) with regard to the position of Catholics in the district ceded to Montenegro. Mr. Kirby Green, Her Majesty's able Representative in Montenegro, reported that there was no foundation for the charges which had been made; that although the teachers in the Montenegrin public schools were of the orthodox Slav faith, they were laymen, and permission had been granted for Catholic children to attend for religious instruction at the houses of the Catholic priests; that there was no foundation for the statement that permission to open new churches had been withheld; and that the Prince of Montenegro had shown the greatest anxiety to give full effect to the Article of the Treaty of Berlin with reference to complete religious equality.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he wished to put a Question to the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India with regard to the future conduct of Public Business during the remainder of the Session, and also to make a suggestion which he felt would conduce to the convenience of hon. Members on both sides of the House. To put himself in Order, he intended to conclude with a Motion. [“Oh!”] The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary said “Oh!” but he appeared to forget that the House of Commons was placed in a most unusual and unprecedented position owing to the peculiar mode in which Her Majesty's Government had thought fit to conduct their Business. [“Oh!”] He thought that the exclamation of the Home Secretary was unnecessary and uncalled for; and he hoped that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would permit him to conclude his observations without further interruption. The noble Marquess had made a statement yesterday with regard to Public Business, in the course of which he told the House that there were eight Bills before them which the Government hoped to be able to carry. Speaking of the Employers' Liability Bill, the Burials Bill, and the Hares and Rabbits Bill, the noble Marquess described those measures as important, but not as absolutely necessary. The noble Lord went on to say that it would be absolutely necessary to finish the Census Bill and the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill; while the Merchant Shipping Bill, the Savings Banks Bill, and the Post Office Money Orders Bill, were all measures which, although not of the first class, were very important, and that it was necessary that they should be completed before the Session terminated. In addition to the measures so indicated by the noble Lord, a great portion of the Estimates still remained to be completed, and the Indian Budget would have to be discussed. But, beyond all this, the Session could not be concluded without a discussion being held upon the situation in Turkey and in Afghanistan, and also of a question in which many hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House took a deep interest—that of the recall of Sir Bartle Frere. The noble Lord had deprecated unnecessary discussion upon the measures to which he had referred; and while he shared the wish of the noble Marquess upon that point, he must remind him that both the right hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) and the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had given Notice of their intention, based apparently upon good grounds, of offering the most determined opposition to the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill. With regard to the other measures referred to, there was no wish on that side of the House to delay their passing unnecessarily. ["Oh!"] He did not know whether hon. Members opposite intended to discredit that observation; but he wished to point out to the House that these must be all measures of great importance, otherwise Her Majesty's Government would not seek to press them upon the House at this late period of the Session. In these circumstances, hon. Members sitting on the Opposition Benches had to consider not only the convenience of Her Majesty's Government, but their duty to those whom they represented, and they would most undoubtedly have to give great attention to these measures before they allowed them to pass into law. The noble Marquess could scarcely expect that the Burials Bill could be passed at a moment's notice and at a single Sitting. The Employers' Liability Bill was another measure that would require careful consideration. The Hares and Rabbits Bill also appeared likely to give rise to prolonged discussion, Notice having been given of something like 140 Amendments upon it. Did the noble Marquess think that that was a Bill which was likely to pass through that House in a couple of days? Certain of the remaining Estimates would not be allowed to pass without considerable opposition. He hoped the discussions that must arise would not be characterized as Obstruction. The present Government had never yet experienced what Obstruction was. [Cheers and Laughter.] He was certain that those cries proceeded from hon. Members who had not yet had much experience in that House. Had they sat in the last Parliament they would have known what Obstruction really meant; because nothing that they had experienced that Session could compare with the Obstruction which was constantly offered to the measures of the late Government. The discussion on the Indian Budget must necessarily take time; and he presumed that some day would be appointed for the discussion of the affairs of Europe and of Afghanistan. He hoped, in these circumstances, that the noble Lord would feel himself justified and bound to give some clear explanation to the House as to the intentions of the Government with reference to Public Business to be dealt with during the brief remainder of the Session. The programme which had been laid before them yesterday by the noble Lord would have been a very fair one had it been presented to them just after the Whitsuntide or the Easter Recess; but it was wholly without parallel at that period of the Session, and it could not be carried out unless the Session were indefinitely prolonged. The House was placed in the position in which they now found themselves entirely through the action of the Government, and not in consequence of any Obstruction which had been offered to their measures. The measure which had occupied the greater part of the Session had not even been mentioned in the Queen's Speech, and related to a question with which the Government had, at the commencement of the Session, expressly declared that it was not their intention to deal. The Government, however, had changed their minds on the subject, for reasons which were doubtless satisfactory to themselves, but which appeared utterly worthless to others. In these circumstances, he should like to ask the noble Lord, Whether, in the event of the Hares and Rabbits Bill not passing through Committee to-day or to-morrow, he intended to proceed with that measure on Friday? And he also wished to make the suggestion, which he hoped that the noble Lord would take in good part, as it was not put forward offensively, that the Government should make up their minds now to proceed at once with those measures which they deemed absolutely necessary, and to leave the others until it was seen what time there remained for discussing them. He begged to move the adjournment of the House.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND, in seconding the Motion, said, that this was the first time that he had ever seconded such a Motion; but he did so on the present occasion because he felt that it would be for the convenience of the House if the noble Lord would, either to-morrow or the day after, if he could not do so to-day, make a clear statement as to the work they really intended to get through before the end of the Session. He desired very much to see progress made with the Bill which they were about to discuss; but that progress depended very much upon the Government giving a clear and explicit statement of what their intentions were. It would be absolutely impossible for their whole programme to be carried out, and the sooner the House was informed which of their Bills was to follow the wretched example of the Vaccination Bill the better.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That this House do now adjourn."—
 (Mr. Chaplin.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I waited a long time to know what was the Question which the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) had to put to me, and it does not appear to be one that required so lengthy an introduction. The hon. Member said, no less than three times in the course of his observations, that the House of Commons was placed in a very peculiar position. That is an observation I have heard before. I should like to remind the House that we are likely to be placed in a much more peculiar position if hon. Members on the other side of the House, apparently encouraged by great numbers who sit there, are prepared to make Motions for the adjournment of the House twice in the course of a Morning Sitting for the purpose, as I think, of introducing irrelevant questions. I do not know whether my hon. Friend was in the House yesterday; but, whether he was or not, it appears to me that the chief object of his observations is to show how very little confidence is placed by hon. Members opposite in the right hon. Gentleman who is supposed to be their Leader, or even in those prominent Members of the Opposition who sit below the Gangway, whose assiduity and attention have received such well-merited tribute. I had yesterday to state, as far as I was able, what our intentions were; what were the proposals of the Government with regard to the Business of the present week. I am hardly able to make any statement with regard to next week. Some observations were made yesterday by the right hon. Gentleman opposite which we supposed to represent the views of the Opposition, but which appear to be entirely unsatisfactory to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lincolnshire, who seems to have assumed—and, no doubt, he is competent for it—the Leadership of his Party. The Question which I understood my hon. Friend to ask was what the Government would do in the contingency of the discussion on the Hares and Rabbits Bill not being finished to-morrow? I should prefer—and I think I should be justified in doing so—postponing my answer to that Question until such an unfortunate—and, as I believe, improbable—contingency arises. I have already stated what I was able to state; and I do not think that any time will be saved by an endeavour to review the position which we took up. Perhaps, next week, we may be in a position to make a further statement to the House; and, when it becomes my duty to do so, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that his extremely practical and useful suggestions will be received with the utmost attention on the part of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Chaplin

MR. GORST said, that they were apparently in the middle of a Session, and yet the Government had acted as though it was near the end. They had had Morning Sittings. The time usually given to private Members had been sacrificed to advance the Business of the Government. When those arrangements were made it was understood that the Session was approaching its close. If the Opposition had known the intentions of the Government they would have insisted on everything going on in the usual way. He did not understand why the Government made the House sit on Tuesdays and Fridays in the morning, and why they appropriated Wednesdays to their own Business. He was glad to find that the noble Lord was not going to ask for Saturday Sittings. He hoped, also, as it appeared they were in the middle of a Sitting, that there would be no undue desire to curtail discussion, and that the House would not be expected to sit till the early hours of the morning, but that everything would go on in an ordinary manner. He hoped not only that the Government, but that the Opposition also, would discharge its proper functions. He would read to the House a statement of the duties of an Opposition by Lord Palmerston. In a speech delivered on the 18th of April, 1864, Lord Palmerston said—

“What is the natural occupation of an Opposition? What are they there for, if not to find out when a mistake has been made by the Government? They are assigned by Providence to watch with keen eye the conduct of the Government they oppose—to trip them up even before they fall—at all events, if they stumble, mark their stumbling, and call upon them to set things right again.”—[3 Hansard, clxxiv. 1224.]

That function he hoped the Opposition would discharge. He had no objection to sit there till November. In conclusion, he expressed a hope that no interference would be allowed to take place with the Employers' Liability Bill, which was a measure of extreme difficulty. It ought to be considered not only by that House, but also by the other House of Parliament, which he hoped it would reach in good time, and whose criticisms on a measure of that kind would be exceedingly valuable.

MR. DILLON said, that he could not allow the discussion to come to an end without expressing the great disappointment which had been felt in Ireland that the Government did not propose to do anything to remedy the state of things which had arisen in consequence of the rejection by the House of Lords of the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill. The Government might say they had done their best, and were no longer responsible for what might occur; but would any hon. Member tell him that if a similar state of things existed in Great Britain the Government would remain supine, and not propose any remedy for a state of things described as on the verge of a civil war? No doubt, it was pleasant on the rising of the House to go shooting at birds and deer; but he doubted very much whether the hon. Gentlemen who were so anxious to get away to the moors of Scotland would be so anxious to be on the moors and mountains of Ireland to be fired at by the Royal Irish Constabulary.

MR. SPEAKER intimated that the hon. Member was travelling beyond the proper limits of the grievances before the House.

MR. DILLON said, he wished to call attention to the action of the Government in sending over additional troops to Ireland. The Government had either sent over those troops with the object of accentuating their declarations in the House of Commons, or else because there was necessity for an addition to the 25,000 already quartered in Ireland. The Chief Secretary for Ireland said, the other evening—

MR. SPEAKER called the hon. Gentleman to Order.

MR. DILLON asked if he could not refer to an Answer to a Question?

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member was not in Order in referring to a late debate which had taken place.

MR. DILLON again asked if he could not refer to the Answer to the Question?

MR. SPEAKER said, the same remark applied to the Answer to a Question as to a debate.

MR. DILLON said, he would only state that he did not share the confidence which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary seemed to have either in the forbearance of Irish landlords or in the cowardice of Irish tenants. To rely on this would be to rely on a broken reed. He claimed to have some knowledge of the action of landlords in times of distress and danger. There would soon be evictions and processes by hundreds and thousands. The tenantry would not submit; and if the House rose without taking some other measures than sending Marines to prevent such a catastrophe, he feared there would be bloodshed and massacre in Ireland. ["Oh, oh!"] That was the truth; and although all the massacre would be mostly, no doubt, on the side of the people of Ireland, he warned the House that they were not doing wisely in supporting the Government in the course they were taking. The Irish Members would feel it their duty, in season and out of season, to force upon the House the condition of the people of Ireland, and to try to induce them to take some steps with regard to that condition, and they would do all they could to save the effusion of blood, and to save the wretched people who were now threatened by the Constabulary. So long as that House was sitting he should lose no opportunity of bringing forward the condition of the people; and if the House rose without taking some measures of alleviation and of protection for the Irish people, he could tell them that the winter would be marked with bloodshed and massacre in Ireland. The present occasion was one which no Government ought to allow to pass without attempting to apply some remedy to the evils which were impending. He did not wonder that the House was tired of having Irish questions discussed; but he could only express his surprise that, after so many weary years of talking about Ireland, hon. Members were no wiser about that country than they were 50 years ago. Hon. Members were heard to propose schemes of emigration as remedies, as if the scheme had not been tried and wretchedly broken down in former times. In the other House, the other night, he heard a noble Lord say it was intended that it should be a forced emigration. It must be forced if it was to be carried out at all; not force by the Government—nobody supposed that—but the force landlords would use against tenants they wished to get rid of. He could tell the House that the Irish people would not leave their homes without compulsion, and would not be driven forth without violence, resistance, and bloodshed; and he warned the Government that, though hon. Members might consider that he was wasting the time of the House, they might have occasion to say, in another week, that they would have saved a considerable amount of time had they listened to him on that occasion.

Mr. Dillon

MR. BERESFORD HOPE desired to say a word on behalf of the legitimate Opposition, who were endeavouring to do their duty loyally and faithfully towards Her Majesty's Government. He had to protest against the interruption and confusion of the Business of the House by hon. Gentlemen whom he ventured to term Her Majesty's illegitimate Opposition, and whose misdeeds were so unfairly attributed to the legitimate Opposition. No doubt, he could sympathize a good deal with the impatience of the House at the way in which Irish questions were made engines of delay. But if they measured the length of the Session, and remembered the way in which the Business had been conducted, he ventured to say that, whatever had been their provocation from the other side, Her Majesty's Opposition had been eminently moderate in the discharge of their duty; while they were not, and would not, be responsible for the interruptions interjected by hon. Gentlemen whom they respected, but whom he should like to see sitting opposite—where they ought to sit—beside the hon. Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Shaw), the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), and others who remained upon the Liberal side of the House. It should be remembered that Her Majesty's Government enjoyed an immunity which their Predecessors had not enjoyed—it had taken possession of Mondays entirely, without private Members having the opportunity of bringing forward any question of grievance before Supply. They obtained that privilege at the beginning of the Session; and, while still in the flush of prosperity, he hoped they would remember how sorely his right hon. Friend the Member for North Devon had suffered in the beginning of 1879, when several Members—of whom he (Mr. Beresford Hope) was one—ably seconded by the hon. Baronet the present Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs—who, for obvious reasons, was silent on the subject this year—lengthily, but reasonably, and in the proper exercise of their privileges, protested against the Mondays being appropriated by the Government. At present, the Government possessed all the Mondays, all the Tuesdays, all the Wednesdays, all the Thursdays, all the Fridays down to 7 o'clock, and all the Saturdays when they had a chance of getting them. In these circumstances, he called upon Her Majesty's Government not to endeavour to drive too hard the forbearance of hon. Members on that side of the House. It was for the Government to say what Bills they would press forward. It was for the Opposition to say that the Bills so pressed forward should be adequately discussed; so that, when they came to receive the Royal Assent, they should be as perfect as possible—and that on the day of Prorogation, on whatever day it occurred, hon. Members might proceed to the moors, the stubble, the copses, or to their Christmas festivities, conscious that they had done their duty as patriotic Members of Parliament.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was sure he would not be regarded as a friend of Obstruction; but he wished to say that he had been long enough in the House to remember the Prime Minister, towards the close of a Session, opposing the Divorce Bill, then the subject of much debate, because Her Majesty's Ministers were trying to take advantage of the House by forcing a most important Bill on at a period of the Session which was at once unusual and known by the Government to be inconsistent with the engagements and the business of a great number of Members of the House. The present Government had, he was afraid, in the absence of their Leader, rendered themselves liable to condemnation for the reason that had evoked from him that severe censure of the conduct of a former Government. The Government were expecting more of the House than was consistent with its constitution, comprising, as it did, within its numbers men who were engaged in the most important commercial transactions of the country, and who could not be expected to sit to a late period of the year, or above a certain number of months in the year. It was inconsistent, too, with the efficiency of the House that the Session should be protracted to a very late period. He would remind the Irish Members that he had never opposed any measure for the relief of that country or for its real advantage; but he condemned the perpetual spirit of insurrection in which some nominal friends of Ireland indulged, but who, as hon. Members, if they read the history of their country, would see, were, and always had been, its bitterest enemies. As he had said, the Government were expecting too much of the House in pressing forward measures which deeply affected the largest commercial, mining, railway, agricultural, and other great interests of the country, including the vital interests of the Church of England—measures which could not be allowed to pass without the full consideration they deserved.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, of course, he was aware that it would be impossible to speak with absolute certainty with regard to the Business; but he was anxious to have it fixed as far as possible. The noble Lord had told them yesterday what were the arrangements for Thursday and Friday, and that also for Tuesday next week. What he wanted to know was whether they could rely on the Burials Bill being taken on Thursday, the Employers' Liability Bill on Friday, and the Indian Financial Statement on Tuesday next? He thought that was a matter on which it was important that they should be sure. The state of uncertainty which had existed caused great anxiety in the minds of hon. Members, and did not conduce to the progress of Business.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he did not think it would be possible to make any more definite arrangements with regard to the Business than had already been announced. The programme of Business which he had stated for the Sitings to-morrow, on Friday, and on Tuesday next must, of course, depend on the progress made with the Hares and Rabbits Bill; and until he knew what that progress was, he could not say whether that programme would be adhered to to the letter.

MR. J. R. YORKE complained that no definite statements were made by the Government as to the progress of Business, and that the announcements vouchsafed were of a kaleidoscopic character, which left hon. Members in a confused state of mind as to what they might be called upon to do. He did not think the noble Lord was justified in giving a vague answer to the Question which had been put in the most courteous terms by the right hon. Baronet the Leader of the Opposition. As far as he was personally concerned, he should certainly not have consented to give up to the Government the whole of the time of Parliament, excepting the Evening Sittings on Fridays, unless he had believed that the Session was to close at the ordinary time. It seemed that the noble Marquess and the Government had determined to get the House into a corner, and, relying on the abstention from voting or the weariness and disgust of hon. Members, to pass measures which could have no chance of success in ordinary circumstances. He wished to disassociate himself entirely from any idea of Obstruction, as the word had been used last Session, meaning opposition to every measure brought forward not on the merits, but with a view to stopping the Business of the House; but he did not intend to be deterred from submitting to detailed criticism any measure which he thought deserving of it. There was a widespread feeling among the quieter and less prominent Members that, sooner than allow this state of things to be unduly prolonged, they would take part in every legitimate movement for seeing the Business of the House properly conducted.

EARL PERCY said, he had been a Member of that House for several years; and as far as he knew, or had read in the history of the House, he did not think the Leader of the Government, after having, on the pretence that the Session was drawing to a close, absorbed the whole—

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON asked whether the noble Lord was in Order in imputing to the Government that they had done anything on a pretence?

MR. SPEAKER: It is certainly out of Order to impute unworthy motives to Members of the House or the Government collectively.

EARL PERCY said, he would at once withdraw the expression to which exception was taken. He disclaimed any intention to impute dishonourable motives to the Government. But the whole time of the House had been asked for, which was only done, ordinarily, when the Session was about to be brought to a close. The noble Lord had been asked to reduce the programme within limits which would afford a hope of its being carried out; but, from day to day, he had declined to inform them as to what course he intended to adopt. He could not consent to be a party to what might be called illegitimate Obstruction; but he thought that the House was justified in opposing, legitimately, the policy of endeavouring to force measures on the country which were not before it at the General Election, which were not included in the Queen's Speech, and which the break in the Session gave ample reasons for not forcing at present. There would be no inconvenience to the Public Service in deferring until next Session at least some of them, particularly if they met with strenuous resistance, not for the purpose of blocking the Business of Parliament generally, but for the purpose of declaring that Parliament would not have measures forced on it at this time of the year by this sort of conduct; and he considered such resistance would be justifiable.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he had noticed that, within the last two hours, there had been two Motions for adjournment, and that most of the hon. Gentlemen who had addressed the House, instead of adhering to their texts, had gone out of their way to bring accusations of illegitimate Obstruction against the Irish Members. He need hardly say that he was not going to accept, in its entirety, the challenge thrown out; he should merely ask the House to note the share which the Irish Members had taken in the Obstruction that had been given to the progress of Business during the last two hours. On the first Motion not a single Irish Member rose to address the House. On the second Motion his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) thought that if the House was irregularly called upon to consider the best means to destroy life in Afghanistan, it might be regularly called upon to consider the best means of saving life in Ireland. His hon. Friend accordingly rose, impelled by a strong necessity, when Her Majesty's Government treated his complaint with silence, he (Mr. O'Connor Power) was one of the Irish Members who sat there and still believed in their good intentions, and that, on the present occasion, it might not be necessary to call upon them for explanation. Well, how had their forbearance been treated by the hon. Gentlemen who sat on the front Conservative Benches below the Gangway? Why, they had exercised no forbearance whatever in return, because they, rising in their places, repeated a Question which the noble Lord the present Leader of the House three times distinctly answered. He did not say that the noble Lord's answer was satisfactory; but it was the only one which the noble Lord said it was possible for the Government to give under the circumstances. He said that as it was in the last Parliament, so it was in this—that the men who had accused the Irish Members of Obstruction had themselves been the greatest Obstructives. He believed that if the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had taken time to re-consider the accusations brought against Irish Members in the last Parliament, he would not have followed the bad example which had been set on the present occasion by younger, more inexperienced, and less wise Members of that House who now renewed those accusations. As matters had gone so far, might he respectfully, and without subjecting himself and all his Colleagues to another accusation, ask some Member of the Government to reply to the very temperate speech which had been delivered by his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary?

COLONEL MAKINS said, that the last Speaker, to serve his own purpose, appeared to be anxious to shift the charge of Obstruction from himself to others. The plea upon which the House had been induced to give up Tuesdays and Fridays to the Government was that the Session was drawing to a close, whereas the end of it appeared to be as far off as ever. It was not treating the House with fairness to try now and carry measures which would have been a very ample programme for the end of the Whitsuntide Holidays.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, the Irish Members had consumed one-third of the time of the Session; and of the remaining two-thirds, one-half had been occupied by hon. Members on the Ministerial side. A large portion of the time of the House had been wasted by right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench, who did not seem to know how to compress their answers to Questions, or their speeches into a reasonable space. If they had learned to give concise and carefully considered answers, and not to reiterate their views so often, as in the case of the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill, there might have been nearly a fortnight of the Session now to spare. As a matter of fact, the legitimate Opposition had only taken up about one-fourth of the whole time at the disposal of the House.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN protested against it being said that because Irish Members had brought the subject of the distressed condition of their country before Parliament they had been guilty of Obstruction. He deprecated the blame for the waste of time that had resulted from the incapacity of the Government being thrown upon the shoulders of the Irish Representatives. For his part, he should rejoice if Irish Members could say that the social condition of their country did not require their interference, and that they could say their constituents were as satisfied as were those of hon. Members opposite. It would not be necessary then to intrude on the time of the House as they had. But there was not an hon. Member in the House who had heard Irish Members address them—whether they agreed with the views put forward or not—who would admit that Ireland was in that state. He would not have risen had it not been for the few observations made by the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon). He (Sir Patrick O'Brien) was one of those who concurred with all that the Government had attempted to do with reference to the Bill which was so long under discussion in the House. But he should regret if it should go forth that the state of Public Business, or the incapacity of the Government to do that which, if they had the power, in his mind, it would be their duty to do, should lead to anything occurring in Ireland, which he, for one, as an Irish Member, should entirely deplore. He was an Irish Member long connected with his county, and he was there to express an individual opinion; but he was not prepared to take the alarming view that the hon. Member for Tipperary had taken, and to suppose that in the coming winter either the landlords or tenants of Ireland should so far forget the interests of their country as, on the part of the landlords, to take steps which must weigh against them in future when the Land Question came on for consideration; or, on the other hand, that the unfortunate tenants should so forget the happiness of themselves and their families as to take a course which might subject them to what had been described as decimation and massacre. He trusted that the harvest which would shortly be reaped in that country would be sufficiently abundant to remove some of the despondency which had weighed upon them; but, in any case, he hoped that the good sense of all parties would admonish them to avoid doing anything which might bring about outrages and massacres, which they should all deplore.

SIR JOHN HAY remarked, that circumstances appeared to have changed since he had formerly sat in that House. He had clearly understood from the noble Marquess, yesterday, that the Employers' Liability Bill was to be taken on Friday, and now the noble Lord appeared to have withdrawn from that understanding. The conduct of the Government in the matter was entirely novel, and the noble Lord should state definitely to the House what course would be taken.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I am most anxious not to be misunderstood on this subject, and there is not the slightest ground for charging the Government with any discourtesy on this matter. I endeavoured, yesterday, to state, as clearly as I could, what were the arrangements with regard to Public Business which the Government thought it right to propose; but, of course, those arrangements depend very much upon whether it is possible or not to carry them out. For instance, we proposed to go into Committee upon the Hares and Rabbits Bill this morning, but we have not been allowed to do so; and if this discussion is continued we may not be able to get into Committee on the measure to-day, or even during the remainder of the week. I do not think that it is desirable that it should be understood that arrangements made beforehand at this period of the Session should be regarded as arrangements absolutely conclusive under all circumstances.

MR. R. N. FOWLER thought it would be for the convenience of the House if the Government would definitely state whether they adhered to the programme foreshadowed by the noble Marquess. He could not understand the great difficulty which the noble Marquess felt in carrying out that programme.

Sir Patrick O'Brien

MR. CHAPLIN said, he thought it was to be regretted that his Motion had given rise to such a long debate. That, however, was not his fault. He did not want the noble Marquess to state definitely that, under all circumstances, such and such a Bill should come on. But it was important to know whether, if the Hares and Rabbits Bill was not completed to-morrow, it would be continued on Friday.

MR. COURTNEY rose to Order, asking whether it was competent for the hon. Gentleman to make another speech?

MR. SPEAKER: The Question before the House being a substantive Motion, the hon. Gentleman has the right of reply.

MR. CHAPLIN hoped that the hon. Gentleman opposite would make himself more fully acquainted with the Rules of the House before he again unnecessarily interrupted an hon. Member in his speech. This debate might have been avoided, if only the Government had expressed its intentions with more clearness.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was perfectly certain that if his noble Friend had said in case anybody succeeded in talking out the Hares and Rabbits Bill on Tuesday or Wednesday it would not be taken on Thursday or Friday, they would be giving a very unwise encouragement to such proceedings.

MR. FINIGAN said, very many charges had been made against the Party to which he belonged; but, at the risk of bringing himself within the accusation of offering illegitimate Obstruction, he would not be deterred, whenever any question, directly or indirectly, affecting Ireland came before the House, from raising his voice in favour of just, and against any unjust proposals. He had no intention of delaying the Business of the House by prolonging the present debate, his object simply being to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether he was prepared to answer the straightforward Question of the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon)? Ireland was on the eve of great events, caused by the collision of Party factions in England, and the exercise of a miserable and narrow spirit in "another place." The Irish tenants were now standing between their own little homes and the roadside; and if a law, declared by the responsible Government of the country to be an unjust law, was to be put in execution during the coming winter, then the Government would have to be responsible for what would follow. Both in Parliament and out of Parliament the Irish Members would, as they had a perfect right to do, agitate and organize to the best of their ability, and use whatever powers God or nature had endowed them with, in order to have the Land Question properly settled. They were now facing a very critical period in Irish history; and he thought it the duty of the Chief Secretary, who was responsible for the government of that country, to give the hon. Member for Tipperary a direct and immediate answer to the Question which had been put to him.

MR. W. E. FORSTER did not understand that the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) had asked him any Question. He simply understood him, in language part of which he (Mr. W. E. Forster) very much regretted, to make a protest with regard to the present state of matters in Ireland. He understood the hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Finigan) to ask him whether the Government intended to take any steps, or to bring forward any measure, in consequence of what happened in "another place?" As regarded that Question, he could only refer to the answer he had already given, and which the Government saw no reason to change. He could not sit down without saying how deeply he regretted those anticipations of evil in the coming winter in Ireland. He thought they were anticipations that might do something, but he hoped not much, towards their own fulfilment. He could only state that the Government were conscious of their deep responsibility, and would continue to do their duty. They must preserve law and order in Ireland.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 23; Noes 236: Majority 213.—(Div. List, No. 103.)

MR. WARTON rose to move the adjournment of the House.

MR. SPEAKER intimated to the hon. Member that his Motion was not in Order, no other Motion having intervened since the House had just decided against the adjournment.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

HARES AND RABBITS BILL—[BILL 194.]

(Mr. Gladstone, Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Dodson, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Mr. Arthur Peel.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he desired to make a few observations with reference to the Amendments which he had placed upon the Paper, which he hoped might facilitate the passing of the Bill. They seemed to him to be necessary, in consequence of the extraordinary misunderstanding and misrepresentation which he had seen in The Daily News of that morning on the subject of these Amendments. The fact was, that the statement in that paper was not consistent with the facts.

MR. SPEAKER, interposing, said, he must call attention to the fact that there were two Instructions to be moved upon going into Committee on this Bill, and that they ought to take precedence of any explanatory statement which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had to make.

MR. LABOUCHERE, in rising to move—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to take powers to extend the provisions of the Bill to all game;"

said, the debate on the second reading of the Bill seemed, for the most part, to have been a little family discussion among the landlords and their friends. It would be well, he thought, to spend their time in giving a thoroughly Radical tone to the measure. Some people seemed to think that the Home Secretary had been guilty of sacrilege in attacking this monument of past legislation—the Game Laws—and he perceived, from the Amendment of which the right hon. Gentleman had given Notice, that he had made certain concessions to the landlord interest on the Ministerial side of the House, but had made none to the Radicals; and, therefore, it was that he desired to move the Instruction to the Committee, of which he had given Notice, for extending the Bill to other game besides ground game. The Home Secretary, in bringing in the Bill, said that the right to destroy animals which preyed on the crops should be an inalienable incident of occupation. Were not birds animals? Why, then, should the Bill be limited to hares and rabbits? Now, he was not prepared to say that pheasants, partridges, and other winged game did as much damage to the crops as hares and rabbits did; but it would be admitted that partridges and pheasants, and particularly the latter, did a considerable amount of mischief to the crops. He held in his hand a letter from a farmer on this point, which he would quote to the House. The writer said—

“By my lease I was protected from damage from hares and rabbits by the insertion of a compensation clause; but so little was this covenant on the landlord's part regarded by him or his agents, that through the whole of the term protests and threats of proceedings had continually to be employed to prevent its being a complete mockery. The winged game was reserved unconditionally. The first sittings of pheasants' eggs were gathered up by the keepers, and hatched off under barn-door fowls in hen-houses near the keepers' lodges, and early put out with their cooped foster-mothers on a part of the park adjoining the tenants' arable lands. As soon as the barley began to change colour they were lured by the keepers into the standing corn, and might for weeks be seen by the hundred leisurely and fearlessly passing and re-passing the road between the park and the field. If, as in late years has been frequently the case, the wheat was left uncarted long in the fields, the tops of the shocks would be matted and grown together through the pheasants turning them into perches and feeding-ground, and the rakings of wheat and barley would be thrashed out completely through this species of so-called harmless game if left out long through bad weather. As these flocks of tame birds were not supposed to have reached their full size for the market until the end of November, the mischief did not end when the harvest was over. The newly-sown wheat and bean fields near the coverts furnished the next feeding-ground, and so much of the seed corn would they gouge out with their hooked beaks, that it was sometimes necessary to drill the field, or parts of it, again. The mangold-wurzels next received their attention, and cart-loads of these would be perforated or hollowed out to a shell before storage time came. The damage done by partridges is not so great as that done by semi-domesticated pheasants. The former are not reared artificially, and of late the cold and wet in the hatching time has kept down their numbers. This bird lends itself less to the gratification of the craze for heavy game-bags; and were it not that the modern sportsman has substituted driving for the good old fashion of walking them down, which involves too much physical exertion to be in great favour, there would be little probability of the partridges becoming as great a nuisance as the pheasants; but there is no question that where partridges exist in excess they do a considerable amount of harm. Where they are numerous they frequently take out nearly all the seed corn in the drill mark of the furrow. When winter sets in the winter vetches form a favourite pasturage for them, and, consequently, early growth is checked. Swede turnips left for late feed for store sheep and ewes and lambs in spring are in sharp weather scooped out by the crown, which prevents the spring shoot appearing, or, by letting in the frost, causes them to rot.”

He thought it would be admitted that that letter was a very fair statement of the damage done. [“No!”] He would refer hon. Members who disputed it to the Reports of the Royal Commissions of 1845 and 1871 on that subject. It was said that excessive preservation was the exception, and not the rule. He should say that the man who turned out one bird to feed on the crops of his neighbours, without allowing the right of shooting it, would be indulging in excessive game preservation. But where the game was not preserved it was let to plutocrats from the City, and the plutocrats were a greater nuisance than the landlords. These plutocrats had no connection with the land, and no interest in the farmers. They paid for their shooting, and naturally wished to have the worth of their money, and to vie with the county gentlemen in making great bags. All this led to excessive preservation; and the result was that a large amount of the crops of the country were eaten up by game, and every year 10,000 persons were convicted for destroying birds which they thought they had a right to kill. [“No, no!”] An hon. Member said “No;” but the Bishop of Manchester did not take the same view. That respectable Prelate said “partridge and pheasants corrupt the virtue of the labourer.” The labourers had a natural sense of justice, and although they knew that poaching was against the law they did not consider that it was a crime to poach; and it was a violation of the first principles of justice to make that a legal crime which was not a moral wrong. Many of the pheasants' eggs that were bought by gentlemen for their game preserves were supplied by poachers; and the labourer might well be astonished that the village squire should encourage him to poach an egg, and afterwards prosecute him for taking the egg when it had developed into a bird. The Game Laws had been termed by Blackstone a “bastard slip of the forest laws,” which were intended to enable the privileged classes to destroy animals that were feræ naturæ; but Blackstone would be surprised to find that Game Laws were passed to enable a country gentleman to raise kinds of predatory poultry for the mere purpose of knocking them over after they had fattened on the crops of his neighbour. Even the Norman Kings never thought of raising game in order to kill it. They simply insisted on their rights to kill the game they found within certain forest preserves. A sportsman of old would have scouted the idea of modern sporting, which was the outcome of a long and luxurious civilization. What was this noble sport about which they heard so much? It was, as a rule, effeminate, contemptible butchery of semi-domestic creatures. Take pheasant-shooting. They all knew what pheasant-shooting was. Partridge-shooting was carried on on the same principle. ["No!"] Why, partridge driving was the usual way. They shot partridges as they flew overhead. He did not exaggerate when he said that shooting was not a sport in the fair and legitimate sense of the word. The system of shooting which existed was an abuse. The shooting at Hurlingham—was that sport? It was an abuse. Speaking of deer-stalking, it was not so lazy or luxurious a sport. Its principal evil was, that they had to depopulate enormous tracts in Scotland in order to allow the deer to exist, and that every farmer in the neighbourhood had to inclose his fields most carefully in order to prevent the ferocious brutes from coming down and devouring everything on the ground. He believed that the great mass of country gentlemen would be secretly thankful if something were done to put an end to the present system of preserving. Every pheasant their friends shot cost them about a sovereign; and, doubtless, they would be glad if, in the autumn, they could say to their friends—"I wish I could have given you some shooting. But for these abominable Radicals, I should have been delighted to do so." They would be grateful to the House of Commons for such an excuse. He (Mr. Labouchere) and his political associates would not be satisfied until they had absolutely abolished all the Game Laws, and reduced the Trespass Laws to such proportions that they could not be converted into Game Laws. [Laughter.] Hon. Members might laugh; but that was what was coming in the near future. Game was the common property of all men. Any law which interfered with the right to take game was an attack upon property, because it interfered with the right of a man to do what he liked with his own. Land also, in a certain sense, might be considered the common property of all. There were three concurrent owners—the community, the landlord, and the occupier. Mr. Williams, an eminent Conservative and a great legal authority, said, in one of his books, that the first thing a student of law had to do was to clear his mind of the notion that there was any absolute property in land. Hon. Members who thought differently would be better able to grasp the nature of the legislation impending over them if they took Mr. Williams's advice and cleared their minds of erroneous views on this subject. He thought it desirable that one or two words should be introduced into the Bill to include winged as well as ground game. If his proposal were adopted in the Bill it would be a very tolerable measure. Even if there were not time to introduce these Amendments this Session, it would be still well for the House to pass this Instruction as a protest against the existing form of the Game Laws. It would show the Home Secretary that instead of being in advance of public opinion he was lagging behind it; and it would show the Government that if they grasped this question in a far more drastic spirit than that which they now displayed they would receive from the Liberal side of the House the warmest and most cordial support. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Instruction to the Committee.

Mr. Labouchere

MR. P. A. TAYLOR: Sir, I shall only ask the indulgence of the House for a short time in seconding the Motion of my hon. Friend upon a question which, I think, the House will acknowledge is one in which I have taken a great deal of interest for many years. I need not assure my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary that I have no desire to stop or to obstruct the Bill of which he is in charge. Had I any such intention I should not have waited until this point. On the contrary, Sir, I desire to treat the Bill with all respect. I follow, indeed, the dictum of the poet who tells us that "we must not scorn the meanest thing." There is no use denying, Sir, that the enemies of our iniquitous Game Law system in and out of the House have experienced a great disappointment at the very small—I would say the insignificant—character of the Bill introduced. Neither the House nor the country can forget that my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, and the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, is a Member of the Government, and is a man who has done more than any man in the country to awaken the understanding of the people to the evils of game. Nor can we forget that another right hon. Friend of mine (the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland) nearly 20 years ago led us into the Lobby against the most infamous element in our Game Law system, the Poaching Prevention Act of 1862. I remember that, under the leadership of the right hon. Gentleman, we fought through the night, until broad daylight on one July morning, in an attempt to prevent that iniquitous Bill from being passed. One might, however, suppose that when a Government, containing those right hon. Gentlemen, proposed a Bill on this subject, the first thing they would have done would have been to abolish that particular law. But I am not, for all this, for a moment venturing to blame my right hon. Friends. I have no doubt that they think they are doing the very best that the circumstances of the moment will permit them to do. I know that they have game preservers opposite to them, that they have game preservers behind them, that they have game preservers all around them, and I was content to accept whatever they would offer. I should not, therefore, have ventured to trouble the House to-day but for the fear that more concessions will be made in the direction of weakness. The Bill, as it originally was brought in, was quite small enough to satisfy the most moderate of reformers. If it is to be diminished to the extent that I understand—I had not the honour of hearing the right hon. Gentleman, and I have not had an opportunity of seeing the Papers that he has laid on the Table—but if it is to be diminished in the sense that I have heard, it then becomes a very grave question for us more advanced reformers to ask ourselves whether it would not be better the Bill should be postponed altogether for another Session. Now, my right hon. Friend began by disappointing us. He told us he placed his Bill on a Parliamentary basis, and that he based it on the recommendation of a well-known agriculturist, Mr. Clare Sewell Read, and also on the recommendations of the Committees which have sat twice on this subject during the last 30 or 40 years. But my right hon. Friend, when he had got the dictum of a Conservative agriculturist as that which should form the basis of his Bill, took only a very small proportion even of that Conservative agriculturist's recommendation. Mr. Clare Sewell Read, representing the Central Chamber of Agriculture, stated before the Committee that that Chamber had resolved that hares and rabbits should be dropped out of the Game Laws, and that owners and occupiers should have an inalienable right to kill ground game. That was the proper remedy for the evil in the opinion of the Chamber. But my right hon. Friend has taken only a very small and insignificant portion of that recommendation. Sir, one might suppose that when a Bill was to be brought in which was said to contain the recommendations of the Select Committee, that it would have effected the destruction of that abomination—the cumulative penalty system. That was one of the things distinctly recommended by the Committee of 1846. Another one of the most injurious parts of the Game Law system is that which gives the informer half the penalty obtained. The abolition of that was also a distinct recommendation of the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman has neglected that also. One important provision which has already been carried into effect with regard to Scotland was a facile and cheap mode of redress for damage by arbitration. We hear nothing of that. Of course, it is nothing to say that those for whom I am principally concerned—the people of England—are not at all considered in the matter. The 10,000 convictions that take place every year, the wholesale demoralization alluded to by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere)—they are altogether left outside of the four corners of this Bill. Now, I am not sure that the Bill would not leave the agricultural labourer, in one respect, in an actually worse condition than that in which he is now, because when it is passed he will have a number of inferior and second-rate game preservers in the farmers themselves, and in place of every single prosecution now there may be two or three under the provisions of this Bill. Still, Sir, notwithstanding all these objections, I should not have risen at the present time to criticize the measure, but for the fear which is generally expressed that the Government intend still further to modify this very moderate Bill. I say nothing about my own opinion as to what good it will be to the farmer; but I must say one or two words upon the general effect of the Bill, because it is doubtful whether it will be any good whatever, and, therefore, any further modification must render the Bill clearly unworthy of our support. I can hardly see how the farmer is to get any practical good from this Bill, because, according to the law at the present time, not only the ground game, but the whole of the game, belongs to the occupier, unless he specifically makes them over to his landlord. If he is strong and bold, then he keeps the game. If he is cowardly and weak, he cannot prevent the preservation of game now, and he would not be able to prevent the preservation of game under this Bill. There has been much talk about the violation of contract, and also, upon the other hand, it is said that honourable landlords are not likely to fail in their pledges; but the Bill, in my opinion, does not touch these questions at all. There is no need for any violation of contract. What more natural than for a landlord to say to a farmer—"Well, my good friend, I am very happy to have you for my tenant; it is eminently desirable that we should keep a good relation, and that we should have a common understanding as to the cultivation of the land, that we should work harmoniously together. I suppose you would not wish to destroy all the game on the estate." The tenant, of course, would reply—"Oh no, master; I am not one for that." That may be the only contract, and then, if afterwards the ideas of landlord and tenant on the subject of game preservation be found not to agree, why, then, the landlord gives the man notice to quit—and there is an end of safety under this Bill. But, further, the landlord would not violate the Act if he said to his tenant on audit day—"You have carried out very honourably our understanding; you have preserved as much game as I want; there is 10 per cent off your rent." That would not be a part of the contract; but, nevertheless, the result of it would be to defeat the Bill. Then, again, what could the farmer do if the landlord evaded the Bill by excluding his coverts from the four corners of the lease altogether? The Bill would then be no use against the worst enemies of the farmers—the rabbits—because, even if the farmer or his principal servant killed them in the open, if they cannot go into the coverts and stop them there, they cannot prevent the injury done by these pests. Although I do not speak as a practical man, I believe that every practical man will tell you, and I find the fact in our Blue Books, that you cannot possibly get rid of rabbits by shooting them in the fields; you have to snare them in the hedgerows, and ferret them out of the holes if they are at all to be kept under. Still, of all this I do not complain. I take it for granted that this Bill was as good as possible, and I am bound to admit that, so far as I can judge, the farmers take a much more favourable view of the Bill in regard to its effect upon themselves than I do. I will not put myself, or the cause for which I have acted for so many years, in the thankless and unenviable position of enabling the farmers to be able to say, even plausibly—"Here is an irreconcilable theorist, and because the man cannot get what he wants, he stands in the way of the efforts of the Government to benefit us." I therefore resolved at first to say nothing at all. Moreover, the language of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary in introducing the Bill very much more reconciled me to it, because he said that he brought forward this Bill now, and that if the House did not pass it, the alternative was the abolition of the Game Laws. It follows, therefore, quite distinctly, that if, as I believe, this poor palliative will be found to have failed, that my right hon. and learned Friend is clearly and obviously bound to take his other course, and go for the utter abolition of the Game Laws. Moreover, he says—"I am not dealing with the Game Laws themselves, that is a question that will come by-and-bye. It is an urgent and important question." I was delighted to hear him say that it was to be dealt with in a not distant future. It appears, however, as he has told us, that he is not dealing with the Game Laws at all, and when he also declared that he was merely dealing with the principal grievance which was affecting farmers, I felt, of course, entirely reconciled, and that the best plan I could take was not to complain of this little Bill, and to trust to the farmers and the right hon. Gentleman in the future. If there is one thing more astonishing than another in the course of these debates, it has been the wonderful change of opinion since I first came to the House on this question. I have been told many times that I am a fanatic on this question; but I shall, really, after what has taken place, be inclined to look upon myself as a prophet. When I hear hon. Gentlemen, from the mountain of the Opposition, declare that the evil of the Game Laws was a crying and an enormous one, with which the farmers of this country neither could nor would put up with much longer, I confess I was astonished at the change of opinion, and I was not surprised to find that I had a Government pledge at no very distant date to my measure for the abolition of the Game Laws; not absolutely and universally pledged, I am sorry to say, for I heard with regret and surprise the observations that were made by my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), in which he declared that the abolition of the Game Laws neither was nor could be admitted, because if it were, a stringent trespass law would be obliged to be passed, and that would be a Game Law and something more. I trust my hon. Friend will have repented of his heresy before a very long time has passed, or he will find himself in singular disunion with the right hon. Gentlemen with whom he sits. He maintains the system of the Game Laws because it completes the divorce between the population and the land; but I have heard my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster make an eloquent speech upon this subject, and I agreed with every word he said when he denounced a system which allows to the great mass of the population no interest and no enjoyment in the land but the right to walk along the high road. I think that the heresy of my hon. Friend is as capable, as nearly as possible, of mathematical refutation as any theory could be. Trespassers upon the land are of two kinds—those who trespass in pursuit of game, and those who do not trespass in pursuit of game, but who go in search of birds' nests or to gather flowers, or to do anything else of that kind which takes the population on to the land. They will, so far as these Game Laws are concerned, of course be in precisely the same category as now; and in respect to those who trespass in search of game, it is manifest that when you have abolished the laws which keep up the head of game, you will have enormously diminished the head of game on the land, and you will consequently have proportionately diminished the temptation to trespass. We have long been told by hon. Gentlemen opposite that the old sentimental poacher is gone, and that we have now only the villain who makes money out of poaching as a business. Very well; then the villain presently will not be able to make money out of it, and everyone knows perfectly well that it is quite possible to have enough game for the purposes of sport in the old English style, and yet not to have half enough to tempt the professional poacher. I am, Sir, therefore, humbly thankful for the present Bill, and I believe that right hon. Gentlemen opposite do not really dislike the Bill so much for the practical effect of it as because they cannot bear that a daring finger should even touch their sacred Game Laws. I am, therefore, for this Bill heartily thankful; but I am not if it is to be emasculated, and disembowelled of all the good it contains. I have not seen the Amendments of my right hon. and learned Friend, and I have not read what they are; but I say at once that if they are framed with the object which I understand, I shall strongly object to them. If there is to be an Amendment which forbids the occupier to kill game except by daylight, that is a fatal blot in the Bill. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: That is not so.] I am delighted to hear it. If there is an Amendment which prevents the use of surface traps, which cannot be put where hares and rabbits run because they may catch other delicate creatures, that would be a most disastrous limitation. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: Hear hear!] Another thing has been said, and I trust my right hon. and learned Friend will be able to deny it absolutely. I infer, from what I have seen in the papers, that he is now, for the first time in the history of this Bill, going to set up a close season for ground game. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: No, no!] The right hon.

Mr. P. A. Taylor

Mr. P. A. Taylor

and learned Gentleman, I am happy to say, by his replies, has entirely destroyed the effect of the criticisms which I wish to make, and I shall, therefore, not attempt to delay the passage of the Bill by talking any more about it. It is a Bill which does something; and, therefore, I thank him very cordially for its introduction. I thank him, however, above all, for the promise he has held out to the House that, at no distant date, we may look forward to the abolition of the Game Laws as a Government measure.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee, that they have power to extend the provisions of the Bill to all game."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that, judging from his state of alarm, the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Taylor) had evidently been reading nothing but The Daily News. The statements in that paper concerning this Bill were entirely inaccurate; and the conclusions drawn from them were, therefore, groundless. The hon. Member had complained that the Bill did not remove all the evils of the Game Laws. That was perfectly true. It did not propose to be a Bill to amend the Game Laws as a whole, though he hoped to see such a Bill introduced one day, as those laws certainly required amending. The Bill was meant to remedy a special grievance of the farmers. It had been charged against him by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), as if it were a mistake, if not a crime, that he avowed that the Bill was brought in in the interest of the farmers. Well, he said again that it was a Bill for which the farmer wished. His hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) desired to see the provisions of the Bill applied to pheasants and partridges; but, if he referred to the Report of the Select Committee, he would see that they stated that the complaints were principally directed against ground game, and that it was shown that little harm—and only that which could be easily prevented—was done by winged game, while partridges, by their consumption of the insects, were a benefit to the farmer. He could not help thinking that the hon. Members for Northampton and Leicester would not be doing what the farmers desired if they imperilled the passing of this Bill, as they would do if they succeeded in introducing partridges and pheasants into it. The object of the Bill was to secure the crops of the farmer, and not to destroy sport. He had always regarded crops as being more important than sport, and held that, if the two things were inconsistent, the sport of the gentleman should yield to the crop of the farmer. So far, however, as the two could be reconciled, he had always desired that that should be done. He had never disparaged sporting at all, so long as sporting could be enjoyed without the destruction of crops. What was desired was that sporting should not be pursued where, for the pleasure of the few, the interests of the many were sacrificed. The Bill was meant to protect the crops of the farmer, without interfering more than was necessary with the sport of other people—to do as much good to agriculture and as little harm to sporting as was possible. He had stated the principle of the Bill on the second reading, with the desire of seeing Amendments put on the Paper by hon. Members representing the interests of the farmer and of the sportsman, and examining them with a view of deciding which he could fairly adopt, having in view the interests of both parties. As the Bill stood, its 1st clause declared a naked right; the Proviso declared certain limitations of that right. The Amendments on the Paper might be grouped into two classes. They did not amount to 140, as had been stated by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), as the right hon. and gallant Admiral opposite (Sir John Hay) had a considerable number of Amendments down to alter "ground game" into "hares and rabbits." After the first was disposed of, it could not be supposed that the right hon. and gallant Member would force them to discuss and vote on each of the others which remained, as they all referred to the same subject. The enumeration referred to was, therefore, delusive. In the Proviso he had put on the Paper he had dealt—he would not say satisfactorily to all hon. Members, but he hoped to many—with the Amendments. He did not think that any of the Amendments were altogether incompatible with the principle of the Bill save that of his hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand). He was not going at the present time to discuss whether the proposal was, in the abstract, a good or a bad one; but would simply say that, in his view, it was impracticable, and could not be introduced into the Bill. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire had also proposed certain Amendments; but they were, in his view, incompatible with the scope of the Bill. There were other Amendments, however, which were not of that character, and which were not incompatible with the principle of the Bill. As to those which he had been unable to adopt, one had reference to the use of the gun by farmers. It was asked why farmers should be allowed to use the gun—why they should not be limited to snares and traps? He was not prepared to say that it was not possible to destroy hares and rabbits without using the gun; but he must say that this Bill would be utterly unacceptable to the class in whose interests it was framed if the use of the gun was prohibited. He thought, indeed, it would be a very ungracious and—he did not use the word offensively—a very shabby act if such a prohibition were to be enacted. He did not think it was in the interests of sport to give to the farmer simply destructive facilities, and to forbid him the more dignified method, approaching somewhat to the character of sport. It was far better, in his opinion, that they should interest the farmer in the sport in which the landlords themselves engaged, and not to say to them—"I am here for a few days in the year and can use a gun; but you, who live all the year round on the estate, must not use such a weapon; I confine you to the lower methods." For his own part, he had lived from his earliest youth on an estate where it was always the habit to give the farmers the right of shooting all the game. What was the consequence? There was not a tenant there who might not do exactly as he liked—shoot hares, rabbits, and partridges—and there was not a keeper in the whole place. Yet there were a great many partridges and hares on the estate, and much better sport was enjoyed than on estates where keepers were employed. It was well to treat farmers in a generous spirit. He had talked, the other day, with a large farmer holding under the Duke of Roxburgh, who had expressed astonishment at the opposition to the Bill, because it would give him nothing that the Duke did not give to every one of his tenants. He (Sir William Harcourt) admitted that the main object of the Bill was to keep down hares and rabbits; but if, in carrying out that object, the farmer incidentally enjoyed some little sport, why should it be grudged him? If a farmer saw a rabbit eating out the heart of his prize turnips or favourite carrots, there was a natural feeling of resentment at the act—such a feeling as would prompt him to avenge himself on the spot—not to wait till night, and entrap the offender in a snare. With regard to the close time, Mr. Clare Read had expressed his willingness to consent to one of three months—namely, April, May, and June; but if the Bill were taken advantage of for the first time to create a close time for hares, it would be somewhat incongruous and illogical. There was no such intention on the part of the Government in framing the Bill, and he could not now see his way to adopting any such principle. It was true, a close time existed for hares in Ireland; but that was one of the eccentricities of Irish legislation. As to the Amendments he had adopted, the first had reference to the persons to be authorized by the occupier to kill game. There was very little alteration in the original proposal. Instead of enacting the proposal in a clause, he had put it in as a limitation. There was no alteration in the original Bill with the exception that, under pressure, he had confined the outsider, not being a member of the farmer's household or in his service, to one instead of seven. What this man ought to be was a professional rabbit-killer. Many people did not know how to kill rabbits. Notice was to be given to the collector of taxes as to who was this authorized agent. That was really the only alteration he had made in the "unauthorized agent," with the exception of introducing notice of other persons entitled to kill game. He came now to the second proposal. He had excluded from the right of killing game those who had only "commoners'" rights. His next Amendment had reference to the prevention of using firearms by night. He did not know that anyone should prefer shooting by night, and during the darkness it was much more probable that greater execution would be done by snaring than by discharging a double-barrelled gun. There was another Amendment which was, perhaps, more serious, and that was the prevention of traps being used above ground, which, of course, was a limitation, to a certain extent, upon the right of killing. Such traps were in some cases cruel, and he considered there were plenty of other methods of killing game than that involved in this barbarous practice. In the list of Amendments which he had from the first promised was one with regard to moorland, as to which it was proposed that the rights conferred by the section should obtain only from 11th December to 31st March. In making this proposal he had had in view the desirableness of reconciling the interests of sport with the permanent interests and security of the crops; but if the Committee thought upon any alternative period, he would have no objection to consider it with care when they got into Committee. Some people might think that his Amendments went too far, and others, no doubt, would say that they did not go far enough; but he could say that he had produced them in the hope, and with the expectation, that they would facilitate the passing of the Bill, and, at the same time, render it as effective as possible.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was to be congratulated on his speech. He did not think that he had ever heard two speeches more different in character than that to which they had just listened, and the one delivered on the bringing forward of the measure; and had the right hon. and learned Gentleman brought forward the Bill in the same spirit as he had now displayed, he could not doubt that less aversion would have been evinced towards it. The right hon. and learned Gentleman now appeared to have discovered, for the first time, that it was not inexpedient to adopt a spirit of conciliation. It appeared to him (Mr. Balfour) that the measure was conceived while the right hon. and learned Gentleman was in electioneering difficulties, and that that occurred to him between his rejection at Oxford and his election at Derby. As first introduced, the Bill bore traces of this origin. It seemed to have been brought in merely for the purpose of satisfying an electioneering cry, and an Act of Parliament based on such a cry was not likely to be eminently satisfactory. The Amendments the right hon. and learned Gentleman had introduced,

